BIGGS DITCH CO. v. JONGSTE et al.

Sac. 5561.

Supreme Court of California.

1. Covenants ⇨57

Provisions in deeds that owners of land conveyed should have right to use water from irrigation company's canal over land without payment for water right were mere self-serving declarations and not binding on a ditch company, which was not party to or in privity to deeds, but claimed title to easement over land for canal or ditch purposes by adverse possession and user under claim of right, not by deed or color of title from any predecessor in interest.

2. Waters and water courses ⇨152(8)

Evidence was sufficient to establish ditch company's claim or title to easement or right of way over certain land for canal or ditch purposes by adverse possession and user under claim of right for over 30 years.

3. Waters and water courses ⇨152(6)

A ditch company, claiming merely easement in land for irrigation ditch purposes, is not required to prove that it paid taxes on ditch or water therein or that no taxes were levied or assessed thereon in order to support its claim of title to such easement by adverse possession, as law does not require assessment of easement and burden of showing such assessment is on party contesting claim of adverse possession.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; W. T. Belieu, Judge Assigned.

Action by the Biggs Ditch Company against Louise T. Jongste and another to quiet title to an easement or right of way across defendants' land for canal or ditch purposes and enjoin defendants from obstructing such easement or right of way.

CAL.REP.149-150 P.2d-1

Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Prior opinion, Cal.App., 142 P.2d 322.

Chas. L. Gilmore, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Jack McPherson, of Chico, for respondent.

SCHAUER, Justice.

Defendants appeal from a judgment quieting in plaintiff corporation, a mutual water company, title in and to "an easement or right-of-way upon, over, along and across the entire extreme northerly and westerly boundaries" of certain "lands of defendant, Louise T. Jongste * * * for canal and/or ditch purposes," and enjoining and restraining both of the defendants (Louise T. Jongste and her brother, Bernard Jongste) from "using, interfering or obstructing" such easement or right of way and from "in any wise damming up, holding, obstructing or diverting the water flowing in said canal and/or ditch and from in any wise preventing plaintiff, its agents and employees, from free ingress or egress to said easement or right-of-way for the purposes of maintenance, care and preservation thereof." Plaintiff bases its claim of title solely on asserted adverse possession and use of the ditch in question under a claim of right (but not color of title; see 1 Cal. Jur. 570, § 51) for a period of more than thirty years last past, while defendants contend that plaintiff's own evidence establishes that defendant Louise T. Jongste and her predecessors in interest for more than twenty years last past have used waters from such ditch without payment therefor, and that "the water from the ditch or canal has [thereby] become a part of" defendants' land by user. The deeds by which defendant Louise Jongste and certain of her predecessors in interest acquired the land in question contained the following provision: "Provided However that all of the lands that are now being used as a 'Right of Way' to and for the 'Main Canal' of the Butte County Irrigated Land Company, of Biggs, Cal., as it is now built on, along, and over the North and West Lines of the above described premises are hereby reserved from the land intended to be conveyed by this deed, and the same is so reserved for and in consideration, that the owner or owners of the above described land and premises are at all times hereafter to have the privilege and right to use water from and out of the said Canal, (as hereinbefore described) for the purpose of irrigating of any and all of the said lands and premises, without the payment for a 'Water Right' to the Butte County Irrigated Land Company, or any other Company or any Companies for such a right, and the said Butte County Irrigated Land Company, shall not be required to pay or give any other compensation for their right of way, for their main canal, excepting a water right to and for the above named lands."

[1] It is to be noted that plaintiff was not a party and is not in privity to any of the above mentioned deeds, and, as previously mentioned, claims title only by adverse possession and user under a claim of right, not by deed or color of title from any predecessor in interest. It is unnecessary, therefore, to determine whether the provision above quoted (that the "owners of the above described land * * * are at all times hereafter to have the privilege and right to use water from and out of the said Canal * * * *without the payment for a 'Water Right' * * " [italics added]) meant that the owners of the land described were authorized for all time to come to take and use water from this distribution ditch without paying for such water, regardless of who owned it, or were merely given a form of appurtenant right to purchase water from the ditch for the irrigation of their land without further payment for such appurtenant right of purchase.

Even if we assume that the provision was intended to give the right to take and use the water without payment therefor, such provision is a mere self-serving declaration; plaintiff, not being in privity to the deeds containing such provision, is not bound by it. The right of defendants to purchase water from the ditch for irrigating their land, on the same terms as other appurtenant land owners, has not been disputed and is not in issue.

Plaintiff was incorporated May 22, 1908, and ever since then has been engaged solely in distributing water for irrigation and domestic use, only to owners of its capital stock. The shares of such stock are appurtenant to the lands described in the stock certificates, are issuable on the basis of one share for each acre of land, and are transferable only with the land. The water distributed by plaintiff through its canals and ditches, including the ditch here involved, is purchased by the users (shareholders in plaintiff corporation) directly from another corporation, the Sutter Butte Canal Company, a public utility, to whom each user makes payment for his water.

[2] The ditch with which we are here concerned was constructed in 1907 and it is upon alleged actual, exclusive, open, notorious, continuous, and adverse possession and user of the ditch under a claim of right ever since the date of plaintiff's incorporation that plaintiff rests its claim of title. The following epitomized excerpts from the evidence, considered in connection with the investment which the construction of the ditch itself connotes, the by-laws of plaintiff, and the method of plaintiff's operation of the ditch, indicate a claim of right and suffice to show that plaintiff fully proved its allegations as to the extent and character of its possession and user of the ditch.

W. S. Schill testified that he is one of the directors of plaintiff ditch company and since 1910 has owned land in the area served by the company; that the expense of maintenance of the laterals and ditches of the company and the salary of the "ditch tender" are met by annual assessment on the shareholders of the company; that the company has used the ditch in question since prior to 1910; that the water flowing in the ditch comes from the main canal of the Sutter Butte Canal Company; that he knew of no occasion on which anyone not a member of the ditch company had taken water from the ditch; that after defendant Louise Jongste bought (in March, 1941) the land along which the ditch runs defendant Bernard Jongste notified the company that he intended to construct weirs in the ditch and take water for such land at any time he wished; that he immediately started and practically completed two weirs; that the witness went over to see Mr. Jongste about the weirs and Jongste "stated he had the right and was entitled to" take water free of charge, although he was offered membership in the ditch company on the same basis as that of other shareholders (annual assessment and payment of water rate to the Sutter Butte Canal Company); that the effect of use of the two weirs by defendants would be to cause the water in the canal to flow onto the Jongste land and prevent it from going to the consumers below. It appears that this proceeding was filed on May 5, 1941, as a result of the above stated acts and claims of defendants.

Adolph Peterson testified that in 1908 or 1909 he purchased and settled upon land in the area served by plaintiff company and became a stockholder in the company; that he knew of no occasion on which "anyone * * * ever claimed any right to take water out of there [the ditch here involved] free of charge" and had never heard that "anyone ever claimed title to that ditch as against the ditch company [plaintiff]."

Joseph L. Williams testified that since 1928 he had resided in the area served by plaintiff company and been a stockholder in the company and since July 7, 1941, had been the "ditch tender" for the company; that he is familiar with the Jongste property; that he had no knowledge that "anyone other than Mr. Jongste put weirs in that ditch or any holes or anything else in it," except that on an occasion two or three years prior to 1941 the then owner of the Jongste property, a Mr. Rutherford, had claimed the right to take free water from the ditch and had "put a door in the ditch to take water out on the place," but that the witness had told Rutherford that the only way to get water was to pay for it and had himself removed the door and Rutherford had "left it out."

O. F. Brown testified that since 1911 he had resided and owned land in the area served by plaintiff company and had held various offices in the company; that he had been familiar with the Jongste property for the thirty years since 1911 and in that time he knew of no one except Mr. Rutherford who "ever made any claim as against the ditch company to any title in that ditch"; that in approximately 1938 Rutherford had blocked the ditch and attempted to take water from it without payment therefor, but that the witness had "warned him of it a time or two by letter and word of mouth" and Rutherford had desisted.

S. C. Pereria testified that since 1912 he had resided and owned land in the area served by plaintiff company and had held various offices in the company; that for the twenty-nine years since 1912 he had been familiar with the Jongste property; that he knew of nobody who had taken water from the ditch without complying with the rules and regulations of the ditch company.

George Milford testified that he had been the first president of plaintiff company and had resided in the vicinity since 1910; that since that date the ditch company had operated the ditch here in question; that he is familiar with the Jongste property; and that to his knowledge no one who had ever held that property had been given free water.

The record contains other testimony, merely cumulative to that above epitomized, in support of the finding in plaintiff's favor on the issue of adverse possession; no useful purpose would be served, however, by setting forth such testimony.

[3] Defendants also assert that plaintiff must prove either payment of taxes on the ditch or on the water or else that no taxes were levied or assessed thereon, in order to support its claim of title by adverse possession. Admittedly no such proof was made. Although the rule advanced by defendants applies as a general proposition, it is to be noted that plaintiff here claims an easement rather than a title in fee, that the law does not require an easement to be assessed, and that the burden of showing such an assessment is upon the party contesting the claim of adverse possession. (See McMorris v. Pagano, 1944, 63 Cal. App.2d 446, 146 P.2d 944, and cases there cited.)

For the reasons above stated the judgment is affirmed.

DAVENPORT v. STRATTON.

L. A. No. 18664.

Supreme Court of California.

Rehearing Denied May 29, 1944.

1. Guaranty $\hookrightarrow$ 31

Where guaranty was joint and several, an action would lie against either or both of the guarantors.

2. Evidence $\hookrightarrow$ 471(3, 34)

In action on contract of guaranty executed in consideration of execution of lease, testimony of landlord's employee who had charge of the rent collection department in response to questions as to gross amount unpaid under the lease, and as to gross amount of re-rentals after eviction of tenant, was not objectionable on ground that questions called for conclusions of witness.

3. Evidence $\hookrightarrow$ 591

Defendant, having introduced in evidence as an exhibit the statement of accounts kept by plaintiff's assignor, was bound by its provision.

4. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 1082(2)

A point which was not raised at trial of the action nor in the District Court of Appeal could not be considered by the Supreme Court.

5. Estoppel $\hookrightarrow$ 22(1)

Where contract of guaranty executed in consideration of execution of lease expressly recited that it was annexed to and formed part of lease and agreement referring to lease, guarantor was estopped from denying liability on ground that lease was not physically attached to the guaranty at time guarantor signed latter document.

6. Estoppel $\hookrightarrow$ 52

"Estoppel" is a bar by which a man is precluded from denying a fact in consequence of his own previous action which has led another to so conduct himself that, if the truth were established, that other would suffer.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Estoppel".

7. Guaranty $\hookrightarrow$ 7(3)

A contract of guaranty executed in consideration of execution of lease, being absolute in form, was binding on guarantors without notice of acceptance.

8. Guaranty $\hookrightarrow$ 46(1)

Guarantors of lease were not entitled to notice of default by tenant where guarantors' agreement was to be performed without requiring any notice of any default from landlord.

9. Guaranty $\hookrightarrow$ 50

Guarantor on contract of guaranty executed in consideration of execution of lease was not relieved from liability by landlord's altering leased premises to suit convenience of new tenants secured by landlord after repossessing leased premises, where landlord's right to make such alterations was expressly provided for in the lease.

10. Guaranty $\hookrightarrow$ 27, 72

Where contract of guaranty executed in consideration of execution of lease was made at time agreement extending lease was executed, the three instruments would be considered as one instrument for purpose of interpretation, and guarantor would be deemed to have assented to provisions of the lease and agreement extending the lease.

11. Limitation of actions $\hookrightarrow$ 183(2)

An answer pleading as defense an entire section of a limitation statute which had two subdivisions did not sufficiently plead limitations. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 337, 458.

12. Limitation of actions $\hookrightarrow$ 184

The refusal of leave to plead bar of statute of limitations by way of amendment to an answer already filed is not an abuse of discretion, unless it appears that amendment will be in furtherance of justice.

13. Limitation of actions $\hookrightarrow$ 51(2)

Where plaintiff, by action on contract of guaranty executed in consideration of execution of lease, was seeking to enforce tenant's obligation, after landlord repossessed premises, to pay several installments of rent called for by terms of the lease, the installments would be barred by statute of limitations four years after their respective maturity and, hence, statute of limitations was an issue in the case. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 337, 458.

14. Limitation of actions $\hookrightarrow$ 184

Where statute of limitations would have been an issue in case if properly pleaded, and an attempt was made by defendant to plead statute, upon plaintiff's objection to plea of statute and defendant's request for leave to amend his plea, trial court should have exercised its discretion to determine whether granting or denying of defendant's application would be in furtherance of justice. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 337, 458.

15. Evidence ⇨35

California Supreme Court would take judicial notice of laws of New York.

Trial ⇨252(12)

In action on contract of guaranty executed in consideration of execution of lease, an instruction given at defendant's request which purported to inform jury as to rules of law of New York, the state where contract of guaranty, the lease and agreement extending lease were executed, was erroneous, in absence of any evidence involving such rules, and the error was prejudicial to plaintiff, where it appeared that jury might have been misled by such instruction into believing that defendant was released from his contract of guaranty by landlord's acts subsequent to its repossessing the leased premises.

Trial ⇨252(1)

An instruction, though couched in proper language, is improper if it finds no support in the evidence, and giving of it constitutes prejudicial error if it is calculated to mislead jury.

18. Appeal and error ⇨757(4)

Plaintiff was not precluded from requiring Supreme Court to consider alleged error in instruction on ground that plaintiff failed to comply with Supreme Court rule requiring that, when instructions are attacked as erroneous, all other instructions given, bearing upon that instruction, must be printed in full in brief, where defendant failed to call attention of Supreme Court to any other instructions which trial court gave bearing upon the subject matter, and examination of instructions given revealed none. Rules of Supreme Court, rule 8, subd. 3.

19. Appeal and error ⇨109

An appeal will not lie from an order denying motion for a judgment notwithstanding the verdict.

CURTIS, Justice.

Plaintiff, as the assignee of 11 West 42nd Street, Inc., a New York corporation (hereinafter referred to as the lessor or the corporation), instituted this action to recover from the defendant an amount alleged to have been due and unpaid under the terms of a certain lease and agreement executed by her assignor, as lessor, and one Albert De Windt, as lessee, and guaranteed by the defendant, George W. Stratton, and one Stanley E. Comstock. The property was described in the lease as two offices numbered 1454 and 1456 in a certain building situated in the city of New York. The term of the lease was for five years and two and one-half months beginning on February 16, 1929, and ending on April 30, 1934. The rental was $3,000 per year, payable $250 per month in advance on the first day of each month of the term, except as to the first month's rent, which was made payable on the signing of the lease. The evidence shows without any substantial conflict that such a lease was executed by the parties thereto at or about the first day of February, 1929. Thereafter the lessee, De Windt, concluded that he required additional room in which to carry on his business and began negotiating with the lessor for such additional space. The result of these negotiations was that on April 8, 1929, an agreement was entered into by the 11 West 42nd Street, Inc., the lessor, and De Windt, the lessee, whereby there was incorporated in the terms of the original lease additional rooms in said building, and in consideration thereof the rent was increased from the sum of $250 per month to the sum of $500 per month payable as provided in the original lease. Before entering into this agreement the corporation required that De Windt furnish responsible persons to guarantee the lease and on the date of the agreement, April 8, 1929, defendant Stratton and Stanley E. Comstock executed and delivered to the corporation the written guaranty upon which the plaintiff relies in support of her right to recover in this action. Said guaranty being in words and figures as follows:

"Annexed to and forming part of agreement dated April 8, 1929, between 11 West 42nd Street, Inc., as Landlord, and Albert De Windt, as Tenant, which agreement refers to lease dated February 1, 1929, between 11 West 42nd Street, Inc., as Landlord, and Albert De Windt, as Tenant.

"That in consideration of the landlord entering into the said agreement dated April 8, 1929, hereto annexed, and the sum of One (1) Dollar to each of us paid and other good and valuable considerations, receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, we do hereby jointly and severally covenant and agree, to and with 11 West 42nd Street, Inc., the said landlord above named, and the landlord's legal representatives, successors and assigns, that if default shall at any time be made by Albert De Windt, the said tenant, in the payment of the rent, or the performance of the covenants contained in the said lease dated February 1, 1929 and/or the said agreement dated April 8, 1929, hereto annexed, on the tenant's part to be paid and performed or should the landlord institute summary proceedings or any other action or proceedings for the recovery of the possession of the said premises, by reason of the nonpayment of the rent or otherwise, that we jointly and severally will well and truly pay the said rent or any arrears thereof, or any other sum or sums provided to be paid by the tenant under any of the terms of the said lease dated February 1, 1929, and the said agreement dated April 8, 1929, hereto annexed, that may remain due unto the said landlord or that may become due, and any or all damages that may arise in consequence of the non-performance of said covenants, or any of them, without requiring notice of any such default from the said landlord, and without requiring any proceedings to be taken against said tenant for the collection of said amount or amounts. This guarantee agreement is intended to apply to and to affect both the said lease dated February 1, 1929, and the said agreement dated April 8, 1929, hereto annexed."

After the execution of this written agreement and guaranty the lessee, De Windt, took possession of two additional rooms, Nos. 1446 and 1450, and paid the rent called for under this new agreement at irregular intervals until some time in September, 1929. The September rent not being paid, the corporation instituted proceedings to dispossess De Windt from the leased premises. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff in said action, and De Windt was evicted under said judgment and possession of the leased premises was restored to the corporation. On acquiring possession of the property under the judgment of eviction against De Windt, the corporation advertised it for rent and made all reasonable efforts to secure tenants for the property. In this it was only partially successful. Part of the time all the property was vacant, and at other times the corporation was successful in renting only a portion of it. In doing so, it was necessary for it to make certain alterations in the arrangement of the rooms covered by the lease so that they might be rented to, and occupied by, two or more tenants carrying on separate lines of business. The right to do so was expressly authorized by the terms of the lease. The lessee was given credit for all amounts received by the lessor as rental of the property, or of any part thereof, from the time it took possession thereof after the judgment of eviction against the lessee, until the termination of the lease. After giving the lessee credit for all payments of rent received during this period of time, a substantial amount was claimed by the lessor to be due and unpaid from the lessee, and as the defendant had guaranteed to "pay the said rent or any arrears thereof, or any other sum or sums provided to be paid by the tenant under any of the terms of the said lease dated February 1, 1929, and the said agreement dated April 8, 1929, hereto annexed," this action was brought to recover said amount.

Prior to the commencement of this action the lessor had assigned to the plaintiff its claim against the defendant.

the guaranty was joint and several, the action would lie against either or both of the guarantors. The amount claimed by plaintiff under her amended complaint to be due and unpaid under the lease is the sum of $11,835.17 together with interest on each installment "going to make up said amount at the rate of seven per cent (7%) per annum from the date upon which each installment was due and payable respectively, said interest to be computed up to and including the date of entry of judgment herein," and for costs and general relief. The amended complaint under which the action was tried, like the original complaint, is in two counts. In one count it is alleged that the total amount due under the entire lease from September 1, 1929, to the termination of the lease on April 1, 1934, was $28,000 and that the lessor had received from reletting the premises the sum of $16,164.83, leaving a balance due and unpaid of $11,835.17. The second count of the amended complaint is practically a restatement in a different form of the cause of action set out in the first count. The amount claimed in each count is the same. The only difference between the original complaint and the amended complaint is in the amount claimed to be due and unpaid. In the original complaint this amount is alleged to be $12,233.29 and in the amended complaint this amount is given as $11,835.17. The original complaint was filed March 30, 1937. (There is a slight difference of $2 between the allegations of the pleading and the evidence. This discrepancy will later appear in the discussion of certain issues in the case. This slight discrepancy is not material to any issue before us.)

Defendant by his answer to the amended complaint makes practically a general denial of all the allegations of the amended complaint; claims that the action is barred by the provisions of section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and sets up a number of affirmative defenses which will be given further consideration later in this opinion. At the close of the trial the case was submitted to the jury upon the pleadings, the evidence introduced in support thereof and the instructions to the jury. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the defendant, upon which the court entered its judgment, and from which the plaintiff has appealed, and in support thereof makes the following contentions:

(1) That the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict.

(2) That the defense of the statute of limitations is unavailable to defendant.

(3) That the giving of Instruction No. 27 was prejudicial error.

(4) That the judgment should be reversed with directions to enter judgment for the plaintiff.

The evidence on the part of plaintiff purports to show the due execution of the lease and the agreement by the lessor and the lessee, and the execution of the guaranty of the terms of the lease by the defendant, along with his co-guarantor, Comstock; that the lessee, De Windt, took possession of the leased premises pursuant to the terms of the lease and agreement; that he defaulted in the September, 1929, rent, and due to said default was evicted from the premises by the lessor; that upon such eviction the lessor repossessed the leased premises, and rented such parts thereof during the balance of the term of the lease, as it was able to obtain tenants therefor; and that after giving credit to the lessee for all amounts received by the lessor for the rental of said premises after the lessor took possession thereof, there remained due and unpaid at the commencement of this action from the lessee according to the lease the sum of $11,833.17, besides interest and costs.

Defendant offered no evidence in his defense except his own testimony. He did not purport to have any personal knowledge whatever of any dealings between the lessor and the lessee, after his guaranty had been executed and delivered; neither did he purport to know anything about the occupancy of the leased premises after the guaranty was executed. He visited the property only twice, on one occasion in the latter part of the year 1929. He did not see De Windt on that visit and he was informed either by the elevator man or the directory that De Windt had moved. He did not know whether the rooms were vacant or not, but he did not believe they were. His other visit to the premises was after the commencement of this action.

[2] Defendant contends however, that certain evidence in plaintiff's behalf was erroneously admitted, and that when this erroneously admitted evidence is excluded, the record fails to establish plaintiff's case. This criticism of plaintiff's evidence is particularly aimed at the testimony of the witness Scala, whose deposition was taken and introduced in evidence by the plaintiff at the trial of this action. Mr. Scala testified that he had charge of the rent and collection departments of the lessor, 11 West 42nd Street, Inc., and that the gross amount unpaid under the lease was $28,000 and the gross amount of all re-rentals and moneys received in connection with the leased premises was $16,166.83.

Evidence in proof of these two amounts was given by Mr. Scala as shown by the record as follows:

"Q. Will you state the amount unpaid? A. The amount unpaid under this lease in full is $11,833.17.

"Mr. Brewer: Objected to and move to strike as a conclusion of the witness, incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, no showing that he had any authority to show what the amount unpaid was.

"The Court: Be overruled. Denied.

"Q. What was the gross amount unpaid? A. $28,000.

"Q. What was the gross amount of all re-rentals and moneys received in connection with premises 1446-50, and 1454-56 between September 1, 1929 and April 30, 1934? A. $16,166.83."

In support of defendant's contention that the question calls for the conclusion of the witness, he cites Parker v. Otis, 130 Cal. 322, 331, 62 P. 571, 574, 927, 92 Am.St.Rep. 56, which holds that the question "Do you owe Otis & Co. any money?" is improper as it calls for a conclusion of the witness. But the question asked the witness Scala related to the amounts "paid" and "unpaid." Such questions call for facts and not conclusions. See Krieger v. Feeny, 14 Cal. App. 538, 112 P. 901; 20 Cal.Jur. p. 947, § 28; 21 Cal.Jur. p. 35, § 19.

[3] Defendant devotes many pages of his briefs and petitions to his attack upon the evidence of the witness Scala fixing the amounts received by the lessor, after taking possession of the leased premises upon the eviction of the lessee. He particularly assails his own Exhibit A so marked when received in evidence at the trial of this action. This exhibit was offered in evidence by the defendant, and marked Exhibit I for identification at the taking of the deposition of Mr. Scala. At the trial the defendant renewed his offer and the exhibit was admitted in evidence as defendant's Exhibit A without objection, and is entitled "Statement of Account, Albert De Windt, Tenant, George W. Stratton and Stan E. Comstock, guarantors" with a description of the leased premises. It purports to show the amount due under the lease from the date the lessor took possession of the leased property after the tenant's eviction until the end of the term, four years and eight months at $6,000 per year, amounting to the sum of $28,000. It further purports to show the amount received during this same period of time by the lessor as rental of the property from tenants procured by him after taking possession of the leased premises. This amount as shown by the exhibit was $16,166.83. The difference between these two amounts is $11,833.17, the amount claimed by plaintiff to be due and unpaid under the terms of the lease. Defendant now contends that the witness Scala knew nothing about the books of the lessor company, nor did he have any personal knowledge of the figures constituting said exhibit, and that his answers were based solely upon the figures contained in that exhibit. This contention might possibly have some merit, were it not for the fact that the defendant himself, both at the taking of the deposition of Scala and at the trial of this action, offered in evidence this statement of account, and the same was admitted in evidence without objection. This exhibit having been introduced in evidence by the defendant, he is bound by its provisions. Reclamation Dist. No. 70 v. Sherman, 11 Cal.App. 399, 419, 105 P. 277; Groves v. Jones, 252 Mich. 446, 448, 233 N.W. 375.

Furthermore, after this exhibit had been offered and received in evidence and at the close of the examination of Mr. Scala, he was asked by defendant's counsel the following questions, to which he gave the following answers:

"Q. So from tenants who occupy the same premises originally occupied by tenant De Windt, subsequent to the date of his dispossession, you have collected a total amount of how much money up to April 30, 1934? A. $16,166.83.

"Q. Based upon your records, Mr. Scala, over that same period of time how much have you charged up against Mr. De Windt as the gross amount? A. $28,000.00.

"Q. And crediting what you have collected, $16,166.83, you claim, I take it, that there is a balance due the 11 West 42 Street Inc. of how much? A. $11,833.17.

"Q. And does that $11,833.17 represent rent not paid? A. It represents the amount due from Mr. De Windt which has not been paid.

"Q. For rent only? A. Yes."

[4] Defendant next contends that the jury could have entirely disregarded the testimony of Scala as he was an employee of the plaintiff's assignor and because his evidence was not clear, but was incompetent and contradictory. As we have before noted, proof of the amount due plaintiff under the terms of the lease did not depend entirely upon the testimony of Scala, for the reason that defendant introduced in evidence the statement of account as his Exhibit A, and was therefore bound by its provisions. Defendant offered no evidence that in any manner discredited the statement of account or the evidence just quoted from the testimony of Mr. Scala. However, plaintiff introduced in evidence as her Exhibits 4 and 5, photostatic copies of the ledger of the lessor, which defendant contends show two items aggregating the sum of $5,700.04, for which no credit has been given Mr. De Windt on his rent account. We confess our inability to decipher these ledger sheets and satisfy ourselves as to their precise meaning in respect to the two items which the defendant questions. No explanation of their meaning is found in the record before us, nor does plaintiff's counsel attempt to explain either of these. Mr. Scala was not asked any question in regard to those two particular items. Defendant made no claim of any credit based upon these two items until his petition for a hearing in this court was filed. At the most, even if they should be allowed in defendant's favor, they would only reduce the amount due on the lease, and would not justify an affirmation of the judgment in defendant's favor, as there would still be a considerable amount due as rental under the lease after deducting the amount of these two items. However, it does not appear that this point was raised at the trial of this action, nor in the District Court of Appeal. Under these circumstances the question therein involved may not be considered by this court (2 Cal. Jur. p. 234; 2 McKinney's New Digest, p. 523, and cases cited in each of these publications) and for that reason we expressly decline to consider it.

In addition to the foregoing contention the defendant claims that there are other grounds why the evidence is sufficient to support the verdict of the jury. Some of these contentions are so technical and lacking in merit as not to justify any special attention. Others however, are of sufficient substance to warrant special discussion. In the main these contentions are put in issue by the affirmative defenses set forth in defendant's answer.

[5, 6] The first of these contentions is that the lease was not physically attached to the guaranty at the time defendant signed the latter document, and therefore he is released from any liability under the guaranty. The agreement of guaranty expressly refers to both the lease of date February 1, 1929, and the agreement of date April 8, 1929, and states that "This guarantee agreement is intended to apply to and affect both the said lease dated February 1, 1929, and the said agreement dated April 1, 1929, hereto annexed." It was signed by the defendant and his co-guarantor, Stanley E. Comstock. Defendant had prior to signing the guaranty been informed of its purpose. He knew at the time of signing the guaranty that the lessor in said lease had required that it be guaranteed before it would deliver the lease. To now permit the defendant after signing the guaranty, which recited that the lease and agreement were annexed thereto, to deny that they were so annexed would be to enable him to perpetrate a fraud of a most flagrant character. To put it mildly would be to hold that he is estopped to deny the plain and explicit terms of the solemn document which he voluntarily executed. Estoppel may be defined to be a bar by which a man is precluded from denying a fact in consequence of his own previous action which has led another to so conduct himself that, if the truth were established, that other would suffer. 10 Cal.Jur. p. 611.

[7, 8] Defendant further contends that the judgment should be affirmed because he was never notified of his acceptance by the lessor as a guarantor of the lease. The guaranty was absolute in form and bound defendant without notice of his acceptance. Thorpe v. Story, 10 Cal.2d 104, 117, 118, 73 P.2d 1194; Union Bank v. Coster's Ex'rs, 3 N.Y. 203, 212, 53 Am. Dec. 280; American Woolen Co. v. Moskowitz, 159 App.Div. 382, 144 N.Y.S. 532. Neither was defendant entitled to notice of the tenant's default. American Taximeter Co. v. Smith, App.Term, 199 N.Y. S. 578, 579; Webel v. Clark, 29 Misc. 329, 60 N.Y.S. 516; Brown v. Curtiss, 2 N.Y. 225. This is particularly so in the present case as the defendant's agreement of guaranty was to be performed "without requiring any notice of any such default from said landlord."

[9, 10] Defendant was not released from his liability under said guaranty by the lessor's altering the leased premises to suit the convenience of new tenants secured by the landlord after repossessing the leased premises. The lessor's right to make such alterations was expressly provided for in the lease. Defendant relies upon the case of Salomon v. Cawston Ostrich Farm, 43 Cal.App. 465, 185 P. 314, 315. There the lease contained no provision as does the lease now before us, permitting the lessor, on retaking possession of the leased premises, to make any physical changes and alterations. In that case, which was an action by the landlord against the guarantor of a lease of real property in the State of New York, we find it stated that "In New York, as well as in California, the obligations of the guarantor are strictly construed. Any change made by the person to whom performance is due in the subject to which the guaranty applies, without the knowledge or consent of the guarantor, releases the latter." Had the present lease contained no provision permitting changes and alterations in the building, the statement of the law just quoted would no doubt be controlling, but such is not the case. The language of the lease in respect to changes and alterations reads as follows: "In any such case or in any other case in which the Landlord shall resume possession of the demised premises by summary proceedings or otherwise, the Landlord at its option may repair, subdivide, alter or change the character of the demised premises from time to time as the Landlord shall deem best, may let the demised premises or any part or parts thereof for the whole or any part or parts of the residue of the original term hereof, and receive the rents therefor." With this provision in the lease it cannot be successfully contended that the changes and alterations which were made by the landlord were without the knowledge and consent of the lessee. The guaranty having been made at the time the agreement extending the lease was executed, the three instruments must for the purpose of interpretation of their meaning be considered as one instrument. Catskill Nat. Bank v. Dumary, 206 N.Y. 550, 100 N.E. 422, 424;

Reios v. Mardis, 18 Cal.App. 276, 281, 122 P. 1091. The defendant guarantor must therefore be deemed to have assented to their provisions. Smith v. Molleson, 148 N.Y. 241, 42 N.E. 669, 672; see, also, W. P. Fuller & Co. v. Alturas School District, 28 Cal.App. 609, 612, 613, 153 P. 743. In American Trust Co. v. Jones, 130 Cal.App. 651, 655, 20 P.2d 346, 347, we find it stated that "When, as here, the contract provides in advance for changes, substitutions, etc., they may be made in accordance with the terms of the guaranty and such acts do not release the guarantor."

A further contention is raised by defendant in support of the judgment in his favor that there is no proof that the landlord gave notice of intention to relet the leased premises for tenant's account and that such reletting was for a term greater than the lease, and accordingly the tenant and defendant were released thereby. This defense does not appear to have been made at the trial of the action. No instruction was asked or given upon this question. No reference to this defense is made in defendant's brief or in the petition for a rehearing filed in the District Court of Appeal, or in his petition for a hearing in this court. The first time this point was raised as near as we can ascertain from the record before us was in defendant's answer to plaintiff's supplemental brief filed herein after argument. Under the rule hereinbefore announced the absence of evidence that the landlord gave notice to the tenant of his intention to relet the leased premises will not be considered.

As we view the record in this case as discussed above, we find nothing therein which would justify the jury in returning a verdict in favor of the defendant, and it must therefore be held that the verdict finds no support in the evidence unless the questions hereinafter discussed lead to a different conclusion.

[11] We now come to the consideration of the statute of limitations. Defendant purported to plead the statute of limitations. The plaintiff claims that the statute is not available to defendant. The solution of this problem depends upon two contingencies—first, whether the statute was properly pleaded, and if not, should the court have permitted the defendant to so amend his answer as to properly plead the statute; and second, if the statute was properly pleaded or the plea thereof could have been amended so as to properly present such a plea, was it a bar to plaintiff's cause of action?

Defendant claims that plaintiff's cause of action is barred by the provision of section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure. His plea of the statute in his fifth separate defense in answer to plaintiff's amended complaint is as follows: "That the said amended complaint, and each of the causes of action therein, is barred by the provisions of the Statute of Limitations as found in section 337 * * * of the Code of Civil Procedure."

Section 458 of the same Code provides that the statute of limitations may be pleaded by stating "generally that the cause of action is barred by the provisions of section—(giving the number of the section and subdivision thereof, if it is so divided, relied upon) of the Code of Civil Procedure." Section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure contains two sections numbered 1 and 2. Subdivision 1 applies to contracts and similar obligations; subdivision 2 applies to book accounts, accounts stated, and current accounts.

Section 458 of the Code of Civil Procedure was first construed by this court in the case of Wolters v. Thomas, 3 Cal. Unrep. 843, 32 P. 565. It was there held that a plea of the statute of limitations, alleging that a cause of action is barred by the Code of Civil Procedure, section 339, is insufficient, since that statute contains several subdivisions. That case was followed by two decisions of the District Court of Appeal, Overton v. White, 1937, 18 Cal.App.2d 567, 64 P.2d 758, 65 P.2d 99 and Hart v. Slayman, 1939, 30 Cal.App.2d 556, 86 P.2d 861. In each of those cases the section under consideration was 337, the same section of the Code relied upon by the defendant in the present action. The section relied upon was pleaded, but no subdivision of the section was stated. The court in the case of Overton v. White, supra, went rather fully into the question as to whether the statute was correctly pleaded. After quoting quite fully from the case of Wolters v. Thomas, supra, the court held as follows [18 Cal.App.2d 567, 64 P.2d 761]: "In the instant case only the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 337 were applicable to the facts of the case. That section contains two subdivisions. The answer did not refer to the proper subdivision. It was not amended in the trial court. The objection of the insufficiency of the pleading was raised in the trial court. For these reasons the cases cited by defendant are distinguishable and are not controlling here. As the case of Wolters v. Thomas, supra, cannot be distinguished in principle from the instant case, and as it has not been overruled or modified, we feel it is controlling here, and consequently hold that the provisions of section 458 of the Code of Civil Procedure must be strictly applied, and that the attempted plea of the statute of limitations by defendant was insufficient to raise that issue in the trial court.

"It necessarily follows that the answer raised no issue and presented no defense. Therefore, the trial court properly granted plaintiff's motion for judgment on the pleadings and the judgment must be affirmed unless the trial court committed prejudicial error in refusing to permit defendant to amend his answer." A petition for hearing by this court was denied.

The case of Hart v. Slayman, supra, was decided by the same court two years after the decision in Overton v. White. It followed the latter case and its conclusion was that (30 Cal.App.2d at page 558, 86 P.2d at page 861) "As section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure contains two subdivisions, and as Slayman pleaded the section without pleading the subdivision relied upon by him, his answer did not present the defense of the bar of the statute of limitations, and that defense was waived."

While the plaintiff demurred to defendant's answer to the amended complaint, she did not demur to defendant's fifth separate defense, which, as we have seen, purported to set up the statute of limitations as a defense, nor did she in any manner by her demurrer raise the sufficiency of defendant's answer to the amended complaint to properly plead the statute of limitations. In Churchill v. Woodworth, 148 Cal. 669, 84 P. 155, 113 Am.St.Rep. 324, where the defendant attempted to plead the bar of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure, a section of the Code having two subdivisions, without stating the subdivision relied upon, it was held that the failure to raise the sufficiency of the plea of the statute was waived by failure to demur to such an answer. In so holding the court announced the rule in such cases as follows: (148 Cal. at page 676, 84 P. at page 158, 113 Am.St. Rep. 324) "No demurrer was interposed to the answer, which, for the purposes of the trial, was assumed to sufficiently present the defense, and the court made its findings thereon. Under these circumstances, we are satisfied that the attempt to plead subdivision 1 of section 339 should not be treated as a nullity, and that the objection to the manner of pleading it was waived by the failure of plaintiffs to urge such objection in the trial court." In Universal Sales Corp. v. California, etc., Mfg. Co., 20 Cal.2d 751, at page 773, 128 P.2d 665, at page 678, on the authority of Churchill v. Woodworth, it was held: "The rule as to the proper plea of the statute of limitations is not self-operating but depends for its enforcement on the diligence of the plaintiff in objecting to the insufficiency of the plea either by demurrer to the answer or by timely objection at the trial."

While, as we have seen, the plaintiff failed to demur to the fifth special defense in defendant's answer, which purported to set up the statute of limitations as a bar, she did object during the trial to the introduction of any evidence in support of said defense on the ground that the statute as pleaded presented no defense to said action. Again near the close of the trial the plaintiff asked to be heard upon the question of the statute of limitations, whereupon the trial judge stated that he did not think the matter of the statute of limitations could "be raised or the statute tolled. Therefore I am going to instruct the jury that the statute of limitations has no bearing on this matter." Counsel for defendant then asked the court if his intended action just stated was based upon the defect in the pleading, and the court replied: "No, that is based upon the entire record." Counsel for defendant then asked to amend this pleading "to designate the particular part of Section 337 intended to apply," but upon the objection of the plaintiff the request of defendant was denied. It thus appears that the plaintiff made timely objection to defendant's plea of the statute. Ordinarily we think the objections of plaintiff to the insufficiency of defendant's plea of the statute as just set forth rendered said plea ineffective for any purpose. In Overton v. White, supra, 18 Cal.App.2d 567, at page 574, 64 P.2d 758, at page 761, 65 P.2d 99, in considering an identical situation as that before us, the court held: "The answer did not refer to the proper subdivision. It was not amended in the trial court. The objection of the insufficiency of the pleading was raised in the trial court. * * * It necessarily follows that the answer raised no issue and presented no defense."

[12] It does not appear in this last-cited case that any request was made to amend the answer, while in the present case such a request was made and denied by the court. A refusal by the court for permission to amend an answer for the purpose of interposing the defense of the statute of limitations has been held not to be an abuse of the court's discretion. Rudd v. Byrnes, 156 Cal. 636, 105 P. 957, 26 L.R.A., N.S., 134, 20 Ann.Cas. 124; Cooke v. Spears, 2 Cal. 409, 56 Am.Dec. 348; Wells, Fargo & Co. v. McCarthy, 5 Cal.App. 301, 90 P. 203. In the first of these three cases, it was held: (156 Cal. at page 638, 105 P. at page 958, 26 L.R.A., N.S., 134, 20 Ann. Cas. 124) "This court, very early in its history, established the rule that the refusal of leave to plead the bar of the statute of limitations by way of amendment to an answer already filed will not be regarded as an abuse of discretion, unless it is made to appear that the amendment will be in furtherance of justice."

In the early case of Cooke v. Spears, supra, 2 Cal. 409, at page 412, 56 Am.Dec. 348, we find the rule stated as follows: "If the statute of limitations had been pleaded in the first instance, there would have been no ground to have objected to it, and the Court would have had no legal discretion to have ordered it to be stricken out. But having been omitted, when the application to amend was made, the first question certainly presented was, Will it be in the furtherance of justice? Such is the language of the statute. Such clearly was the intent of the law."

Those authorities, and particularly the language in Cooke v. Spears just quoted, hold that the trial court may in its discretion and in furtherance of justice deny applications to amend an answer by setting up the bar of the statute of limitations. However, the trial court in the instant action did not deny defendant's application to amend on the ground that it would not be in the interest of justice to permit such an amendment, but because "the statute of limitations has no bearing upon this case." In line with this statement that the statute of limitations has no bearing upon this case, the court later instructed the jury "that the statute of limitations is not an issue in this case and that you are to disregard the defendant's attempt to plead the statute of limitations as a defense." It thus appears that the trial court did not base its denial of defendant's application to amend his answer on the ground that such amendment would not be in furtherance of justice, but upon the ground that the statute of limitations had no bearing upon the case.

Whether the statute of limitations was an issue before the court and therefore had a bearing upon the case depended upon the terms of the lease, and the nature and character of the present action. It is contended by plaintiff that by the terms of the lease the lessor could wait until the termination of the lease, and then sue for damages for the lessee's failure to comply with the terms of the lease, or the lessor was given the right to sue the lessee after the former had taken possession of the leased premises as the monthly payments became due. Whether these two independent remedies were available to the plaintiff becomes immaterial and of no consequence in view of the nature and character of the present action.

The amended complaint as well as the original complaint, besides alleging the execution and delivery of the agreement of guaranty, also alleges the execution of the lease and the agreement of April 8, 1929; the breach of the terms of the lease and agreement by the defendant, the repossession of the leased premises by the lessor, and the reletting of certain portions thereof, after making alterations under the terms of the lease. By Paragraph VIII of the first cause of action it is alleged:

"VIII

"That under and by virtue of the terms of said lease and said agreement referred to in Paragraphs II and IV respectively hereof, a monthly installment of Five Hundred Dollars ($500) as rental became due to and owing to 11 West 42nd Street, Inc., a corporation, on September 1, 1929, and additional installments of Five Hundred Dollars ($500) each have fallen due on the first day of each and every month thereafter, up to and including the first day of April, 1934, or a total amount in the sum of Twenty-eight Thousand Dollars ($28,000)."

It is then alleged that the sum of $16,166.83 had been received by reason of reletting, and that the same has been credited to defendant's account.

Paragraphs X and XII of said first cause of action are as follows:

"X

"That there is now due, owing and unpaid from defendant herein, under and by virtue of the terms of said Exhibit 'A' and said lease and said agreement, referred to in Paragraphs II and IV respectively hereof, the sum of Eleven Thousand Eight Hundred and Thirty-five and 17/100 Dollars ($11,835.17) on account of rental as aforesaid, together with interest on each installment going to make up said amount at the rate of seven per cent (7%) per annum from the date upon which each installment was due and payable respectively."

"XII

"That at all times herein mentioned, said lease and said agreement, referred to in Paragraphs II and IV respectively hereof, were in full force and effect; that at all times herein mentioned, said Exhibit 'A' was and still is in full force and effect; that said 11 West 42nd Street, Inc., a corporation, has performed all the terms and conditions on its part to be performed under and by virtue of the terms of said lease and said agreement referred to herein."

Somewhat similar allegations are made in the second cause of action. The prayer of the amended complaint is for judgment in the sum of $11,835.17 together with interest on each installment at 7 per cent per annum from the date of each installment respectively. The pleadings of plaintiff contain no allegations of damage whatever. It would be difficult indeed, allowing the utmost liberality in its construction, to hold that such a pleading is one sounding in damages and not upon contract. What different language could be used in order to state a cause of action upon a contract? It is alleged in the amended complaint that there is due and unpaid "interest on each installment going to make up said amount [$11,835.17] at the rate of seven per cent (7%) per annum from the date upon which each installment was due and payable respectively." No interest would be payable on any of these installments of rent until the particular installment became due, that is, until it matured, and an action to collect the same would be barred four years after its maturity.

In the case of Tillson v. Peters, 41 Cal. App.2d 671, 107 P.2d 434, a similar pleading was before the court. That action, like the present one, was to collect the balance due on the lease of real property.

It was there contended, as plaintiff contends here, that his action was not barred as it was brought within four years after the termination of the lease. In answer to the contention, 41 Cal.App.2d at pages 674, 675, 107 P.2d at page 436, of the opinion the court said: "If the rent became due in monthly installments, which the uncontradicted evidence shows that it did, the right of action accrued upon each installment of rent when it became due, and the statute of limitations began to run on each monthly installment of rent from such dates. Lee v. De Forest, 22 Cal.App.2d 351, 360, 71 P.2d 285; sec. 1947, Civ.Code; 15 Cal.Jur. 723, sec. 133. The plaintiff, no doubt, alleged that $1,625 rental for the premises was due for the five-year period from April 1, 1931, to April 1, 1936, so as to avoid the effect of the statute of limitations. If that were all that he alleged, the complaint might be deemed to state a good cause of action in assumpsit, on the theory that the rent was really not due until the end of the term specified. But he further alleges that there was $700 interest due on deferred installments of rent, which refutes the theory that the rent was due only at the termination of the contract." The amended complaint in this case is more specific in its allegations than was the pleading in the cited case, for, as we have seen by Paragraph VIII, it is expressly alleged that monthly installments of rent became due and owing on each and every month after September 1, 1929, the month during which the lessor repossessed the leased premises.

[13, 14] From the foregoing we can arrive at no other conclusion than that the plaintiff by her present action seeks to enforce the obligation of the tenant, after the landlord repossessed the leased premises, to pay at the times fixed by the lease the several installments of rent called for by the terms of the lease. These installments of rent, as noted above, would be barred by the statute of limitations four years after their respective maturity, provided the statute had been properly pleaded. The statute of limitations was therefore an issue in the case, and if properly pleaded would have been a bar to the recovery of any installment of rent which accrued more than four years before the commencement of this action. An attempt had been made to plead the statute. Upon plaintiff's objection to the plea of the statute, the defendant asked leave to amend his plea. It was within the discretion of the court to grant or deny said request, basing its action upon whether the application to amend would be in furtherance of justice. Instead of exercising such discretion, as we have seen, the court denied the application on a ground which we have held to be erroneous and untenable. Its action therefore cannot be approved. As the judgment in this case for other reasons must be reversed and the case remanded for a new trial, the court upon a retrial may then rule upon the defendant's application to amend its plea of the statute of limitations, and in so ruling decide whether in the opinion of the court the granting of said application would be in furtherance of justice.

[15, 17] We now come to the consideration of Instruction No. 27 given by the court at the request of the defendant. This instruction purports to inform the jury as to the rules of law of the State of New York, the state where the contract of guaranty involved was executed as well as the lease and agreement annexed to the guaranty of which laws the courts of this state take judicial notice. Said instruction consists of fourteen different rules of law. While from a strictly legal approach each of these rules of law is correctly stated, in our opinion probably only one of them is applicable to the facts in this case. The first of these rules reads as follows: "The guarantor is discharged from liability if there is any alteration in the contract guaranteed." Nos. 2 and 4 of these rules as set forth in this instruction are along the same line as Rule No. 1 just quoted. We agree with plaintiff that "one searches the record in vain to discover even the remotest hint of any modifying of the contract between the landlord and De Windt." The same observation may be made in respect to Rules Nos. 6 (extension of time for performance discharges guarantor), No. 7 (reduction of rental payments by landlord discharges guarantor), No. 9 (assignment of lease by lessee discharges guarantor), No. 13 (unnecessary delay upon part of creditor in bringing action for money due discharges guarantor), and No. 14 (a debtor has the right to direct how payments on debt shall be applied). Rules Nos. 5 and 8 refer to a change by the person to whom performance is due in the subject to which the guaranty applies without the knowledge of the guarantor, or which substitutes a guaranty of another's contract releasing the guarantor from liability. We find not a scintilla of evidence which involves either of these rules. With the exception of Rule 3, which provides that contracts of guaranty are strictly construed in favor of the guarantor, we find no evidence in the record of this case which relates to any of the various propositions of law set forth in this instruction or which would make any of them applicable to any issue before us.

The defendant made but a feeble attempt to justify the giving of this instruction. He maintains however, that even if the instruction was erroneous, it was not prejudicial to the plaintiff. In this claim we cannot agree. It will be noted that the instruction refers in at least two instances "to any change in the subject to which the guaranty applies" under the conditions therein set out, which could release the guarantor. The evidence shows that changes and alterations were made in the leased premises, but they were permitted by the lease. This instruction also contains a statement that reduction of rental payments by the landlord discharges the guarantor. The evidence shows that the landlord was forced to lower the rent on repossession of his property, but that the right to do so was expressly given him by the terms of the lease. Under these conditions, as well as others, of like kind which might be mentioned, we think the jury may well have been confused by this instruction and misled into believing that the defendant was released from his contract of guaranty by the acts of the landlord subsequent to the latter repossessing the leased premises. Even though an instruction is couched in proper language it is improper, if it finds no support in the evidence, and the giving of it constitutes prejudicial error if it is calculated to mislead the jury. 24 Cal.Jur. p. 830, § 95, and the authorities there cited.

[18] Defendant further contends that this court should refuse to consider any error in the giving of said instruction for the reason that plaintiff failed to comply with subdivision 3 of Rule VIII of the Rules of this Court then in effect, which required that when "instructions given to a jury are attacked as erroneous, all other instructions given, bearing upon that subject, must be printed in full in the appellant's brief." As already stated, Instruction No. 27 relates entirely to the law of the State of New York which the court in this action was required to take judicial notice of, and which, if applicable to any issue in the present action, "the jury was bound to accept as given to you by this court." The basis for the giving of this instruction was the fact that the contract of guaranty, as well as the lease and agreement, was executed in the State of New York. While plaintiff in her opening brief did not print any other instructions, the defendant has not called to our attention any other instruction which the court gave bearing upon the law of the State of New York upon any question involved in this action. We have examined the instructions given by the court in this action, and we find no instruction except Instruction No. 27 which in any way refers to the laws of the State of New York, or bears upon "the duty of the jury to accept them as given to you by the court." In these circumstances we do not feel that the plaintiff should be precluded from requiring the court to consider the error in said instruction.

In view of what has been said in respect to the plea of the statute of limitations, it is apparent that in the condition in which the case now stands, no direction should be made at this time to the trial court requiring it to render judgment in favor of the plaintiff, even if this court had the power in this case which was tried by a jury, to make such an order. If the trial court should grant leave to the defendant to amend its answer by stating the subdivision of section 337, Code of Civil Procedure, upon which he relies as a bar to plaintiff's cause of action, it would then be necessary to determine what portions of plaintiff's claim are barred by the statute. On the other hand, if the trial court should deny defendant's application to amend its answer, a different result entirely would follow. Whatever determination we might make as to the power of the court to direct a verdict in an action of this character would be without the issues as now before the court. For this reason it is proper that the decision on this question be reserved until it is before us as a justiciable issue.

[19] Plaintiff also made a motion for a judgment notwithstanding the verdict of the jury. Assuming that she had previously made a proper motion for a directed verdict which the court denied, due to the condition of the record in respect to the plea of the statute of limitations it was not error to deny said motion. Plaintiff has attempted to appeal from the order denying her motion for a judgment notwithstanding ing the verdict. As no appeal lies from said order, the purported appeal therefrom is dismissed.

The judgment is reversed.

SHENK, EDMONDS, and CARTER, JJ., concur.

SCHAUER, Justice.

I concur in the judgment of reversal, and generally in the opinion prepared by Mr. Justice CURTIS, but subject to the following qualifications:

1. I am not in accord with the discussion relative to the discretion of the trial court to either grant or deny, upon the record in this case, defendant's request for permission to amend the form of his pleading of the statute of limitations as a defense. His fifth separate defense alleges "That the said amended complaint, and each of the causes of action therein, is barred by the provisions of the Statute of Limitations as found in Sections 337 and 361 of the Code of Civil Procedure." This plea does not state the applicable subdivision of section 337 as required by section 458 of the same code. (Section 361 is not here involved.) But the latter section (§ 458) is merely permissive and directory in form. Recognizing the strict construction and application accorded that section in Wolters v. Thomas (1893), 3 Cal.Unrep. 843, 32 P. 565, Overton v. White (1937), 18 Cal.App.2d 567, 64 P.2d 758, 65 P.2d 99, and Hart v. Slayman (1939), 30 Cal.App.2d 556, 86 P.2d 861, it still does not follow that the pleading of the section by number without specification of the pertinent subdivision is a complete nullity. In Churchill v. Woodworth, (1906), 148 Cal. 669, 676, 84 P. 155, 113 Am. St.Rep. 324, section 339, which contains two subdivisions, was pleaded without specification of the subdivision relied on. No objection to the pleading, by demurrer or otherwise, was urged in the trial court. It was held that objection to the form or sufficiency of such pleading could not be raised for the first time upon appeal and that such pleading "should not be treated as a nullity." In Universal Sales Corp. v. California, etc., Mfg. Co., (1942), 20 Cal.2d 751, 773, 128 P.2d 665, 678, Mr. Justice Curtis, speaking for this court, cited the Churchill case and declared, "The rule as to the proper plea of the statute of limitations is not self-operating but depends for its enforcement on the diligence of the plaintiff in objecting to the insufficiency of the plea either by demurrer to the answer or by timely objection at the trial."

In the case at bar plaintiff demurred to the answer, attacking specifically the first, second, sixth, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth separate defenses. No objection by demurrer was taken to the form or substance of the fifth separate defense above quoted. After the trial was entered upon, plaintiff objected orally to consideration of that defense. Under the circumstances, since the pleading of the statute was not a nullity, the objection necessarily went to the form of the pleading rather than, strictly, to its substance. In response to such objection defendant asked leave to amend the pleading by inserting the subdivision he relied upon. This was not a request for leave to amend to initially plead the statute as a defense—it had already been pleaded sufficiently in the absence of objection—but was a mere request, as timely as was the objection, to amend the form to cure the defect pointed out by the objection. The trial court refused to permit the amendment and refused to submit to the jury the issues raised by the plea. Both rulings were in my opinion erroneous.

In making such rulings the court disavowed the defect in the pleading as a ground thereof and declared that it so ruled because "the statute of limitations has no bearing upon this case." That position is untenable. The statute pleaded appears to be a meritorious defense to at least a part of the cause of action sued upon. The court should have considered defendant's request for leave to amend upon its merits, and, in the circumstances shown, it was an abuse of discretion not to grant such request and thereupon submit the issues to the jury.

2. By concurring generally in the opinion otherwise than as stated above I intend no implication that the contract sued upon gives to the plaintiff an option to await the end of the term of the lease and then to sue for damages for breach of the lease. The cause of action pleaded, as stated by Mr. Justice Curtis, admits of "no other conclusion than that the plaintiff by her present action seeks to enforce the obligation of the tenant [and of the guarantor], after the landlord repossessed the leased premises, to pay at the times fixed by the lease the several instalments of rent called for by the terms of the lease." Therefore the claim of the plaintiff, urged in her briefs, that she had such an option, and the contrary contention of the defendant that under the provisions of paragraph twenty-first of the lease the several installments of rental, insofar as they were delinquent, became due absolutely and in any event "at the times herein fixed for the payment of the several installments of rent," are not necessarily before us for decision on this appeal, and for that reason we make no determination of such conflicting claims.

CALIFORNIA EMPLOYMENT STABILIZATION COMMISSION v. WALTERS et al.

No. 12597.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

May 26, 1944.

Hearing Denied July 24, 1944.

1. Partnership ⚡22

A partnership may be established although the parties may not have used the word partner or partnership.

2. Partnership ⚡22

It is not essential that the parties should have known that their contract created a partnership.

3. Partnership ⚡17

It is the intent to do the things which creates a partnership that usually determines whether the relationship exists between the parties.

4. Partnership ⚡22

That agreement failed to provide how losses should be shared did not prevent constitution of partnership, since an agreement to divide profits implies an agreement for corresponding division of losses.

5. Partnership ⚡263

That two partners withdrew did not destroy legal status of partnership which parties had agreed should endure for a specified time.

6. Evidence ⚡455

That plaintiff questioned meaning of certain words in partnership agreement showed that the agreement was ambiguous so as to permit parol evidence by defendants to clear up ambiguity.

7. Partnership ⚡55

In action to recover unemployment contributions, evidence showed that defendants constituted a partnership, and hence were not liable for such contributions. California Unemployment Insurance Act, St.1935, p. 1226, as amended.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; Wm. F. James, Judge.

Action by California Employment Stabilization Commission, successor to the California Employment Commission, formerly Unemployment Reserves Commission, against Eda H. Walters, individually and doing business as the Big Basin Inn and others, to recover certain sums of money alleged to be due as compensation, interest and penalties under the California Unemployment Insurance Act. From a judgment for defendants, the plaintiff appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., and Clarence A. Linn, Deputy Atty. Gen. (Forrest M. Hill and Ralph R. Planteen, both of Sacramento, of counsel), for appellant.

Carroll S. Bucher, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, Justice.

Plaintiff brought this action to recover certain sums of money alleged to be due as contributions, interest and penalties under the provisions of the California Unemployment Insurance Act, St.1935, p. 1226, as amended. The sole issue the trial court was called upon to decide was whether during the year 1937 the Big Basin Inn, in California Redwood Park, and the concessions connected therewith, were operated under an arrangement constituting a partnership. If it was, then admittedly defendant was not subject to payment of the contributions provided for in the act.

The cause was tried twice. The judge before whom it was tried first, after hearing the evidence, held that a partnership existed; but subsequently he was stricken with fatal illness and his death prevented the signing of the findings. The judge before whom the case was tried the second time reached the same conclusion and made findings to that effect. From the judgment entered thereon plaintiff appeals.

The material facts are these: For more than ten years preceding January 1, 1937, the defendant, Mrs. Walters, operated the Inn and the concessions connected therewith, under a lease from the state which by its terms expired on December 31, 1937; and at the end of 1936 she concluded she would not ask for a renewal of the lease. The open season began May first of each year and ran on into the fall. Prior to 1937 most of the twenty-five or more persons Mrs. Walters had employed to assist in carrying on the business had been with her each year for several years, some of them being students and teachers on vacation. Mrs. Walters owned the equipment in the Inn, and each year the resort and the concession had been operated at a substantial profit. At the beginning of the year 1937 Mrs. Walters decided to show her appreciation for the faithful and efficient services of those who had theretofore assisted in the successful operation of the business by inviting them to join with her in an agreement to operate the business for the remaining year of the lease and to divide the profits in proportion to the salaries theretofore received by them. An agreement was prepared and signed to that effect. It bore the title "Co-operative Agreement." Mrs. Walters was referred to therein as the proprietor, and the other parties as "persons heretofore designated as 'Employees'"; and the agreement provided as follows: that "the net earnings realized from the operation of the hotel, store, lunchroom and other concessions * * * shall be divided between the persons whose names appear on sheet attached hereto marked Page 2, in the proportion representing a percentage based on the total salary or earnings of each employee for the year 1937. Net earnings shall be construed as meaning the gross earnings or income from all operating sources less cost of merchandise sold and less operating expenses including supplies, salaries, wages, insurance, taxes, interest, depreciation and all other charges or unusual expenses incident to the operation of all the various units or concessions." The substance of the third and final paragraph of the agreement was that the parties thereto were given the privilege of requesting and receiving monthly or semi-monthly the amounts accruing to them to that date on the basis of the minimum salaries shown on page two of the agreement. The agreement was drawn prior to April 15, 1937, and signed at that time by Mrs. Walters and about twelve of the other parties thereto who began work at that time in preparing the Inn and the concessions for the opening of the season; and it was signed by the remaining parties as they reported for work during the progress of the season. Page 2 of the agreement set forth the names of the parties, the character of the work they performed and the amounts of monthly salaries to be used as the basis for the division of the profits. The first name on the list was Mrs. Walters—occupation department "manager," minimum monthly salary $150; the next was Frank Harkins—outside manager, salary $150; the third was Kwock Sing—"Chef Hotel," salary $200; the fourth was Jim Yuen—"2nd Chef Hotel," salary $175; and so on down the entire list of names.

Before the season opened Mrs. Walters notified plaintiff commission by letter of the intention to operate the resort under the plan mentioned, and she sent enclosed a copy of the agreement, with the request that if it had not been properly drawn to send a form of an agreement that would be satisfactory to the commission. In reply the commission wrote that it would send a man down to investigate; but it never did; so the resort was opened and throughout the 1937 season was operated and managed pursuant to the provisions of the agreement by a committee of the workers selected by them.

At the end of the season a profit and loss sheet was prepared showing the names and occupations of those who had signed the agreement and carried on the business, and the dates on which their services began and ended; the minimum salaries used as a basis for the division of the profits, and the total amount received by each. For example, it shows that the chef worked five months, and that his share of the net earnings amounted to $1,000 plus $248, or a total of $1,248.

The findings of the trial court were that the individuals signing said agreement "did intend to and did enter into a partnership with Eda H. Walters for the operation of said Big Basin Inn for the year 1937"; that "said agreement did establish a partnership between Eda H. Walters and the aforementioned individuals and that said Eda H. Walters and the individuals signing said agreement were partners"; that "the individuals signing said partnership agreement received as partners the same proportionate rate per month in 1937 as they had in previous years"; that "at the end of the 1937 season, each of said partners received, in addition to the above-mentioned rate, a certain amount which was derived from the net earnings of the Big Basin Inn for the season of 1937"; and that "the defendant Eda H. Walters received no more and no less than her proportionate share for the year 1937, as a partner." It is our opinion that the evidence sustains the foregoing findings.

[1-4] In support of the appeal plaintiff stresses the fact that the word "partnership" was not used in framing the agreement. It is held, however, that the existence of a partnership may be established although the parties may not have used the words "partner" or "partnership"; nor is it essential that the parties should have known that their contract in law created a partnership. 20 Cal.Jur. p. 686. It is the intent to do the things which constitute a partnership that usually determines whether or not that relationship exists between the parties. Associated Piping, etc., Co., Ltd., v. Jones, 17 Cal.App.2d 107, 61 P.2d 536. Nor does it matter, as plaintiff contends, that the agreement failed to provide for a share of the losses, for it is well settled that an agreement to divide profits implies an agreement for corresponding division of losses. San Joaquin L. & P. Corp. v. Costaloupes, 96 Cal.App. 322, 274 P. 84; see also cases cited in 20 Cal.Jur. at p. 692.

Plaintiff argues that there was a want of "community right of management" and an absence of equal powers of representation; but the evidence shows to the contrary, for as already pointed out the business was conducted under the management of a committee of the parties to the agreement selected by them. The fact that Mrs. Walters was the owner of the equipment is unimportant for the reason that the partnership arrangement pertained only to the operation of the business. It does not appear whether or not a charge was made by Mrs. Walters for the use of the equipment; however, if such charge was made as an expense of the operation of the business it would tend to serve as further support for the conclusion that a partnership existed.

[5] Two of the parties who signed the agreement quit before the season was over, but their withdrawal did not destroy the legal status of the partnership, for the rule is that where as here parties have contracted as to the duration of the business, the withdrawal of a member or breach of the agreement does not effect a dissolution as to the copartners. 20 Cal.Jur. p. 795.

[6,7] Plaintiff further contends that the written agreement was unambiguous and that therefore the trial court erroneously admitted parol evidence. The very fact, however, that plaintiff questioned the meaning of certain words and clauses used in framing the agreement in itself shows that it was ambiguous. Body-Steffner Co. v. Flotill Products, Inc., 63 Cal.App.2d 555, 147 P.2d 84. It is quite evident that the agreement was not skillfully drawn, which doubtless accounts for the ambiguity; and since it was ambiguous the determination of the question of whether a partnership existed became one of fact upon which the court was justified in admitting parol evidence.

The remaining points urged by plaintiff are without merit and do not require special notice.

The judgment is affirmed.

MIRICH v. UNDERWRITERS AT LLOYD'S LONDON.

Civ. 14149.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 3, California.

Hearing Denied July 20, 1944.

I. Insurance $\approx$ 285½

Where physician signed application for liability policy containing statement that he had not been sued or paid any sums for claims for malpractice, error, or mistake, but listed one claim as an exception, the statement constituted a positive representation that the applicant had been sued but once and had paid no claim except the one.

2. Insurance ⇨285½

False statement in physician's application for liability policy regarding his experience with malpractice suits and claims, and insurer's reliance thereon in ignorance of the true facts, warranted insurer in rescinding the policy when it became acquainted with the facts, since it was a representation as to a material fact.

3. Insurance ⇨670

Where physician making application for liability policy made false statement regarding his experience with malpractice suits and claims, purported finding that it was not true that the statement was false and untrue and was known by insured to be false and untrue did not negative the falsity of the statement, for purpose of determining insurer's right to rescind the policy.

4. Insurance ⇨665(3)

In action involving question of insurer's right to rescind liability policy because of insured's false statement regarding his experience with malpractice suits and claims, evidence sustained finding that insured had been sued many times and had full knowledge of the suits.

5. Insurance ⇨665(3)

In action involving question of insurer's right to rescind liability policy because of false statement in insured's application regarding his experience with malpractice suits and claims, evidence did not sustain finding that insurer was not deceived by the statement.

6. Appeal and error ⇨1071(1)

Where a finding establishes the existence of a fact from which plaintiff's right to recover flows as a matter of law and another finding is to the effect that the fact does not exist, and there is substantial evidence to support both findings, a reviewing court is obliged to reverse a judgment in favor of either party.

7. Appeal and error ⇨1122(2)

In action involving question of insurer's right to rescind liability policy because of insured's false statement in application, where one set of findings would support judgment for insured's judgment creditors and another set of findings would support judgment for insurer but evidence would support only findings in favor of insurer, reviewing court would not reverse a judgment for insurer, but would make findings in accordance with the facts established by uncontradicted evidence and set aside unsupported findings of trial court. Code Civ.Proc. § 956a.

8. Insurance ⇨670

Finding that statement in application for liability policy was false, that insurer was ignorant of true facts, and that insurer relied on the statement in issuing the policy, supported judgment for insurer which defended on ground that it had rescinded policy.

9. Insurance ⇨285½

Where insured made false statement in application for liability policy and insurer was ignorant of the true facts and relied upon the statement in issuing policy, insurer was entitled to rescind the policy regardless of whether the omission to state true facts was intentional. St.1935, p. 505, § 331.

10. Insurance ⇨388(5)

The defense by an insurer of an action against insured, without knowledge that policy was procured by insured by means of fraud, does not preclude the insurer from rescinding the policy on discovering the truth.

11. Estoppel ⇨54

One of the essential elements of estoppel and waiver is knowledge of the facts.

12. Insurance ⇨388(3)

There can be no waiver of right to charge fraud, misrepresentation, or breach of warranty except by acts and conduct subsequent to discovery of the facts, and by conduct evidencing an actual intent to relinquish a right.

13. Estoppel ⇨104

One who by his misrepresentation induces another to take action, to the latter's prejudice, cannot rely upon the action taken to relieve him of the consequences of his deceit.

14. Insurance ⇨388(5)

Where insured obtained liability policy by making false statements in application and insurer discovered truth while its attorney was engaged in defense of action against insured, fact that attorney continued with case until it was finished did not constitute a waiver by insurer of its right to rescind policy, in view of fact that it gave notice of rescission immediately after trial and as soon as it was in a position to do so.

15. Attorney and client ☞112

Insurer's attorney who had assumed obligation of defending action against insured would not have right to abandon it in midst of trial against insured.

16. Insurance ☞311(1)

Where insured had obtained liability policy by false statement, right of insured's judgment creditor to recover on the policy could be no better than that of the insured. St.1935, p. 505, § 331.

17. Insurance ☞377(2)

Where insured obtained liability policy through false statement in application regarding his experience with malpractice suits and claims, the fact that insurer could have discovered the suits against insured by examination of court records did not preclude insurer from rescinding policy on theory that it was deemed to have had knowledge of the suits.

18. Contracts ☞94(5)

One who is induced to enter into a contract by positive representations of fact is under no duty to inquire as to truth of representations unless he is made aware of facts which brings them under suspicion and which would induce a prudent man to make inquiry.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ruben S. Schmidt, Judge.

Action by Doreen Mirich, a minor, by Morris Mirich, her guardian ad litem, against the Underwriters at Lloyd's London on a policy to collect unpaid amount of a judgment for malpractice against insured. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Phillip W. Silver, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Lasher B. Gallagher and Joseph F. Rank, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHINN, Justice.

Plaintiff recovered a judgment against William E. Balsinger for malpractice in the sum of $3850, of which amount she was able to collect only $313. Dr. Balsinger was insured by defendant herein under a policy which ran in favor of any person who might obtain judgment against him within its indemnity provisions. Plaintiff brought the present suit on the policy to collect the unpaid amount of her judgment. The company in its defense alleged that Dr. Balsinger had obtained the policy by means of false statements in his application and that it had been rescinded by the company for fraud, concealment and misrepresentation. Upon the trial the court made conflicting findings upon this defense but rendered judgment for plaintiff for the balance of her judgment against Dr. Balsinger. Defendant made a motion under section 663 of the Code of Civil Procedure for the entry of another and different judgment on the findings. In ruling upon this motion the court ordered stricken from the findings all conclusions of law, and amended the conclusions of law to call for a judgment in favor of defendant. A new judgment was entered in defendant's favor and plaintiff appeals from this judgment.

The first question in order is whether the judgment is sustained by the findings. The case hinged upon the defense that the policy had been rescinded for fraud, concealment, and misrepresentation. For brevity we shall refer to it as the defense of fraud and as embracing unintentional as well as intentional concealment. There is an irreconcilable conflict between general findings on the issue of fraud and the findings as to specific facts bearing upon the alleged fraud. The court found specifically that Dr. Balsinger signed an application for the policy, reading in part as follows: "12. I have not been sued or paid any sums for claims made against me for malpractice, error or mistake except as follows: 1 claim—7 yrs ago—U. S. F. & G. * * * 15. Remarks: The Doctor remodeled a woman's nose—and told her to return for treatment, she did not and was dissatisfied with the work. She then sued—and case was settled out of court for $200.00." It was found that before the application was signed, Dr. Balsinger had been sued for malpractice three times in Illinois, three times in the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, and once by cross-complaint in the Municipal Court of the City of Los Angeles, that two of the superior court actions had been decided in favor of Dr. Balsinger, that the third had been settled by his insurer, and that the municipal court suit had been settled by offsetting Dr. Balsinger's claim for services rendered against the patient's claim for damages. It was found that Dr. Balsinger knew of all of these suits and had filed answers in them, but mentioned none of them in his application. It was further found that defendant had no knowledge or information as to any of these suits at the time the policy was issued; that it learned of them during the trial of plaintiff's action against Dr. Balsinger and that it then gave notice of rescission of the policy and tendered return of the premium that had been paid. Notwithstanding these findings the court also found that it was not true that the statement in the application respecting claims and suits "was false and untrue and was known by said William E. Balsinger to be false and untrue"; that it was not true that the answer was made knowingly and with the intent that the defendant herein would be deceived thereby; that it was not true that the defendant was deceived thereby; that it was not true "that the said William Ernest Balsinger engaged in any concealment, either deliberate or intentional or otherwise with the intent that this defendant would not be fully advised relative to the risk that it might purport to assume, or was made with the intent of deceiving this defendant in connection with the execution and issuance of said purported certificate of insurance"; that it was not true that the said William Ernest Balsinger knew that the replies inserted on his behalf in said application for insurance were false and untrue. It was further found, "that it is not true that the purported concealment alleged to have been engaged in by the said William Ernest Balsinger could not have been ascertained by the defendant herein with the exercise of ordinary care."

[1,2] The foregoing summary includes all of the material findings upon the defense of fraud, except those relating to the notice of rescission, which are not in question. There is only one point of disagreement between the parties as to the material facts on the issue of fraud. Plaintiff contends that the statement which we have quoted from the application was not a representation of fact. She relies upon the rule, sometimes recognized, that where a question in an application for insurance has not been answered at all or where it manifestly appears to have been incompletely answered and the policy has been issued without further inquiry, the insurer cannot later treat the omission to give an answer or a complete answer as a false representation. Appellant would have us construe the statement "I have not been sued or paid any sums for claims made against me for malpractice" as calling for two answers, one as to suits and the other as to the payment of claims without suit, and it is contended that under this construction it would appear that the inquiry as to suits had not been answered, while the inquiry as to the payment of claims had been. We do not regard this as a reasonable interpretation of the statement. We think the statement of the insured would be understood as meaning that only one suit had been filed against him and that no claim had been paid except the one he specified and explained. The statement should be construed as it naturally would have been understood and as it was intended to be understood by the company. It would seem apparent that the applicant was called upon and was expected to list suits that had been filed against him and claims that he had paid, in a single statement, and that the answer would be understood as embracing all of the matter inquired about in paragraph 12 of the application. If that had not been the understanding, there would have been two inquiries instead of one. The statement constituted a positive representation that the applicant had been sued but once and had paid no claim except the one set forth in his answer. Westphall v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co., 1915, 27 Cal.App. 734, 151 P. 159; McEwen v. New York Life Ins. Co., 1921, 187 Cal. 144, 201 P. 577. In the Westphall case [27 Cal.App. 734, 151 P. 160] the application read in part: "I have never had any of the following complaints or diseases: Apoplexy * * * fits or convulsions * * * (naming a number of well-recognized diseases) varicose veins, except—" Nothing was written by the applicant after the word "except" and it was held that his failure to note any exception constituted a positive representation that he had never had or suffered from any of the designated complaints or diseases. In the McEwen case the inquiry was: "What illnesses, diseases, or accidents have you had since childhood?" The applicant listed pneumonia but failed to list an injury occasioned by the kick of a mule. It was said that the answer, which omitted all mention of the accident, was in effect an answer that no accident had been sustained. A judgment on directed verdict for defendant was sustained on appeal, upon the ground that the applicant's answer constituted a fraudulent misrep-sentation which voided the life insurance policy. Appellant insists that these cases were wrongly decided and should be overruled, but we do not doubt that they were correctly decided. The false statement in Dr. Balsinger's application and defendant's reliance thereon in ignorance of the true facts warranted the company in rescinding the contract when it became acquainted with the facts. It was a representation as to a material fact. It was important for defendant to know Dr. Balsinger's experience with malpractice suits and claims before assuming the risk of insuring him, just as it is important for a life insurance company to inquire as to the previous state of health of an applicant or for a fire insurance company to inquire as to an applicant's previous experience with fires. There was no evidence from which the court could have drawn an inference that the representation was not a material one.

[3,4] There was no finding that the statement in the application was true. The purported finding that it was not true that the statement "was false and untrue and was known by said William E. Balsinger to be false and untrue" does not negative the falsity of the statement. It may be that the court intended to find that even though the statement was false, Dr. Balsinger did not know it to be false. This, as we have seen, would be contrary to the proven facts and to other findings. The evidence that Dr. Balsinger had been sued many times and had full knowledge of the suits was undisputed. The specific findings as to prior suits and claims and the applicant's knowledge thereof demonstrate that the statement was untrue and was known by Dr. Balsinger to be untrue, and these findings are supported by undisputed evidence.

[5] The finding that defendant was not deceived by the statement would be sustained if the representation had been true or if it had been false but defendant did not rely and act upon it. The falsity of the representation having been established and found to be a fact, the remaining question is as to defendant's reliance upon it. There was a specific finding that defendant had no knowledge or information as to the other suits against the insured until long after the policy had been issued. The application read in part: "Signing this form does not bind the Applicant to complete the Insurance, but it is agreed that this form shall be the basis of the Contract should policy be issued." The direct and undisputed testimony of defendant's agent was that he received and relied solely upon the application in issuing the policy, that defendant made no inquiry except by means of the application, and that the policy would not have been issued if defendant had known of the other suits against the insured. There was no other testimony upon that issue and there was no circumstantial evidence from which it could have been inferred that defendant was not deceived by the false statement.

[6,7] The question then is what should be done with an appeal presented upon such a record? Where a finding establishes the existence of a fact from which the plaintiff's right to recover follows as a matter of law, and another finding is to the effect that the fact does not exist, and there is substantial evidence in the record to support both findings, a reviewing court would be obliged to reverse a judgment in favor of either party. The trial court would have to make new findings. But that is not necessarily true where one finding is supported by the evidence and the other is not. The case before us is unique; the facts upon the fraud issue have been found both ways, and upon one set of findings the case has been decided each way. We have quoted findings which, considered by themselves, would support the judgment that was given for plaintiff, but these findings have no support in the evidence. The uncontradicted evidence admits only of findings in favor of defendant. Under these circumstances we should not reverse the judgment because of the conflicts in the findings. The entire evidence is before us and the case is one where we should make findings in accordance with the facts established by the uncontradicted evidence and set aside the findings of the trial court which are in conflict with those made by us. Sec. 956a, Code of Civ.Proc.; Kirk v. Culley, 1927, 202 Cal. 501, 261 P. 994; Donahue v. Conley, 1927, 85 Cal.App. 15, 258 P. 985; Hamilton v. Hollman, 1929, 102 Cal.App. 166, 282 P. 977; Wallace Ranch Water Co. v. Foothill Ditch Co., 1935, 5 Cal.2d 103, 53 P.2d 929. The finding that it was not true that the questioned statement in the application "was false and untrue and was known by said William Ernest Balsinger to be false and untrue" is stricken for insufficiency as a finding of any fact and, under any construction thereof, unsupported by the evidence. We find as a fact, upon the direct and undisputed evidence, that defendant relied upon the statement in the application respecting prior suits and claims, and issued the policy in the belief that Dr. Balsinger had not been sued and that he had not paid any sums for claims except in the one instance stated in the application.

[8,9] The trial court's specific findings as to the falsity of the statement and defendant's ignorance of the true facts and our finding that defendant relied upon the statement in issuing the policy furnish support for the judgment in favor of defendant. There are other findings to the effect that Dr. Balsinger did not engage in intentional concealment and did not intend that the company would be deceived by any statement or omission in the application. It is unnecessary to take particular notice of these findings, although we think they have no support in the evidence. It is immaterial whether the omission to state the true facts was intentional or unintentional if defendant was misled by the statements that were made by the applicant. Section 331 of the Insurance Code, St.1935, p. 505, provides: "Concealment, whether intentional or unintentional, entitles the injured party to rescind insurance." See also Telford v. New York Life Ins. Co., 1937, 9 Cal.2d 103, 105, 69 P.2d 835; Iverson v. Metropolitan Life, etc., Co., 1907, 151 Cal. 746, 91 P. 609, 13 L.R.A.,N.S., 866; and Pierre v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 1937, 22 Cal.App.2d 346, 70 P.2d 985.

[10-16] Appellant makes the further contention that even though the policy were procured through fraud, the company is estopped to question liability by reason of the fact that it defended Dr. Balsinger in the action in which plaintiff recovered judgment. Cases have been cited by appellant which support the general proposition that an insurer waives the right to claim invalidity of the policy where it undertakes and carries through a defense of the insured against a claim covered by the policy. This general statement of the rule is sufficient for the purposes of our opinion. It rests upon the doctrine of estoppel. No case has been cited by appellant in which it has been held that the defense by an insurer of an action against the assured, without knowledge that the policy was procured by the assured by means of fraud or misrepresentation, precludes the insurer from rescinding the policy upon discovering the truth. One of the essential elements of estoppel and waiver is knowledge of the facts. There can be no waiver of the right to charge fraud, misrepresentation, or breach of warranty except by acts and conduct subsequent to the discovery of the facts, and by conduct evidencing an actual intention to relinquish a right. McDanels v. General Ins. Co., 1934, 1 Cal.App.2d 454, 35 P.2d 394, 36 P. 2d 829; California Western States, etc., Co. v. Feinsten, 1940, 15 Cal.2d 413, 101 P.2d 696, 131 A.L.R. 608. One who by his misrepresentation induces another to take action, to the latter's prejudice, cannot rely upon the action taken to relieve him of the consequences of his deceit. The evidence in the instant case is that defendant learned of prior suits against Dr. Balsinger while its attorney was engaged in the defense of plaintiff's suit against him. The attorney who had assumed the obligation of defending the suit for Dr. Balsinger would have had no right to abandon it in the midst of the trial (McDanels v. General Ins. Co., supra), and the fact that he continued with the case until it was finished did not constitute a waiver by defendant of its right to rescind the policy. It gave notice of rescission immediately after the trial and as soon as it was in a position to do so. The company undertook the defense of the suit because it was required to do so under its policy, and it was placed in that position through the misrepresentation of Dr. Balsinger. He could not justly complain because the company's attorney protected his rights until the trial was finished. He could not escape the consequences of his misrepresentation or fraud upon the technical claim that the undertaking of his defense without knowledge of the truth, or the completion of the trial after such knowledge was obtained in the course of the trial, constituted a waiver of defendant's right to rescind. Plaintiff's right to recover on the policy can be no better than that of Dr. Balsinger, and the claim of waiver or estoppel asserted by her has no validity. Kindred v. Pacific Auto. Ins. Co., 1938, 10 Cal.2d 463, 466, 75 P. 2d 69, and cases there cited.

[17,18] The further argument is made that defendant must be deemed to have had knowledge of the suits against Dr. Balsinger because they would have been discovered by an examination of the court records. The argument is without merit. One who is induced to enter into a contract by positive representations of fact is under no duty to inquire as to the truth of the representations unless he is made aware of facts which bring them under suspicion and which would induce a prudent man to make inquiry. This is an elementary principle of law and of business.

The judgment is affirmed.

THOMPSON, Justice.

The defendant was convicted by a jury on two counts of an information which was filed against him of the crimes of having in his possession and transporting without a prescription therefor preparations of morphine and codeine contrary to the narcotic statute of California. Sec. 11160, Health and Safety Code, St.1941, p. 2820. From the judgment of conviction sentencing him to imprisonment in the county jail of Lassen County for the period of one year for each offense, to run concurrently, he has appealed.

The appellant contends that the verdicts and judgment are not supported by the evidence for the reason that it does not appear he knowingly had in his possession or transported the narcotics contrary to law.

The defendant is thirty-four years of age. He is a carpenter who formerly resided at Los Angeles. He is married to a woman who had been employed as a nurse in Good Samaritan Hospital and also in the office of two physicians in that city. He owned a Nash sedan automobile. In August he drove his car to Westwood, Lassen County, to obtain employment as a carpenter. His wife did not accompany him. On August 29th, the day of the alleged offenses, his machine was found parked on the paved portion of the highway near Westwood. He was then sitting in the car in a drunken stupor. In his car on the floor behind the front seat a small box was found, containing a labeled bottle of 150 one-fourth grain tablets of morphine, a vial in which there were 18 one-half grain tablets of codeine, a hypodermic syringe and two needles, a bottle of potassium permanganate, a bottle of aromatic spirits of ammonia, and other drugs and apparatus. The morphine and codeine tablets were analyzed and found to contain opium derivatives. It was conceded that neither the defendant nor his wife had procured prescriptions for the narcotics. When the defendant was arrested and charged with the unlawful possession of those narcotics he falsely told the deputy sheriff he was a graduate of the University of Iowa Medical School, and had a right to use the narcotics. He later admitted he was not a graduate physician, and that he had procured no prescriptions for the narcotics. He then admitted his first story was false, but claimed that the kit containing the narcotics belonged to his wife. He admitted he once used one of the drugs in the hypodermic syringe for emergency relief of an injured man at Panemenius, and that he had used them "on a few people" in emergency cases in Los Angeles. When asked if he had ever used the contents of the box he replied, "Yes, I used the merthiolate down to Ackerman's" Boat Company in Newport, where he worked. He carried the kit in his car, and knew it was there. He finally said that his wife put the narcotics in the box, and stated that he first falsely told the officer that he was a registered physician and had a right to use the drugs because he was "scared" and did not wish to involve his wife in the transaction.

Mrs. Gibson, his wife, testified that she was a registered nurse and that she collected the drugs from unused narcotics returned by patients of the physicians by whom she was employed; that she did not procure them with prescriptions. She first told Inspector Hill that she "knew nothing about the narcotics in his [her husband's] possession" and that he would have no reason for having narcotics in his possession. There is no evidence that the defendant was a narcotic addict.

[1] Upon the foregoing evidence the jury found the defendant guilty of both charges of the information. The findings and judgment are adequately supported by the evidence.

[2, 3] Guilty knowledge and intent to violate the law may be shown by the facts and circumstances of the case, including the conduct of the defendant and any false or misleading statements which he may make to the arresting officers or others with relation to the material facts. People v. Rose, 26 Cal.App.2d 513, 79 P.2d 737; People v. Singh, 136 Cal.App. 233, 240, 28 P.2d 416; 8 Cal.Jur. 33, secs. 151-157; Sec. 21, Penal Code. The false statements made by the defendant to the deputy sheriff regarding his right as a licensed physician to use the narcotics furnish some evidence of his consciousness of guilt of the crime with which he was charged. In 8 California Jurisprudence, section 157, it is said in that regard:

"Any conduct of a defendant subsequent to the commission of the crime with which he is charged which indicates a consciousness of guilt is relevant and admissible against him. It is elementary that efforts to manufacture testimony, or to suppress testimony against himself, are properly proved as indicating a consciousness of guilt. Thus it may be shown that the defendant made false statements for the purpose of misleading or warding off suspicion."

[4] The evidence in this case shows possession, transportation and use of the narcotics by the defendant. It was the sole province of the jury to determine the weight and sufficiency of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses and to apply any reasonable inferences which may be drawn from the facts and circumstances of the case. With that province we may not interfere. People v. Latona, 2 Cal. 2d 714, 725, 43 P.2d 260.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEEK, Justice.

This is an appeal by the defendant from an order denying his application and motion to "vacate, annul, set aside and modify" the judgment of conviction previously entered by the court.

The record discloses that on June 1, 1936, an information was filed by the district attorney of San Joaquin county, charging the defendant with the commission of the crime of burglary, a felony, and three prior convictions and imprisonments for crimes amounting to felonies. To all of these charges the defendant entered a plea of not guilty and not guilty by reason of insanity. The jury by its verdict found defendant guilty of burglary in the second degree and further found that he had suffered the three prior convictions and imprisonments as alleged. Upon the plea of not guilty by reason of insanity the jury likewise found against the defendant. A motion for a new trial was made but was denied. The court then decreed the defendant to be an habitual criminal and sentenced him to life imprisonment. On January 11, 1943, nearly six and one-half years after his conviction the defendant filed his motion to vacate and set aside the judgment previously entered, which motion was denied by the trial court. It is from the order denying such motion that he has appealed.

[1] The original proceeding, although entitled a motion to vacate judgment, etc., is for all purposes and intent an application for the common-law writ of coram nobis. Under the well-established rules governing the issuance of such writ it is incumbent upon the defendant to establish by a preponderance of substantial and credible evidence that the error of which he complains was such that he was deprived of legal rights by extrinsic causes amounting to a deprivation of a trial on the merits. People v. Schwarz, 201 Cal. 309, 257 P. 71; People v. Reid, 195 Cal. 249, 232 P. 457, 36 A.L.R. 1435; People v. Deutsch, 16 Cal.App.2d 121, 60 P.2d 155.

[2] An examination of defendant's petition discloses (1) allegations of error in the offer of what he charges were known to the district attorney to have been improperly authenticated copies of prior convictions, and the admission thereof in evidence, and (2) allegations of variance between the charges contained in the information and the proof and verdict of the jury as regards the prior conviction alleged to have been suffered in Imperial county. No charge is made that defendant did not suffer the prior convictions or that he was denied a trial on the merits.

He was represented by counsel at the time of trial and if any of the evidence produced by the prosecution was improper, timely objection to the admission thereof could have been made, or waived, at the pleasure of the defendant. People v. Lawyer, 11 Cal.App.2d 718, 54 P.2d 747.

In any event the matters so attacked constitute at best irregularities occurring in the course of the trial, and if improperly introduced were subject to additional remedial action by a motion for a new trial or by a direct appeal. People v. Reid, supra; People v. Mooney, 178 Cal. 525, 174 P. 325. However, no appeal was taken either from the order denying his motion for a new trial or from the judgment.

It is conceded by defendant that such irregularities ordinarily should be attacked on a direct appeal from the judgment but he argues that because of his confinement the time for appeal passed, and therefore as the statutory remedy was not available to him, recourse must be had to the common law.

In further explanation of his failure to so appeal, defendant alleges generally that in addition to having been kept under close confinement and observation after being received at Folsom Prison until the time for appeal had expired, he thereafter was committed to the Mendocino State Hospital, and it was not until he was returned to Folsom that he was able to take any steps to correct the alleged errors. Neither the date of his commitment to Mendocino or the circumstances surrounding such commitment, nor the date of his return to Folsom appear in his petition in substantiation of the inference that from the date of his original incarceration in Folsom to the filing of the petition such disabilities were continuous or of such a degree as to thereby preclude him from perfecting an appeal. Recourse to the record is of no avail to clarify this and other inferences and omissions in the petition for the reasons as stated by the trial judge and confirmed by the district attorney, that in all cases after a lapse of five years all original records and evidence are destroyed by the county clerk.

A somewhat comparable situation is found in the case of People v. Reid, supra [195 Cal. 249, 232 P. 461, 36 A.L.R. 1435], where the court dismissed a contention similar to that advanced by the defendant herein, with the statement that such conclusion "is not sound. * * * To hold in such case that after the expiration of the statutory limit the common-law remedy could still be availed of would be to hold in effect that in case of conflict between the two the common law prevails over the statute. * * * the existence of a statutory remedy * * * precludes a resort to the common law * * *."

[3] Apart from that fact, however, no showing whatever has been made, either before the trial court or before this court, that the judgment was predicated upon an assumed fact or a condition which did not, in truth, exist, and that the nonexistence thereof would have prevented the rendition of the judgment had it been known.

The order is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Francisco County; Everett C. McKeage, Judge.

Action by Jose Lucientes against the Bartholomae Oil Corporation to obtain an accounting for a portion of the net profits of a mining venture under the terms of a trust agreement, in which Lloyd Root and another intervened as claimants of interests in such agreement. From a judgment for interveners, defendant appeals.

Reversed.

Earl D. Killion, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Vincent W. Hallinan, Carey Van Fleet, and Emmett R. Burns, all of San Francisco (James A. Himmel, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

SPENCE, Justice.

This action was brought by Jose Lucientes, hereinafter called plaintiff, to obtain an accounting from Bartholomae Oil Corporation, hereinafter called appellant, under the terms of a certain trust agreement dated April 30, 1934. This trust agreement covered ten percent of the net profits of a certain mining venture of appellant for a period of ten years commencing on January 1, 1935. During the pendency of said action and on October 4, 1938, plaintiff and appellant entered into a written agreement settling all claims and demands of plaintiff against appellant for the sum of $1000, and providing for the dismissal of this action. Said sum was paid by appellant and accepted by plaintiff and the validity of said agreement, as between the parties thereto, has never been questioned. On December 8, 1938, and prior to any dismissal of said action, Lloyd Root and William Dalziel, hereinafter called respondents, were granted leave to file a complaint in intervention in said action upon their claim that they had an interest in said trust agreement dated April 30, 1934; that the action had been brought by plaintiff on behalf of himself and as a representative of respondents; and that after the filing of said complaint, plaintiff had taken a position hostile to said respondents. Despite these claims of hostility between plaintiff and respondents, the same counsel who acted for plaintiff in filing his complaint also acted for respondents in filing their complaint in intervention and the record discloses that the same counsel continued to act for both plaintiff and respondents throughout the trial. The complaint in intervention contained substantially the same allegations as did the complaint and also certain additional allegations which will be hereinafter discussed. Appellant's answer denied many of the allegations of said complaint in intervention and also set up numerous affirmative defenses. A trial was had, followed by an accounting, and judgment was finally entered on January 2, 1943.

In said judgment, it was decreed that plaintiff should recover nothing against appellant; that respondents should recover nothing against plaintiff; that no profits had been realized from said mining venture but on the contrary, appellant had suffered a net loss of $116,054.61 during the period covered by the accounting and that therefore respondents were not entitled to judgment for any alleged profits. No appeal was taken by any party from the above-mentioned portions of the judgment.

It was further decreed, however, "That the plaintiff in intervention, Lloyd Root, is the owner of, and entitled to receive, an undivided forty percent of ten percent, and the plaintiff in intervention, William Dalziel, is entitled to receive an undivided twenty percent of ten percent of the net profits realized by the defendant Bartholomae Oil Corporation in the operation of said mining properties mentioned and contained in the said two contracts of March 7, 1934, and which are mentioned and referred to in said agreement of April 30, 1934, being Exhibit 'A' in the complaint in intervention, subject, however, to all of the terms and conditions of said two contracts of March 7, 1934, for the period of ten years from the 1st day of January, 1935."

This appeal was taken by appellant solely from that portion of the judgment which is quoted in the preceding paragraph.

There is no dispute concerning the making of the agreements to which reference is made in the above-quoted portion of the judgment. Plaintiff, with the assistance of respondents, was instrumental in bringing together the parties and in assisting to procure the execution of the two agreements dated March 7, 1934. One of said agreements of March 7, 1934, was entered into by Martin Corliss and other persons, who were owners of certain mining claims in Alaska, with William A. Bartholomae, Jr. The other of said agreements of March 7, 1934, was entered into by James Frawley, who was likewise the owner of certain mining claims in Alaska, with said William A. Bartholomae, Jr. Said agreements provided for the sale of said mining claims to William A. Bartholomae, Jr. Plaintiff, respondents and William A. Bartholomae, Jr., were residents of California and said agreements were negotiated in this state and were executed in the City and County of San Francisco. Thereafter William A. Bartholomae, Jr., assigned said agreements to Bartholomae Oil Corporation, the appellant herein.

In the following month under date of April 30, 1934, the trust agreement referred to in the quoted portion of the judgment was executed in the City and County of San Francisco by appellant Bartholomae Oil Corporation, as trustor, and Joseph Bien, as trustee, and plaintiff Jose Lucientes and his wife, as beneficiaries. Respondents were not parties to said agreement nor were they mentioned therein. After reciting the execution of the two agreements of March 7, 1934 and that "in consideration of services rendered by Jose Lucientes in and about the making and obtaining of said contracts, the party of the first part (appellant) is desirous of compensating the said Jose Lucientes to the extent and in the manner hereinafter set forth", it provided for the transfer in trust to the trustee of "Ten percent of the net profits realized by the party of the first part in the operation of the properties contained in the two contracts above referred to made by the said William A. Bartholomae, Jr. and assigned to the party of the first part, all subject, however, to the terms and conditions of the said two contracts, to continue for a period of ten years from the 1st day of January 1935." The terms of the trust provided for the payment of the sums received by the trustee to plaintiff and, under certain conditions, to plaintiff's wife. There were also certain terms giving the trust the nature of a so-called spendthrift trust by prohibiting the transfer or assignment by plaintiff of any interest in the trust.

Respondents knew of the terms of said trust agreement shortly after the execution thereof but nevertheless made no objection thereto until after appellant had made the settlement with plaintiff on October 4, 1938. On the contrary, respondents had previously accepted from plaintiff purported "assignments" of interests in plaintiff's claim against appellant. The purported "assignment" from plaintiff to respondent Dalziel was executed on June 12, 1934 and made specific reference to the trust agreement of April 30, 1934. The instrument was in the nature of an order for the trustee to pay a portion "of said ten percent" to respondent Dalziel. The purported "assignment" from plaintiff to respondent Root was dated May 11, 1937. It did not make specific reference to the trust agreement but was in the form of an agreement that "any and all claims which said Jose Lucientes may have against the Bartholomae Oil Corporation" in connection with said mining claims "shall be litigated solely and alone by said Jose Lucientes and said Jose Lucientes hereby assigns to Lloyd Root one-half of any sum which he may recover, attorneys fees and costs of suit having been first deducted." The trial court found that these instruments dated June 12, 1934 and May 11, 1937 had been executed by plaintiff and that pursuant thereto plaintiffs in intervention were the owners of and were entitled respectively to twenty percent and forty percent of the ten percent of the net profits to be paid to plaintiff under the trust agreement of April 30, 1934.

Appellant makes numerous contentions on this appeal including the contentions that the complaint in intervention did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against appellant; that the evidence was insufficient to support the findings; that the findings were insufficient to support the judgment; that respondents' cause of action, if any, was barred by the statute of limitations; that the trial court failed to make findings on certain material issues including the statute of limitations; that the settlement made by plaintiff and appellant discharged all claims and demands of respondents against appellant; and that in any event, no recovery could be had by plaintiff or respondents for the services performed by them without pleading and proving that they were licensed under the California Real Estate Act. Deering's General Laws 1937, Act 112. We deem it unnecessary to discuss each of said contentions separately as we are satisfied that the judgment must be reversed for the reasons hereinafter stated.

[1] It is difficult to ascertain the theory upon which respondents' complaint in intervention was drawn or the theory upon which the trial court entered the challenged portion of the judgment. As above stated, respondents' complaint in intervention contained practically all the allegations of plaintiffs' complaint in seeking an accounting under the terms of the trust agreement of April 30, 1934. But respondents were not entitled to recover under the terms of said trust agreement as they were neither parties to said agreement nor mentioned therein and the terms of said trust agreement expressly prohibited any assignment by plaintiff. Furthermore the rights of plaintiff and appellant, who were the only parties to said trust agreement, had been fully settled by the settlement agreement of October 4, 1938. Apparently realizing that their complaint in intervention could not stand solely upon the terms of the trust agreement and of the purported assignments thereof, respondents made certain general allegations of fraud on the part of plaintiff and appellant in connection with the execution of the trust agreement and the execution of the settlement agreement. While the trial court found these allegations were true, respondents have not directed our attention to any evidence supporting these allegations and we have found none. We therefore find no support for the challenged portion of the judgment either under the terms of the written instruments or independently of said terms.

[2] In any event, we are of the opinion that the judgment must be reversed for the further reason that no recovery could be had for any services performed by plaintiff or respondents in the absence of pleading and proof that they were licensed under the California Real Estate Act. Deering's General Laws 1937, Act 112, sections 2 and 20. The two agreements of March 7, 1934, were negotiated and executed in California and the trust agreement of April 30, 1934 was likewise executed in California. The consideration for the trust agreement was expressly recited to be the "services rendered by Jose Lucientes in and about the making and obtaining of said contracts", the contracts referred to being the agreements for the sale of the mining claims. It is apparently conceded that neither plaintiff nor respondents had been licensed under the above-mentioned act.

[3] Respondents claim, however, that plaintiff and respondents were interested in a prior option which they transferred to William A. Bartholomae, Jr., and that it was therefore unnecessary for them to be licensed under the act in order to recover for the services performed. They alleged in their complaint in intervention "that on or about the 7th day of March, 1934, the plaintiff Jose Lucientes sold, transferred and set over, for a valuable consideration to William A. Bartholomae, Jr., all his right, title, and interest and all of the right, title and interest of plaintiffs in intervention, in and to a lease and option of certain mining properties" and that the trust agreement of April 30, 1934 was executed by appellant "in order to protect the said plaintiff Jose Lucientes in his interest in said properties and to compensate him therefor." The trial court found said allegations to be true but here again respondents have pointed to no evidence to sustain said findings and we have found none. It does not appear that plaintiff or respondents ever transferred anything to appellant or that they ever purported to do anything or to seek compensation for anything other than the services rendered in bringing the parties together and assisting in the negotiations for the sale from the owners of the mining claims to William A. Bartholomae, Jr., as evidenced by the two agreements of March 7, 1934. This seems to be conceded by respondents in one portion of their brief where, in endeavoring to explain the "theory of this case," they say "The facts upon which this case is based are very simple. The original plaintiff, Jose Lucientes, was instrumental in bringing together these certain parties interested in this mining venture in Alaska. In order to accomplish and consummate this deal it was necessary that the said Jose Lucientes have the assistance and aid of respondents * * *". Our search of the record discloses no evidence to show that the consideration for the trust agreement was or was ever intended to be anything other than the services performed as recited in said trust agreement.

The portion of the judgment from which this appeal was taken is reversed.

Riccardi, Webster & Donahue, of Pasadena, for appellant First Trust & Savings Bank of Pasadena, as trustee.

Laurence B. Martin and Samuel Reisman, both of Los Angeles, for appellant George R. Reinicke.

G. M. Cuthbertson, of Los Angeles, for respondent J. H. Booge, trustee.

BISHOP, Justice pro tem.

In this creditor's suit the plaintiff sought and obtained a $2,000 judgment, against the defendant First Trust and Savings Bank of Pasadena, on the theory that that sum was due to defendant Reinicke from the defendant bank. Both the defendants have appealed from the judgment, and we are reversing it because the pleadings and the evidence both fail to show that any sum was yet due Reinicke.

The plaintiff had recovered a judgment against defendant Reinicke for over $5,700. Execution was issued and served upon the defendant bank on September 6, 1940. The bank responded that it had in its possession $2,000, which, as the trustee named in a certain trust indenture executed by Nannie Lackner (now deceased), it owed to defendant Reinicke, but, it contended, by virtue of a spendthrift provision in the trust indenture the $2,000 was not to be paid into creditor's hands. Supplemental proceedings brought the bank into court for examination as a debtor of plaintiff's judgment debtor, Reinicke, resulting in an order that this action might be brought, and that in the meantime the defendant bank make no transfer of the $2,000.

This action went to trial upon an amended complaint to which was annexed as an exhibit an admitted copy of the trust indenture. We shall not set forth in full its lengthy and somewhat intricate provisions. The net income of the trust was to be paid to the trustor, together with part of the principal, if that became necessary, and from the same sources sums up to $3,500 were to be paid the trustor's grandson for his college education. Then followed these provisions: "(2) Upon the death of the Trustor, the Trustee shall pay all of her just debts and the expense of her last illness, funeral and burial, and estate, inheritance or succession taxes, either directly or as the Trustee may be thereunto requested by any Executor or Trustor's last will and testament; and thereafter the Trustee shall administer and dispose of the trust estate as hereinafter provided;

"(3) The Trustee shall pay the sum of Two Thousand Dollars ($2,000.00) to George R. Reinicke, husband of Trustor's deceased daughter, Else Lackner Reinicke, if he be living to receive the same, as my gift to him in memory of my said daughter;

"(4) In the event that Trustor's grandson, Francis L. Bryan (born September 1, 1917), shall survive the Trustor and shall not have attained the age of twenty-six (26) years, at the date of the death of the Trustor, the Trustee shall set aside in a separate fund a sum of money, the amount of which shall be determined by deducting from the sum of Four Thousand Dollars ($4,000.00) such sums as during Trustor's lifetime shall have been paid by the Trustee to said Francis L. Bryan to apply toward the cost of his education. * * *

"(5) After making the payments and setting aside the fund authorized by the provisions of the immediately preceding sections (2), (3), and (4), the Trustee shall divide the trust estate then remaining, including accumulated income, if any, as well as principal, into four equal portions * * *."

Nowhere in the amended complaint is there any allegation to the effect that the "thereafter" to which we gave emphasis as we quoted from the trust agreement, had arrived. There was no averment that there were no debts or funeral expenses to be paid, or that the usual bills attendant upon one's last illness and death had been met. The defendant bank, at the opening of the trial, stated its position to be "that the payment to the beneficiaries shall be made after certain other things had been done, and those things, some of them, have not yet been done" and added later: "In other words * * * Mr. Reinicke was not entitled to any money when the suit was filed or the levy made." This position was foreshadowed by allegations in the bank's amended answer, filed almost five months before the trial. From the colloquy which followed the statement of the bank's position before any evidence was taken, it appears that the construction to be placed upon the provisions which we have quoted had been considered and passed upon by the trial judge earlier in the case's history. At the trial there was no evidence that all of the just debts, or all of the expenses of the trustor's last illness, funeral and burial, or all of the estate, inheritance or succession taxes, which were to be paid by the trustee, had been paid. There was evidence that since the suit was commenced, December 21, 1940, various taxes totalling $2,410, had been paid, at least one on account. Indeed, counsel for the plaintiff and counsel for the bank both stated that there were some taxes remaining unpaid at the time of the trial.

[1] It is evident that the learned trial judge continued up to the entry of judgment to hold to the opinion which he had reached after the argument upon some law question which preceded the trial, that the payment of the $2,000 to Reinicke became due and payable upon the death of the trustor. We do not so interpret the trust indenture. Its provisions, in our opinion, require the conclusion that after the death of the trustor the trustee was first of all to pay the debts and taxes, as directed by subdivision (2) which we have quoted, and thereafter to pay the $2,000 to the trustor's son-in-law, defendant Reinicke, "if he be living to receive the same." The "gift" was contingent not only upon his outliving the trustor, but upon his living until her debts and the taxes had been paid. San Diego Trust, etc., Bank v. Heustis, 1932, 121 Cal.App. 675, 694-697, 10 P.2d 158.

[2] Plaintiff suggests, we cannot fairly use a stronger word, that the contemporaneous construction put upon the trust by the trustee should be given weight in construing the trust agreement. No case was cited in support of this rule of construction, and we know of none that could be cited. It is the intent of the trustor, not of the trustee, that is to be given effect (In re Gump's Estate, 1940, 16 Cal.2d 535, 548, 107 P.2d 17, 24; Title Ins. & Tr. Co. v. Duffill, 1923, 191 Cal. 629, 642, 218 P. 14, 18), and we are unable to see in the activities of a trustee, not participated in or known to the trustor, any evidence of the intention of the trustor.

There is the further suggestion that it is not reasonable to interpret the trust agreement as postponing the payment of the $2,000 to Reinicke until after the payment of the debts and taxes because that interpretation would cause the payment of sums left for the maintenance and support of the trustor's children to be likewise postponed. We find the plaintiff much more solicitous that the trustor's children shall not long await the benefits of the trust, than was she. In three distinct places in the trust indenture it is expressly stated that the sum provided for the children shall be paid "after making the payments * * * authorized by the provisions of sections (2) [and] (3) * * * hereof," that is, after the debts and taxes were paid and after Reinicke received his $2,000. If these provisions result in delaying the disbursement to the children, and to Reinicke, for the "many months" which "it is well known" that it "frequently takes" to determine the amount of taxes to be paid, as plaintiff argues, it is a result directly attributable to the language chosen by the trustor in her last amendment to the indenture which she executed. In an earlier amendment the trustee was authorized to pay, not taxes, but only "the funeral expenses, expenses of the last illness, and such other just debts of the Trustor as may be presented to the Trustee within a period of sixty days immediately following the death of the Trustor.

[3] After the sheriff served the garnishment upon the defendant bank, it, in harmony with the construction it had been placing upon the trust indenture, set $2,000 aside in a separate fund and credited itself with having discharged that amount of its trust. The trustee's misinterpretation of the provisions of the trust did not change those provisions, nor estop it now from relying upon them as properly understood. It may have been that but for plaintiff's garnishment a premature payment of the sum coming to Reinicke would have been made. As pointed out in a case having many parallels to this one, Walker v. Doak, 1930, 210 Cal. 30, 34, 290 P. 290, 292, a payment, even if premature, leaves the beneficiary with no claim against the trustee, and a creditor is in no better position. In our case the bank has not made a premature payment, it has only made entries on its records, which it can remake.

[4] Reinicke, it seems plain, could not on December 21, 1940, have successfully sued the bank for the $2,000 he hoped someday to receive. This being so, the plaintiff, who has no better standing than Reinicke had, cannot succeed in this action. Walker v. Doak, supra, 210 Cal. 30, 34, 290 P. 290, 292; In re Estate of Bennett, 1939, 13 Cal. 2d 354, 364, 90 P.2d 84, 126 A.L.R. 771; Depner v. Joseph Zukin Blouses, 1936, 13 Cal.App.2d 124, 129, 56 P.2d 574, 576.

We do not deem it proper, on this appeal, where we are reversing the judgment because we are of the opinion that when the action was filed and tried the defendant bank was not indebted to Reinicke, to discuss the contention that if the bank had owed the $2,000 to him, the sum was protected, by provisions of the trust indenture, from the reach of his creditors.

The judgment is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter S. Gates, Judge.

Action by Mabel Greenwood against Ensley A. Summers, Fred F. Misko, and others for personal injuries and property damage, wherein defendant Misko filed a cross-complaint against defendant Summers. From a judgment for Fred F. Misko, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Jack Carl Greenburg and Phillip W. Silver, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Parker & Stanbury and Harry D. Parker, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

DESMOND, Presiding Justice.

The appellant in this case was injured and the automobile which she was driving was damaged in a collision which occurred on Alameda Street, a north and south thoroughfare, in the southerly district of Los Angeles. She was driving north on Alameda Street at about 6:10 a. m., when the accident happened. The paved highway upon which she was driving was about 37 feet wide. There was a heavy fog prevailing at the time; it was quite dark and the pavement was moist. The defendant Summers also was driving his Terraplane sedan north on Alameda and, immediately after passing the appellant's car, sideswiped the defendant Misko's truck, which was traveling south on Alameda Street, knocking its dual rear wheels out from under the truck. This collision threw the truck out of control and after skidding in a southerly direction for 192 feet it collided with the plaintiff's car.

Plaintiff, the appellant here, joined Summers and Misko as defendants. Summers answered, denying the allegations of negligence charged against him and any liability for the damage resulting from the collision. As an affirmative defense he charged that the injuries and damages were proximately caused by the negligence of the plaintiff and of defendant Misko. Defendant Misko in his answer denied negligence or liability on his part. In a cross-complaint Misko sought damages from Summers, his co-defendant, in the sum of $273.62.

The case opened as a jury trial, but after the first day's hearing the parties all stipulated that it might be completed by the trial judge sitting without a jury. After hearing the arguments of counsel at the conclusion of the hearing, the judge, by agreement of the parties, went to the scene of the accident and shortly thereafter entered findings and judgment.

According to the findings, defendant Misko was not negligent in the operation of his truck and no act on his part "proximately contributed to the accident in question or to the injury or damage suffered by any party." The court further found that the sole proximate cause of the accident and collision was negligence on the part of defendant Summers. As a result of his findings the court concluded as a matter of law that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment against Summers in the sum of $1,500.45; further, that she was not entitled to recover anything from the defendant Misko, but that Misko was entitled to his costs of action from the plaintiff and judgment for damages in the sum of $273.62 against Summers "together with his costs of action." Judgment followed accordingly, awarding Misko, as his costs against the appellant, the sum of $145.70, adjudging that Misko should recover from Summers "the sum of $273.62, together with his costs of action incurred herein in the sum of $——."

The plaintiff appeals from the judgment in favor of the defendant Misko and against the plaintiff. She states, as her sole contention, that Misko was guilty of concurrent negligence as a matter of law by reason of the fact that he attempted to overtake an automobile on a narrow thirty-seven foot highway, in the nighttime when there was a heavy fog and visibility was poor, while driving at a speed of thirty miles per hour in the center of the highway over a moist pavement, and after colliding with an oncoming automobile, then skidding 192 feet into appellant's car. The testimony given by Mr. Misko was to the effect that he first saw Summers' oncoming automobile when it was about 150 feet away while he, Misko, was traveling at 25 miles per hour and Summers' car was traveling from 40 to 50 miles per hour, with his car straddling the white line or riding over the white line approximately two feet to the west of it; that his rear wheels were then even with the front wheels of a small pick-up truck, which was running beside him at his right and which he had been overtaking; that the pick-up truck was close to the west edge of the highway and two feet west of his own truck; that the left side of his truck was about two feet west of the white center line of the highway; that after seeing Summers' automobile approaching he did not have time to do anything prior to the actual collision. Mr. Summers testified that when he first saw the Misko truck it was about 10 feet in front of him; that the truck did not swerve to the right or left within that 10 feet; that after the impact of the two vehicles, his left front wheel struck the left rear wheel of the truck and at that time the left rear axle and the dual rear wheels of that truck were thrown on the highway and onto the ground and when that occurred the steel body of the truck went to the ground, leaving a mark on the pavement about 7 feet to the west of the center line. He testified also that when the police officers arrived they took measurements of the marks on the pavement and that the officer made a remark that he (Summers) was over the white line. However, at the trial Mr. Summers was asked to state where he was at the time of the impact and answered that he was on the east side of the highway.

"Q. Was any portion of your car on the west side of the highway? A. No; definitely not."

[1-4] The trial court, therefore, was called upon to decide, upon conflicting evidence and as a matter of fact, whether Summers crossed the white line at the time he struck Misko's truck and, in so doing, was guilty of an act of negligence proximately causing appellant's damage. Its decision on that subject is not questioned by appellant. Her objection goes to the point that the court found that Summers' negligence was the sole proximate cause, thereby relieving Misko of all blame. We are asked to cancel the effect of the finding that Misko was not negligent and that no act on his part proximately contributed to the accident in question. This, on the theory that proper consideration of section 510 of the Vehicle Code, St.1935, p. 176, in connection with this accident, should have compelled a contrary finding as a matter of law. We cannot accept this reasoning. Section 510 of the Vehicle Code, under the caption, "Basic Speed Law," reads as follows: "No person shall drive a vehicle upon a highway at a speed greater than is reasonable or prudent having due regard for the traffic on, and the surface and width of, the highway, and in no event at a speed which endangers the safety of persons or property." The very phraseology of this statute calls for a trier of facts, who must give consideration to all the pertinent circumstances surrounding the case which comes before him. The precept applicable to the situation is discussed, with authorities cited, in 19 Cal. Jur., in the article on "Negligence," at the following points: Sec. 22. "* * * since negligence is a relative term, no precise rule can be formulated which adequately defines the quantum of care to be used in a particular case; that question depends upon particular facts and circumstances." Sec. 23. "* * * In those cases in which a higher degree of diligence is not fixed by contract or by statute, the law has fixed no standard of care other than the general one that it must be such as a person of ordinary reason, prudence and caution would use under the same circumstances. * * * In determining whether one's actions measure up to the conduct of a reasonably prudent man, it is obvious that all of the circumstances attending the transaction must be taken into consideration." Sec. 24. "* * * The term 'ordinary care' is a relative one, and the standard by which it is to be measured varies, as we have seen, with the circumstances attending each particular case. A quantum of care which might be sufficient for one set of circumstances may be wholly inadequate under changed conditions." Sec. 138. "Ordinary Care. In most cases the law has fixed no standard of care other than the general one that it must be such as a reasonably prudent man would exercise under the particular circumstances. Whether a party's conduct measures up to this standard presents a question of fact which ordinarily should be submitted to the jury under proper instructions as to the law. * * * However, if it appears from the undisputed facts, judged in the light of common knowledge and experience, that a party has not exercised such care as men of common prudence usually exercise in like positions, * * * negligence may be declared as a matter of law."

[5] In determining, in the present case, whether Misko exercised the care which a man of common prudence would have exercised, the trial court undoubtedly relied upon the law and the evidence. So far as the law is concerned, section 527(a) of the Vehicle Code, St.1935, p. 182, states it as follows: "Drivers of vehicles proceeding in opposite directions shall pass each other to the right, and, except when a roadway has been divided into traffic lanes, each driver shall give to the other at least one-half of the main traveled portion of the roadway whenever possible." So far as the evidence is concerned, the court would have been warranted in finding that Summers violated this statute and trespassed on territory reserved for traffic going south. Misko, running generally at a distance of approximately two feet west of the center white line, in our opinion, might justly have considered that he was safe from a collision with northbound traffic. Under those circumstances, it is understandable that the trial court would fail to find him guilty of negligence. The general rule is that every person who is himself exercising ordinary care has a right to presume that every other person will perform his duty and obey the law, and in the absence of reasonable ground to think otherwise it is not negligence to assume that he is not exposed to danger which comes to him only from violation of law or duty by such other person. See Harris v. Johnson, 1916, 174 Cal. 55, 58, 161 P. 1155, L.R.A.1917C, 477, Ann.Cas.1918E, 560; Pinello v. Taylor, 1933, 128 Cal.App. 508, 512, 17 P.2d 1039.

[6] We believe that under the circumstances of the present case and, particularly in view of the provisions of section 510, Vehicle Code, there is no foundation for appellant's claim that Misko should have been found negligent as a matter of law. In our opinion, the matter of his liability was properly treated by the trial court as a question of fact. Gayton v. Pacific Fruit Express Co., 1932, 127 Cal.App. 50 [3], page 57, 15 P.2d 217[5], page 220; see also 2 Cal.Jur.Supp. 272-3, sec. 180.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Dan F. Conway, Judge.

Action by William L. Johnson against County of Fresno and another for injuries sustained in an automobile collision. From a judgment dismissing the action after a demurrer to plaintiff's second amended complaint had been sustained without leave to amend, plaintiff appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

Claude L. Rowe, of Fresno, for appellant.

W. H. Stammer and Galen McKnight, both of Fresno, for respondents.

MARKS, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment dismissing the action after a demurrer to plaintiff's second amended complaint had been sustained without leave to amend.

Plaintiff was injured on April 12, 1942, in a collision between an automobile in which he was riding and a station wagon belonging to the County of Fresno and driven by Melvin A. Willmirth, its employee.

The complaint was filed on November 13, 1942. It contained no allegation concerning the filing of any claim for damages with either defendant, the County of Fresno or Willmirth. A demurrer was sustained with leave to amend.

An amended complaint was filed on January 16, 1943. This pleading contained the allegation that "plaintiff was physically and mentally unable to file any verified or other claim against any of the defendants until more than ninety days after the accident and injury hereinabove referred to." In the same paragraph it was alleged that the agents of the County of Fresno and the agents of the insurance carrier for defendants falsely and fraudulently represented to plaintiff that it was unnecessary for him to employ an attorney because the insurance carrier for defendants "was making an immediate cash settlement of plaintiff's claim"; that they continued to make such representations for more than ninety days after the accident, and furnished him with free medical care during such time; that after the ninety days had elapsed they refused to talk to plaintiff and refused to make any settlement with him.

A demurrer was sustained with leave to amend and a second amended complaint was filed on May 17, 1943, which, in effect, repeated the allegations we have just referred to. A demurrer was sustained without leave to amend and this appeal followed from the judgment subsequently entered. It is admitted that no claim of any kind was ever presented to or filed with the defendant Willmirth or the County of Fresno. The sole question presented is the necessity for filing such a claim before an action for damages can be maintained against a county or its employee.

[1] At the common law no right of action existed against the state or any of its political subdivisions for damages resulting from negligence of its employees while performing governmental functions. Such right of action exists only when authorized by statute. Chafor v. City of Long Beach, 174 Cal. 478, 163 P. 670, L.R.A.1917E, 685, Ann.Cas.1918D, 106; Kellar v. City of Los Angeles, 179 Cal. 605, 178 P. 505; Miller v. City of Palo Alto, 208 Cal. 74, 280 P. 108; Redlands High School Dist. v. Superior Court, 20 Cal.2d 348, 125 P.2d 490; Pittam v. City of Riverside, 128 Cal. App. 57, 16 P.2d 768. Such a right of action for damages resulting from dangerous or defective conditions of public property was given by the public liability act. Stats. 1923, p. 675. Now political subdivisions are liable by statute for certain acts of negligence of their officers and employees.

In 1931 the legislature passed an act, St. 1931, p. 2476, as amended, requiring the person injured to file within ninety days his verified claim for damages with the public agency and public officer or employee sought to be held liable. Section 4075 of the Political Code requires such claim to be filed within one year.

[2] It has been held without deviation that the filing of a claim is a necessary prerequisite to bringing an action for damages. Douglass v. City of Los Angeles, 5 Cal.2d 123, 53 P.2d 353; Hall v. City of Los Angeles, 19 Cal.2d 198, 120 P.2d 13; Redlands High School Dist. v. Superior Court, supra; Artukovich v. Astendorf, 21 Cal.2d 329, 131 P.2d 831.

Plaintiff maintains that the recent case of Farrell v. County of Placer, 23 Cal.2d 624, 145 P.2d 570, 573, has modified this rule and that the fraud of the public agency, such as is alleged here, will estop it from pleading the defense of plaintiff having failed to file the claim. The Farrell case did relax the rigor of the rule formerly prevailing here but not to the extent claimed by the plaintiff. The reason for its holding is summed up in the following quotation: "Although it has been repeatedly held that compliance with the appropriate claim statute is mandatory and an essential requisite to plaintiff's cause of action, nevertheless the time element with respect to the filing of the claim is essentially procedural in nature."

In the Farrell case the plaintiff pleaded estoppel in much the same form as we have here. A claim was filed, but it was after the expiration of ninety days. The court concluded that the County of Placer might be estopped by the fraud of its agents only so far as filing the claim within the time prescribed by the statute was concerned. It did not hold that no claim need be filed. A claim was filed in that case so that question was not presented to the Supreme Court.

The second amended complaint in this action alleged that the fraud ended after the expiration of ninety days after the accident when the agents of the County of Fresno and Willmirth refused to see or talk to plaintiff. It must have appeared to plaintiff at that time that the representations concerning a settlement were fraudulent. If plaintiff had filed a claim within a reasonable time thereafter he would have brought himself within the rule of the Farrell case. This he did not do. This leaves him within the rule of the cases of Douglass v. City of Los Angeles, supra, and First Trust & Savings Bank of Pasadena v. City of Pasadena, 21 Cal.2d 220, 130 P.2d 702, where it was held that as no claims were filed, the plaintiffs could not maintain their actions.

Plaintiff maintains that the allegation of his total incapacity for ninety days excused him from filing his claim. In this connection it might be observed that while plaintiff did allege his total mental and physical incapacity for ninety days he also alleged in the same paragraph that he was misled by the fraudulent representations during those same ninety days. However, as we have already observed, under the rule in the Farrell case he could have filed his claim, had he acted promptly, after he had recovered and realized that the representations concerning a settlement of his claim were false.

Plaintiff argues that the provision giving him ninety days in which to file a claim is so arbitrary, capricious and unreasonable as to deprive him of his right to a remedy without due process of law, especially as he was mentally and physically unable to file his claim within that time. As the law is construed in the Farrell case he could have filed his claim after he had recovered and discovered the fraud which removes the question of his incapacity from necessary consideration inure.

[3] As we have already seen there was no common-law right of action against a governmental agency for the torts of its agents when acting in a governmental capacity. The right of action is strictly a creature of statute. It is very generally held that where a right of action is created by statute, and a limitation is placed on the time in which the right is to be exercised, the right must be asserted within the time limited or it ceases to exist and cannot be thereafter enforced in any form. Walsh v. Mayer, 111 U.S. 31, 4 S.Ct. 260, 28 L.Ed. 338; The Harrisburg (Lewis v. Rickards), 119 U.S. 199, 7 S.Ct. 140, 30 L.Ed. 358; Davis v. Mills, 194 U.S. 451, 24 S.Ct. 692, 48 L.Ed. 1067; United States ex rel. Texas Portland Cement Co. v. McCord, 233 U.S. 157, 34 S.Ct. 550, 58 L.Ed. 893.

This rule was recognized in Redlands High School Dist. v. Superior Court, supra, involving an action to recover damages for personal injuries from a high school district, where it was said [20 Cal. 2d 348, 125 P.2d 495]: "Cases have established that the liability of municipalities, counties, and school districts for the negligent acts of their officers and employees is derived solely from statutory provisions in this state. Any plaintiff, therefore, must fulfill the mandatory requirement that a verified claim be filed as a prerequisite to maintaining a suit under the statute and failure to file such a claim is fatal to the cause of action."

The foregoing was quoted with approval in Artukovich v. Astendorf supra, and the following remarks were added [21 Cal.2d 399, 131 P.2d 833]: "The underlying principles upon which the authorities are based are (1) that neither the State nor any of its political subdivisions may be sued in the absence of specific statutory permission; (2) that where a right of action against the State or any of its political subdivisions is created by statute, such right may be circumscribed by any conditions that the Legislature may see fit to impose; and (3) that when the Legislature enacts a mandatory provision requiring in general terms that all claims must be presented before any action may be brought thereon, compliance with such condition is an indispensable prerequisite to the bringing of any such action by any person, regardless of his age or his physical or mental condition."

[4] As we understand the Farrell case it does not modify the foregoing rule as it is held that the time limit on filing the claim was directory under the circumstances there shown and that the County of Placer might be estopped by the fraud of its agents from urging that the claim was not filed in time. It did not hold that the action could be maintained without filing any claim and we have found no case so holding. As there was no right to bring this action at common law and as no such right exists independent of statute, plaintiff had no constitutional right to sue a public agency and its employee to recover his damages. He only had the right of action given by the statute and should have conformed to the requirements of the statute in bringing it.

[5] The argument on the question of the constitutionality of the act is answered in Young v. County of Ventura, 39 Cal. App.2d 732, 104 P.2d 102, 106, where it is said: "Plaintiffs cannot successfully argue that by the statutory requirement of filing a claim they were deprived of due process of law. The legislature has furnished due process to them but they did not avail themselves of it."

In view of the many cases holding that the filing of a claim is a necessary prerequisite to bringing an action for damages such as this we cannot hold that the second amended complaint stated a cause of action in the absence of an allegation that some claim had been filed.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Lorraine Florinè against Market Street Railway Company and Edward Daw for injuries sustained in collision between automobile driven by plaintiff and trackless trolley operated by defendant company and driven by individual defendant. From a judgment for plaintiff for $5,794, the defendants appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

Cyril Appel, Ivores R. Dains, George Liebermann, and George E. Baglin, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Walter McGovern, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PETERS, Presiding Justice.

On Sunday afternoon, October 12, 1941, at the intersection of Shotwell and 18th Streets in San Francisco, a collision occurred between the Ford coupe driven by plaintiff and the trackless trolley operated by the defendant Market Street Railway Company and driven by defendant Daw. Plaintiff suffered a brain concussion, broken ribs, shock and multiple bruises and contusions. The injuries have brought on a neurotic condition not theretofore existing, and have lit up a quiescent hypertrophic arthritic condition. For these injuries this action was instituted. The jury unanimously brought in a verdict for plaintiff for $5,794. From the judgment entered on this verdict defendants appeal.

The accident happened between 2:30 and 3 P.M. The day was clear, the streets were dry, the traffic was light. Respondent, just prior to the accident, was driving south on Shotwell Street. About the middle of the block between 17th and 18th Streets she observed two boys playing football. She slowed down to about ten miles per hour in passing the boys, and then increased her speed to about fifteen miles per hour. As she approached the intersection of Shotwell and 18th Streets, she took her foot off the gas. The intersecting streets are level and neither street is a "stop" street. There are buildings on all four corners. Shotwell Street is thirty feet wide from curb to curb, while 18th Street is thirty-four feet wide. Three of the sidewalks at the intersection are fifteen feet wide, and the fourth sidewalk, on the west side of Shotwell Street, is thirteen feet six inches wide. As respondent entered, or was about to enter the intersection, she looked to her left and observed an automobile coming west on 18th Street, which was then in about the middle of the block between Shotwell and Folsom Streets. She then looked to her right and observed the trolley coach about halfway between South Van Ness and Shotwell Streets. That block is 245 feet long, so that at that moment the trolley coach was over 120 feet from the west property line of Shotwell Street. Respondent testified that when she first observed the trolley coach she was unable to estimate its speed. The evidence of appellant Daw and of two other witnesses fix its speed at that point at twenty miles per hour. Respondent testified that, after observing the trolley coach she entered the intersection increasing her speed to fifteen miles per hour. She then again looked to her left, then looked ahead to observe conditions in the intersection, and then looked to her right for a second time. She then observed the trolley coach at about the west property line of Shotwell Street. At that moment the front of respondent's car was just about at the south curb line of 18th Street. Respondent estimated the speed of the trolley coach at that moment at between forty to fifty miles per hour. She thereupon increased her speed in an attempt to avoid the collision. The front of the trolley coach hit the Ford coupe about in the middle and slightly towards the rear. The Ford was pushed sideways from about the center of the street to the southeast corner and up on the sidewalk and against a telephone pole.

Peter Bruhn, whose car it was that respondent saw driving west on 18th Street, testified that when respondent's car was about to enter the intersection the trolley coach was about halfway between South Van Ness and Shotwell Streets.

Appellant Daw, the operator of the trolley coach, stated that he did not see the Ford until the front end of his bus was within two or three or three and a half feet of the westerly property line on Shotwell Street; that at that time respondent's car was about twenty-five feet from the north property line of 18th Street; that he thought that he had plenty of time to cross the intersection safely; that between South Van Ness and Shotwell Streets he was going about twenty miles per hour. The testimony of Daw as to the speed of the trolley coach was corroborated by the witness Rosemont, who was operating a truck about 100 feet behind the trolley coach, and by the witness Moore, a passenger in the bus.

Daw testified that he was looking straight ahead; that he did not see any cars pass across the intersection along Shotwell Street ahead of the Ford, and that he observed no cars at all on 18th Street. As already pointed out, the witness Bruhn was driving on 18th Street toward the coach and about a block away. The fact that at least two cars crossed the intersection immediately ahead of respondent was established by the testimony of respondent, of Bruhn, and of the two boys who were playing football on Shotwell Street.

It is obvious that the above evidence amply supports the judgment, and appellants make no contention to the contrary. They do contend that certain erroneous and prejudicial instructions were given the jury. It is urged that the evidence was conflicting, and would have supported a verdict for appellants, and that for this reason any error in the instructions was serious and prejudicial. Appellants argue that their testimony shows that the coach was traveling at a moderate rate of speed and entered the intersection at the same time or before the car of respondent. They also contend that, even if the Ford entered the intersection first, the jury would have been justified in finding respondent guilty of contributory negligence inasmuch as she observed the coach a half block away, and the jury could have found that she should not have rushed into the path of the swiftly moving trolley coach.

[1,2] It is true that there is a conflict in the evidence. It is probably true that a verdict for appellants, had the jury believed the testimony produced by them, would have been supported. This does not mean, however, that any error in the instructions was necessarily prejudicial. Each case must turn upon its own facts. The record as a whole must be considered, and the entire charge to the jury studied before a particular error in the instructions can or should be held to be prejudicial. Art. VI, § 4½ of the Constitution provides that: "No judgment shall be set aside, or new trial granted, in any case, on the ground of misdirection of the jury * * * unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice." This record demonstrates the efficacy of this constitutional provision. The case is one where the weight of the evidence favors respondent. When the charge is read as a whole it is obvious that the jury was fully, fairly and correctly charged on all of the basic issues. Under such circumstances any minor error that may have occurred in the instructions cannot and should not be held to have been prejudicial.

[3] The first instruction complained of is one in which the jury was told that the respondent, if herself free from negligence, had the right to assume and rely on the presumption that appellants would not violate the law. It is argued that the instruction erred in omitting the qualification that respondent could not rely on the assumption, after knowing, or having an opportunity by the use of reasonable care, to know that the law was not being observed. The instruction in question is three short paragraphs in length. The first paragraph starts: "A person who is herself free from negligence" and continues that such a person has a right to rely on the assumption that others will not be guilty of negligence. The third paragraph starts: "Therefore, if you find by a preponderance of the evidence that the plaintiff, Miss Florine, was herself free from negligence at the time and place of the accident in this case," then she had the right to assume that appellant Daw would act as a reasonably prudent person in the operation of the coach. Appellants urge that the evidence shows that respondent observed the trolley coach when it was a half block away; that, although the respondent testified that she could not then observe its speed, the jury could have disbelieved her; that the jury could have inferred from the testimony that the coach was going between forty to fifty miles per hour when it entered the intersection that it was going in excess of the speed limit a half block away, and that respondent should have noticed that fact. In other words, it is appellants' thought that the challenged instruction excluded the defense of contributory negligence. The instruction is not subject to the criticism offered. While the first paragraph used the phrase "A person who is herself free from negligence" has the right to assume that others will obey the law, and may be subject to the criticism that it fails to tell the jury that a person who, up to that moment, is free from negligence, may not assume the defendant will obey the law when the plaintiff knows or should know the defendant is not obeying the law, the third paragraph is much more explicit. After stating the general rule in the first two paragraphs of the instruction, the court then summarized as follows: "Therefore, if you find by a preponderance of the evidence that the plaintiff, Miss Florine, was herself free from negligence at the time and place of the accident in this case" (italics added) then she had the right to assume Daw would obey the law. Thus the jury was told not only that respondent must be free of negligence when she first observed the trolley coach, but also that she must be free of negligence at the very "time and place of the accident," before she could rely on the assumption that the trolley coach would obey the law. As so limited, the instruction was justified by the facts and correctly states the law. Moreover, there was no direct evidence that the coach was exceeding the speed limit when first observed by respondent, or, that if it was, respondent should have observed its illegal speed. Respondent testified that when she first observed the trolley coach she could not estimate its speed. On cross examination she stuck to her story that she had no idea how fast the coach was going when first observed. Appellants' witnesses all testified that the bus was going about twenty miles per hour at that spot. Respondent did testify that the bus was going between forty to fifty miles an hour when it entered the intersection. Under the facts disclosed by the record the instruction was proper. Forrest v. Pickwick Stages System, 101 Cal.App. 426, 281 P. 723.

Appellants, in contending the challenged instruction was erroneous, place their main reliance on the case of Angier v. Bruck, 56 Cal.App.2d 55, 131 P.2d 876. That case, both factually and legally, is distinguishable from the instant case. There the driver for plaintiff testified that as he approached the intersection he observed the defendants' automobile 100 to 125 feet away approaching at fifty to fifty-five miles per hour, and that he did not slow up but proceeded into the intersection. The court instructed that if you find that Raymond Angier "was at all times pertinent to this case driving plaintiff's automobile in a careful and prudent manner" then he had a right to assume that defendant would drive lawfully. The court properly held that the instruction should have been qualified by the statement that one cannot assume the law is being observed after he knows or should know it is being violated. Edlund v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 14 Cal. App.2d 673, 58 P.2d 928; Donat v. Dillon, 192 Cal. 426, 221 P. 193. The court held that the failure to give this qualifying instruction was reversible error. But in the present case there is no direct evidence that the coach was in fact violating the law when first observed by respondent—in fact, the evidence is quite uncontradicted that it was not. In the second place, the instruction in the instant case is quite different from that in the cited case. In the instant case the jury was told that before the respondent could rely on the assumption the jury must find that at the very "time and place of the accident" she must be "free from negligence." Obviously, if she knew or should have known the speed of the coach a half block away she would not be free of negligence at the "time" of the accident. Incidentally, our attention has not been called to any more explicit instruction offered by appellants on this subject. Under the circumstances, the instruction correctly stated the law.

[4,5] The appellants next complain of an instruction given at the request of respondents, and of another given at the request of both parties, dealing with rates of speed. The first instruction, given at the request of respondents, is in two paragraphs and told the jury in proper language that even though a vehicle was being driven at a rate of speed not in excess of the limit of speed fixed by law, such speed might constitute negligence dependent upon the existing conditions and circumstances. The instruction correctly states the law. Dam v. Bond, 80 Cal.App. 342, 251 P. 818; Griffith v. Oak Ridge Oil Co., 190 Cal. 389, 212 P. 913. Appellants do not contend that the instruction does not correctly state the law, but urge that the very next instruction, when read with the above instruction, must have misled the jury. The next instruction, given at the request of both parties, told the jury that the Vehicle Code provides: "No person shall drive a vehicle upon a highway at a speed greater than is reasonable or prudent having due regard for the traffic on, and the surface and width of, the highway, and in no event at a speed which endangers the safety of persons or property." The instruction correctly quotes § 510 of the Vehicle Code, St.1935, p. 176. The theory of the appellants is that by the second instruction the jury was told that the limit of speed fixed by the Vehicle Code is a speed that is reasonable and prudent under the circumstances, and that by the first instruction the jury was told that, although defendants' speed did not exceed that limit, such speed, under proper circumstances, might be negligence. This is a strained construction of the instructions. Appellants requested no instruction on the fixed speed limits contained in the Vehicle Code, nor did respondent. The two instructions, when read together, simply tell the jury that the fact that a vehicle is being driven at a speed not in excess of that fixed by the Code does not disprove negligence, and that under all circumstances speed must not exceed what is reasonable under existing conditions. Both instructions thus dealt with the same subject matter. The two instructions correctly and properly stated the law. If appellants wanted the court to elaborate on the instructions they should have offered one setting forth the fixed speed limit at that intersection. This they failed to do, apparently because they admitted in their opening statement that respondent was not driving at an excessive rate of speed. The instructions could not possibly have misled anyone.

[6] The appellants next contend that prejudicial error was committed by the trial court in inserting the word "lawfully" in the following instruction which was proposed by appellants: "If you find from the evidence that the trolley coach lawfully entered the intersection of Shotwell and 18th Streets at the time and place in question before, or at the same time as, the automobile driven by Miss Florine entered said intersection, the defendant Market Street Railway Company's trolley coach had the right of way." It is conceded by respondent that the word "lawfully" should not have been used. However, after reading the record, including the full charge to the jury, we are convinced that this minor error could not possibly have been prejudicial to appellants. Preceding this instruction the jury was correctly instructed in the exact terms of § 550, subd. (b) of the Vehicle Code, St.1937, p. 619, as to what the law provides as to right of way as to vehicles approaching an intersection, and were also fully instructed on this issue by another full and correct instruction offered by appellants on this same subject. Under the circumstances the error was not prejudicial.

[7] Appellants also complain of an instruction proposed by respondent and given by the trial court which, after correctly quoting § 550, subd. (a) of the Vehicle Code, dealing with right of way, stated: "If you find by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendants, at the time and place of the accident in question, disregarded the law as I have just read it to you, and that their disregard of such law was the sole proximate cause of the injuries inflicted on the plaintiff, Miss Florine, and on her automobile, then I instruct you that a verdict must be rendered for said plaintiff and against the defendants." Appellants urge that this so-called formula instruction is defective in that it fails to tell the jury that the doctrine there enunciated is applicable only if the plaintiff herself is free of negligence. It is somewhat difficult to follow this argument. The instruction states that it is only if they find that the defendants disregarded the right of way provision and if they find that such disregard was "the sole proximate cause of the injuries inflicted on the plaintiff" that it was to decide for plaintiff. When that instruction is read with the many other instructions on proximate cause and contributory negligence it seems obvious to us that the allegedly omitted element was in fact included. Appellants place their sole reliance, so far as this point is concerned, on Davis v. San Francisco, 45 Cal.App.2d 443, 114 P.2d 359; where the trial court refused to give a somewhat similar instruction. The appellate court held, under the circumstances there existing, that it was not error to refuse to give the instruction. The reason given by the court was that the instruction was incomplete in that it failed to state that the person first entering the intersection must himself be free from negligence. The instruction in the present case, particularly when read with the other complete and detailed instructions given, is not fairly susceptible of this criticism.

[8] The last objection of appellants is to an instruction on contributory negligence. The instruction reads as follows: "The defense of contributory negligence is an affirmative defense and, unless it appears from the evidence offered on behalf of the plaintiff, it must be established by the defendants by a preponderance of the evidence. Such contributory negligence on the part of a plaintiff which will bar a recovery must consist of some act or omission on her part which is the proximate cause of the injury, and such an act or omission as a person of ordinary prudence and care would not have done or omitted to do." Appellants urge that this instruction erroneously imposed on them the burden of proof and urge that it was not incumbent upon them to show by a preponderance of the evidence that respondent's contributory negligence was "the" proximate cause of her injuries, citing Dicken v. Souther, 59 Cal.App.2d 203, 138 P.2d 408. The objection is to the statement that it was incumbent upon the defendants to show that the contributory negligence was "the proximate cause of the injury." That phrase may be somewhat misleading. If it means that the burden was on appellants to show that the contributory negligence was the sole and only cause of the accident it would be incorrect. That was what was held in the Dicken case, relied upon by appellants. It was there held that since contributory negligence was involved, an instruction which purported to state that such contributory negligence was a defense only if it were the sole and only negligent act without which the accident would not have occurred was erroneous. That is undoubtedly correct. But the phrase here involved is not subject to that criticism. It would have been much better to have used "a" rather than "the," before "proximate cause," but under the circumstances the jury could not have been misled. Some eighteen correct instructions were given on the doctrine of contributory negligence and several instructions properly defined proximate cause. So far as the burden of proof is concerned, the case of Rush v. Lagomarsino, 196 Cal. 308, 237 P. 1066, is a complete answer to appellants' contention.

Appeals from Superior Court, Fresno County; Ernest Klette, Judge.

Action by Angelina Stewart, as administratrix of the estate of James E. Stewart, deceased, against John Norsigian, B. J. LaFontaine, and Pacific Finance Corporation of California, to recover for death of plaintiff's decedent as result of a collision between a motorcycle which he was riding and an automobile being driven by defendant John Norsigian. From a judgment in favor of the plaintiff against the defendants Norsigian and Pacific Finance Corporation of California, the defendant Pacific Finance Corporation of California and the plaintiff appeal.

Rae B. Carter and Edmond A. Chevalier, both of Fresno, for plaintiff and appellant.

Crider, Runkle & Tilson, of Los Angeles, for defendant and appellant.

Chester O. Hansen, of Fresno, for defendant and respondent.

MARKS, Justice.

This is an action by the administratrix of the estate of James E. Stewart, deceased, to recover damages resulting from his being killed in a collision between a motor cycle which he was riding and an automobile being driven by John Norsigian. The collision occurred in the early morning of either January 21 or January 22, 1942.

Plaintiff recovered judgment against Norsigian and Pacific Finance Corporation for $25,000 and judgment went in favor of B. J. LaFontaine for his costs. Pacific Finance Corporation has appealed from the judgment against it, and, as a matter of precaution, plaintiff has appealed from the portion of the judgment in favor of LaFontaine. Norsigian has not appealed. Both appeals are presented on the same transcripts so we will dispose of both of them in this opinion.

Pacific Finance Corporation urges that it was not the owner of the car driven by Norsigian and that he was not its agent, servant nor employee and was not driving the car on its business so no recovery could be had against it. As an alternative it argues that if it be held to be the owner of the car in question, and if Norsigian be held to have been driving it with the Corporation's implied consent, its liability is limited to $5000 by section 402 of the Vehicle Code, St. 1937, p. 2353.

Plaintiff argues that Pacific Finance Corporation was the owner of the car and that its liability arises under the doctrine of respondeat superior; that if this doctrine does not apply, then it must be held that Pacific Finance Corporation was the owner of the car which Norsigian was driving, with its implied consent, so that its liability is fixed by section 402 of the Vehicle Code.

Plaintiff assumes the same position in her appeal from the judgment in favor of LaFontaine, but states that if it be held that the Pacific Finance Corporation was not the owner of the car, and, that it is not liable under the doctrine of respondeat superior, then it must be held that LaFontaine was its owner and that his liability should be determined at a second trial.

LaFontaine was a dealer in new and used automobiles. He was doing business in the city of Selma in Fresno County under the name of Selma Auto Electric Company.

On August 30, 1941, LaFontaine sold the car in question, a Ford sedan, to Ray R. Blair on a conditional sales contract providing for monthly payments. LaFontaine assigned this contract and his interest in the car to Pacific Finance Corporation and guaranteed payment of the balance due. A registration certificate (pink slip) was issued showing Pacific Finance Corporation as the legal owner and Blair as the registered owner.

A very few days before the accident here in question, two or three according to the witnesses, Blair drove the car into the place of business of LaFontaine and told him that he was going into the Army or the Navy and he could not continue the payments on the contract and wanted to turn the car back. LaFontaine told him that he should notify the Pacific Finance Corporation at its office in Fresno that he had surrendered the car and had abandoned the contract. Blair replied that he would try to do so as the office did not close until five o'clock. There is no evidence that Pacific Finance Corporation received any notice of the surrender of the car other than the inference which might be drawn from an affidavit made by its representative to which we will later refer.

LaFontaine testified that when Blair surrendered the car, he, LaFontaine, became obligated to pay the unpaid balance on the contract; that he could either pay the balance out of his own funds or resell the car and pay the amount due out of the selling price. After the accident LaFontaine paid the balance due Pacific Finance Corporation and became the owner of the Ford. LaFontaine sold the Ford to a Mr. Woodward on March 31, 1942. There was no change in the record of ownership of the car between the time of the issuance of the pink slip when the sale was made to Blair and the time of the accident.

Norsigian was in the employ of LaFontaine as a mechanic. On the afternoon of January 20 or 21, 1942, he told LaFontaine that he wanted to buy a car and was interested in the purchase of this Ford; that before buying it he wanted to drive it. LaFontaine consented and Norsigian drove it home that evening. He then drove it to Fresno, returning towards Selma on Highway 99 early next morning. The collision which resulted in the death of Stewart occurred about two o'clock on that morning. There is no contention made that the accident was not proximately caused by the negligence of Norsigian.

We will first consider the liability of Pacific Finance Corporation under the doctrine of respondeat superior.

There is no evidence that Norsigian was ever employed by Pacific Finance Corporation or that any of its representatives had ever heard of him prior to the accident. The only evidence in the record on that subject is to the effect that Norsigian was employed by LaFontaine.

[1] Plaintiff calls our attention to the well established rules that all conflicts in the evidence are settled in the trial court and that on appeal all reasonable inferences must be drawn in favor of the verdict and judgment. Juchert v. California Water Service Co., 16 Cal.2d 500, 106 P.2d 886; Whitechat v. Guyette, 19 Cal.2d 428, 122 P.2d 47; Mah See v. North American Acc. Ins. Co., 190 Cal. 421, 213 P. 42, 26 A.L.R. 123. She then argues that one inference may be based on another inference (West Coast Life Ins. Co. v. Crawford, 58 Cal.App.2d 771, 138 P.2d 384) and maintains that the various inferences that may be drawn from the evidence support the verdict and judgment.

[2] While there is general language in West Coast Life Ins. Co. v. Crawford, supra, supporting the argument of plaintiff, a study of that case and others shows the rule to be that an inference may be based on another inference when the first inference is the only one which a reasonable mind could draw from the facts proven. It then becomes a proven fact and a subsequent inference may be drawn from it as an inference must be founded on a fact legally proved. Sec. 1960, Code Civ. Proc. This is recognized in the opinion in the West Coast Life Insurance Co. case.

Plaintiff argues that the doctrine of respondeat superior may be invoked here because of the inference of agency which she argues may be drawn where the car, owned by one person, is in the possession of another and is being driven by him. She cites cases in support of this argument such as Fearn v. Ralph Hamlin, Inc., 215 Cal. 211, 8 P.2d 1015; Ryan v. Farrell, 208 Cal. 200, 280 P. 945; Blank v. Coffin, 20 Cal.2d 457, 126 P.2d 868; and Souza v. Corti, 22 Cal.2d 454, 139 P.2d 645, 147 A.L.R. 861.

An examination of these cases and others discloses that such an inference has been drawn under two sets of circumstances: First. Where the operator of the car belonged to the family group of the owner, and second, where the driver was the employee of the owner. Certainly the family group cases cannot apply here. Norsigian was not employed by Pacific Finance Corporation. We have been cited to no case and have found none, permitting the drawing of such an inference, where the driver of the car was not an employee of the owner and was a total stranger to the owner, was not a member of the family group of the owner, and was not operating it under the direction of nor for the benefit of a member of his family.

A search of the record has disclosed no evidence justifying the inference that Norsigian was operating the car as the agent, servant or employee of Pacific Finance Corporation. All of the evidence, and it was all offered by plaintiff, is to the effect that Norsigian was a complete stranger to Pacific Finance Corporation and its representatives, that he was not employed by it and that they did not know he had possession of the car until after the accident.

[3-5] In Blank v. Coffin, supra [20 Cal. 2d 457, 126 P.2d 870], it was said:

"Whether a particular inference can be drawn from certain evidence is a question of law, but whether the inference shall be drawn, in any given case, is a question of fact for the jury. See cases cited in 10 Cal.Jur. 738-739, § 60.

"Usually, the opposing party introduces evidence as to the nonexistence of the fact in issue, and the jury must then determine the existence or nonexistence of the fact from all the evidence before it. If the evidence contrary to the existence of the fact is clear, positive, uncontradicted, and of such a nature that it can not rationally be disbelieved, the court must instruct the jury that the nonexistence of the fact has been established as a matter of law. (Citing cases.) The jury, however, is the sole judge of the credibility of the witnesses (Cal.Code Civ.Proc., § 1847; see cases cited in 27 Cal.Jur. 182, § 156) and is free to disbelieve them even though they are uncontradicted if there is any rational ground for doing so. (Citing cases.) In most cases, therefore, the jury is free to disbelieve the evidence as to the nonexistence of the fact and to find that it does exist on the basis of the inference."

Plaintiff maintains that the jury was fully justified in disbelieving the evidence of Norsigian and LaFontaine that the former was an employee of the latter and that he was not an employee of the Pacific Finance Corporation. She bases this argument on the fact that Norsigian was contradicted by other witnesses as to some of the circumstances of the accident and, on the further fact that LaFontaine made an affidavit that the Ford had not been operated on the highways of California after December 1, 1941, which was contradicted by the proven facts of the case.

[6] While this evidence might furnish sufficient reason for disbelieving the testimony of Norsigian and LaFontaine, that fact can not aid the cause of plaintiff. If the evidence of these witnesses as to the employment of Norsigian be rejected as untrue, there is an entire lack of any evidence on the question of his employment by any one. There is no claim that he belonged to the family group of Pacific Finance Corporation, nor to that of any of its representatives, so that question is eliminated from the case. If we eliminate his evidence, and that of LaFontaine, on the subject of employment, there is no evidence on that question and nothing to indicate employment by Pacific Finance Corporation. Under these circumstances there is an entire absence of proof of the fact of employment which must be established in order to support the inference of agency on which plaintiff bases her argument. It follows that we cannot support the judgment against Pacific Finance Corporation under the doctrine of respondeat superior. There is nothing in the record indicating that Norsigian was either its agent, servant or employee and no proven fact to support such an inference.

[7] We must next consider the liability of Pacific Finance Corporation under the provisions of section 402 of the Vehicle Code which makes the owner of a motor vehicle liable up to $5000 for death or injury to one person resulting from the negligent operation of the vehicle by a person operating it with the express or implied consent of the owner.

Subdivision (f) of that section, in effect at the time of the accident, provided in part as follows:

"If a motor vehicle is sold under a contract of conditional sale whereby the title to such motor vehicle remains in the vendor, such vendor or his assignee shall not be deemed an owner within the provisions of this section, but the vendee, or his assignee shall be deemed the owner notwithstanding the terms of such contract, until the vendor or his assignee retake possession of such motor vehicle." (Emphasis ours.)

In order to fix liability under section 402 of the Vehicle Code, two facts, in addition to negligence of the operator, must be established: First, that Pacific Finance Corporation was the owner of the Ford at the time of the accident and second, that Norsigian was driving it with the consent of Pacific Finance Corporation. In this connection it must be remembered that at that time Pacific Finance Corporation was shown as the legal owner, and Blair as the registered owner on the records of the Motor Vehicle Department as there had been no change in the registration of the car until after the accident. It must be borne in mind that the car was in the physical possession of LaFontaine on his sales lot in Selma; that he was the original vendor of the automobile with Pacific Finance Corporation as his assignee; that he had an understanding with Pacific Finance Corporation that it would finance new and used cars sold by him on conditional sales contracts and had guaranteed payment of the balance due under the Blair contract.

Under date of January 21, 1941, an agent of Pacific Finance Corporation executed an affidavit for it which contained the following:

"Pacific Finance Corporation of California being first duly sworn, deposes and says: That he is the owner within the meaning of the Vehicle Code of that certain Ford * * *; that as allowed under lease contract dated the 30th day of August 1941, he repossessed said Ford * * * on or about the 15th day of Jan. 1942, from R. R. Blair, whose post office address is/ was 640 Franklin, Fresno, for the following reasons: non-fulfillment of contract. Signed Pacific Finance Corporation of California. Countersigned R. N. Roe, and now has the above described vehicle in his possession."

This affidavit contains the only information in the record of the exact date of the surrender of the car which was regarded as a "repossession" by Pacific Finance Corporation which stated that on January 21, 1942, it had the car in its possession. As the car was then on the LaFontaine sales lot in Selma, where it had been since Blair surrendered it, the only conclusion to be reached is that the possession by LaFontaine was possession by Pacific Finance Corporation and for it.

When the car was repossessed by Pacific Finance Corporation, as stated in its affidavit, Blair's interest was forfeited under the terms of the contract and Pacific Finance Corporation became the owner of the car as the legal ownership and the registered ownership as shown on the pink slip became merged in it. This conclusion finds some support in subdivision (f) of section 402 of the Vehicle Code, already quoted, which in effect provides that the conditional sales vendor and his assignee shall not be considered the owner of the motor vehicle "until the vendor or his assignee retake possession of such motor vehicle."

Under the circumstances disclosed here we conclude that Pacific Finance Corporation was the owner of the car as that term was used in section 402 of the Vehicle Code in 1942.

We have little difficulty in concluding that the evidence justified the jury in the implied finding that Norsigian was driving the Ford with the implied consent of Pacific Finance Corporation at the time of the accident. As we have observed, LaFontaine had possession of the car for Pacific Finance Corporation and was obligated under his guaranty to pay the balance due on the purchase price. He testified that he could make this payment out of his own funds or by a resale of the car. This stands uncontradicted in the record. He held possession for Pacific Finance Corporation, had the right to sell the car and had it on his sales lot. His right to sell the car would include the use of the usual and ordinary means of effecting a sale which includes a demonstration to a prospective purchaser. The accident happened during such demonstration. It should make little difference whether the driver, during the demonstration, was an employee of LaFontaine or of the owner, or was the prospective purchaser. As LaFontaine had possession of the car for Pacific Finance Corporation, the owner, and had the right to sell it, the consent of the owner to the demonstration must be implied through consent given by LaFontaine.

We therefore conclude that Pacific Finance Corporation is liable under section 402 of the Vehicle Code in the sum of $5000 damages caused by the negligence of Norsigian while operating the car with its implied consent.

[8] We must next consider the appeal by plaintiff from the portion of the judgment in favor of LaFontaine.

Norsigian was bailee of the car while he was using it. Baugh v. Rogers, 24 Cal.2d 200, 148 P.2d 633. The liability of LaFontaine must arise, if at all, under the provisions of section 402 of the Vehicle Code. That section fastens liability only on the "owner of a motor vehicle". As we have concluded that Pacific Finance Corporation, and not LaFontaine, was the owner of the Ford at the time of the accident the judgment in favor of LaFontaine was proper.

The portion of the judgment in favor of B. J. LaFontaine is affirmed.

The judgment against Pacific Finance Corporation is reduced to $5000 and as so reduced is affirmed. As between plaintiff and Pacific Finance Corporation neither party will recover costs of appeal.

FRANC et al. v. BANK OF AMERICA NAT.
TRUST & SAVINGS ASS'N et al.

Civ. No. 14419.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.

1. Wills ⇨288(3), 423

Admission to probate of will established prima facie due execution in manner required by law by competent testator free from undue influence and placed burden on contestants to establish invalidity of will.

2. Wills ⇨163(1)

Generally, burden of proof as to fraud or undue influence is on will contestants or person who alleges their existence and exercise, and such burden never shifts, although, where contestants establish a prima facie case, person charged with fraud or undue influence has burden of meeting it.

3. Wills ⇨163(1)

Burden of showing freedom from undue influence in execution of a will is not cast upon a beneficiary who sustained no confidential relationship toward testator and who did not participate in procuring execution of will.

4. Wills ⇨166(7)

Evidence that principal beneficiary of will had opportunity to unduly influence testatrix and suspicions by contestants engendered by knowledge that such opportunity existed were insufficient to establish that will was induced by undue influence.

5. Wills ⇨166(5)

However unnatural will may appear and however much at variance with testator's expressions as to his intentions, it may not be held invalid on ground of undue influence unless there be an actual showing of that sort of pressure which overpowered the mind and mastered volition of testator at very moment of execution.

6. Wills ⇨163(2)

To impose on beneficiary under will burden of proof to show that will was not induced by coercion or fraud, a confidential relation between him and testator is not sufficient, and there must be activity on his part in preparation of will.

7. Wills ⇨326

In contest of will after probate for alleged undue influence exercised by proponent on testatrix, contestants' evidence which failed to show any activity on part of proponent in procurement of will was insufficient as against motion for nonsuit.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Goodwin J. Knight, Judge.

Proceedings in the matter of Flora V. Lewis, also known as Flora Vollmer, deceased, by Louis B. Franc and Mary A. Franc, contestants, against Bank of America National Trust & Savings Association, executor, and Sadie Lou Kramer and others, proponents, to revoke probate of decedent's will. From a judgment of dismissal after proponents' motion for nonsuit was granted, contestants appeal.

Affirmed.

Albeck & Albeck, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Irwin M. Fulop, of Los Angeles, for respondent bank.

S. Ward Sullivan, of Los Angeles, for individual respondent.

YORK, Presiding Justice.

This is an appeal by contestants from an order dismissing their petition for revocation of the probate of the last will and testament of Flora V. Lewis, deceased, after motion for nonsuit made on behalf of respondents was granted by the trial court at the close of contestants' case.

The record herein reveals that on June 5, 1942, immediately following the death of her husband Flora V. Lewis executed a will in which she appointed appellant Louis B. Franc, a friend of long standing, as executor thereof, and after making bequests to relatives and friends, she provided that appellants Louis B. Franc and Mary A. Franc should each receive 25% of her residuary estate. This first will was destroyed at the direction of testatrix by—attorney Edward Hervey, who drew it for her, and on June 15, 1942, Mrs. Lewis executed a new will in which she reduced the disposition to appellants by 2½% respectively, which percentage was added to the disposition made by testatrix to another legatee.

On August 1, 1942, Mrs. Lewis executed another will bequeathing sums of money to relatives and friends, devised her home to respondent Sadie Lou Kramer, who was also made residuary legatee, and appointed respondent Bank of America as executor. No mention was made in said will of contestants and appellants Louis B. Franc and Mary A. Franc.

Mrs. Lewis died on September 28, 1942, and on October 2, 1942, respondent banking association filed its petition for probate of the will of August 1st. Thereafter, Amelia O. Kramer, sister of testatrix, filed her petition in opposition to probate and on December 10, 1942, a stipulation for a dismissal with prejudice of the contest of said Amelia O. Kramer was filed; the said will of August 1, 1942 was admitted to probate, and letters testamentary were issued to respondent bank.

On March 3, 1943, appellants filed the instant petition for revocation of the probate of said will of August 1, 1942, on the ground that the execution thereof was procured by the undue influence of respondent Sadie Lou Kramer.

The answers of respondents admitted that appellants were legatees and devisees under the will of June 15, 1942, denied the allegations of undue influence, and as a separate defense alleged that appellants had actual notice in time to have joined therein of the contest before probate of Amelia O. Kramer.

The motion for nonsuit herein was made by respondents at the close of contestants' case on the ground that the record contained no direct evidence of undue influence and no evidence from which undue influence could be inferred.

It is urged that in determining the propriety of the order granting the motion for nonsuit, the court must accept the evidence in the light most favorable to appellants, and that the evidence submitted by them herein constituted a prima facie showing of undue influence, thus casting the burden on respondents to show that the will of August 1, 1942 was not induced by undue influence.

The admission to probate of the will of August 1, 1942, "established prima facie for all the purposes of the contest, that it was duly executed in the manner required by law by a testator who was competent, free from undue influence, etc. The burden of proof was on the contestants to establish its invalidity. It is plain, therefore, that unless the evidence introduced was of such a nature that it would have sufficed to legally support a conclusion of undue influence * * * there was no error in granting the motion for a nonsuit." See, also, 26 Cal.Jur. 759. Generally, the burden of proof as to the issues of fraud or undue influence is on the contestant or the person who alleges their existence and exercise and such burden never shifts, although where contestants establish a prima facie case, the person charged with fraud or undue influence has the burden of meeting it. In re Estate of Eackle, 33 Cal.App.2d 379, 91 P.2d 954. The burden of showing freedom from undue influence in the execution of a will is not cast upon a beneficiary who sustained no confidential relationship toward the deceased, and who did not participate in any way in procuring the execution of the will. In re Estate of Fleming, 199 Cal. 750, 251 P. 637. See, also, In re Shields' Estate, 49 Cal.App.2d 293, 121 P.2d 795.

[4] Appellants herein made no sufficient showing of undue influence in the procurement of the will of August 1, 1942, and their premise that the execution of said will was induced thereby is based upon nothing more than a present opportunity on the part of Sadie Lou Kramer to unduly influence the testatrix and the suspicions engendered by the knowledge that such opportunity existed.

[5, 6] As stated in Re Estate of Baird, supra, 176 Cal. 381, 384, 168 P. 561, 562: "The authorities in this state are numerous to the effect that however unnatural a will may appear to be, and however much at variance with expressions by the testator as to his intention with regard to the natural objects of his bounty, it may not be held invalid on the ground of undue influence unless there be an actual showing of that sort of pressure which overpowered the mind and mastered the volition of the testator at the very moment of execution. (Citation of authorities.) This is the well-settled general rule. There is a well-established exception to this rule upon which contestants rely here, to the effect that where one who unduly profits by the will as a beneficiary thereunder sustains a confidential relation to the testator, and has actually participated in procuring the execution of the will, the burden is on him to show that the will was not induced by coercion or fraud. As suggested in Estate of Higgins, 156 Cal. [257] 261, 104 P. [6] 8, a 'presumption of undue influence' arises from proof of the existence of a confidential relation between the testator and such a beneficiary, 'coupled with activity on the part of the latter in the preparation of the will.' The confidential relation alone is not sufficient. There must be activity on the part of the beneficiary in the matter of the preparation of the will. (Citation of authorities.)" See, also, In re Estate of Arnold, 16 Cal.2d 573, 581, 107 P.2d 25.

The evidence adduced at the trial herein reveals that testatrix, Mrs. Lewis, was a semi-invalid, suffering from palsy and was estranged from Amelia O. Kramer, her sister and only close living relative in Los Angeles where Mrs. Lewis resided. Respondent Sadie Lou Kramer was not related to Mrs. Lewis, but had been married to Mrs. Lewis' nephew, Vollmer Kramer, and was the mother of Billy Kramer. Mrs. Lewis' husband died on June 4, 1942, and, as hereinbefore stated, she executed three wills between that date and her own death on September 28, 1942, in all of which respondent Sadie Lou Kramer was named as a beneficiary. The first two wills were drawn by Edward Hervey, an attorney at law, who represented Mrs. Lewis in her capacity as administratrix of her husband's estate. Mr. Hervey testified that when Mrs. Lewis executed the first will on June 5, 1942, she stated in the presence of contestant Louis B. Franc that "Sadie Lou Kramer had been very helpful to her. She was taking care of things to her. She also told me that she (Sadie Lou Kramer) was divorced and she had a boy (Billy Kramer)." Mr. Hervey also testified that respondent Kramer was in the house when he arrived at Mrs. Lewis' home, but that she left very shortly thereafter; that Mrs. Lewis was "very fixed in her impressions and in her mind what she was going to do." Said witness also stated that he went to see Mrs. Lewis at her home between June 10th and June 15th in relation to her will; that a maid and respondent Kramer were there, but that Sadie Lou Kramer was not present at the discussion between him and Mrs. Lewis at which time the latter directed him what to put in the will of June 15th; that he had no discussions with Sadie Lou Kramer regarding either the will of June 5th or the will of June 15th, in which appellant Louis B. Franc was named executor, and in which both Mr. Franc and his wife were bequeathed a substantial portion of Mrs. Lewis' estate.

Shortly after her husband's death, Mrs. Lewis entered Dr. Herzen's sanitarium or rest-home, presumably to rest. She remained there until July 20, or 21, 1942, when she was removed to respondent Sadie Lou Kramer's home and where she resided for a couple of weeks. It was while Mrs. Lewis was residing at respondent Kramer's home that she executed the will of August 1, 1942, which has been admitted to probate.

Mr. Franc testified that he had a conversation with Mrs. Lewis after June 15th at which time "She said that Sadie Lou Kramer had made arrangements for her to go to the hospital or sanitarium to rest. She said she didn't want to go, but she has made the arrangements and 'I have got some valuable papers I would like to have you keep for me, while I am away at the sanitarium or rest-home.' She gave me an envelope containing the second will as it was made a few days before, and gave me some stocks and bonds which I had Mrs. Franc deposit in the safety deposit box." Mr. Franc stated that he visited Mrs. Lewis a few days after she entered the rest-home, and that Mrs. Lewis told him in the presence of Sadie Lou Kramer that she (Mrs. Lewis) wanted to go home. "I said, 'You made arrangements to stay here a month.' She said, 'I didn't make arrangements to stay here a month, Sadie Lou made all the arrangements.'" This witness also testified that on several occasions during the month of August after Mrs. Lewis had returned to her own home, he attempted to visit her, but on each occasion respondent Kramer told him that Mrs. Lewis was too ill to be seen; also that he knew nothing about the will of August 1, 1942 until the day of Mrs. Lewis' death.

Aside from the testimony of respondent Sadie Lou Kramer, who was called by appellants Franc under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the record is silent respecting the circumstances surrounding the execution of the will of August 1, 1942, which omitted any mention of appellants. Respondent Sadie Lou Kramer testified that Mrs. Lewis made her own arrangements with Dr. Herzen when she entered his sanitarium where she remained about one month, after which she stayed at respondent's home a little less than two weeks, because she (Mrs. Lewis) "was unable to get a nurse to take over to her own home." This witness denied that Mrs. Lewis asked her to call the Bank of America in connection with her property, but testified that either on the day or the day after she brought Mrs. Lewis home from the sanitarium, Mrs. Lewis "went to the bank herself and requested the man to come to the house. * * * I took her to the bank, and she asked me to go out to the car and wait for her.

"Q. Then you don't know what transpired there? A. No.

"Q. When did these men from the bank come out there to your house? A. Several days later.

"Q. Who were they? A. One is Mr. Kellerman.

"Q. Who was with him? A. He was alone.

"Q. Were you present at the conversation between them? A. No, I was not. I left the house. She told me there was nothing to do, and I went shopping.

"Q. When was the next time you saw Mr. Kellerman? A. Well, it was several days later.

"Q. Who was with him? A. A Mr. Marvin Glass.

"Q. Did they come to see Mrs. Lewis? A. They asked for Mrs. Lewis. * * *

"Q. Did you inquire of them as to the nature of their business? A. I did not. * * * I let them into the front room and called Mrs. Lewis.

"Q. Did you know Mr. Glass was an attorney? A. No, I did not.

"Q. Did you stay there during the conversation? A. I did not; I left the house again.

"Q. Did Mrs. Lewis ever tell you what conversation she had with these men? A. She did not.

"Q. Did you ever find out as to what her business with these men was? A. I found out since her death. * * *

"Q. When was that? A. The day she died."

Thereafter, on the 2nd or 3rd of August, 1942, respondent Kramer took Mrs. Lewis back to the latter's home with a nurse in attendance. Toward the latter part of August or the first of September, respondent Kramer began staying at Mrs. Lewis' home, but she did not move into said home until after Mrs. Lewis died.

Respondent Sadie Lou Kramer in reply to the question: "You have stated you were a constant visitor at Mrs. Lewis' home before she entered the sanitarium, did you not?", stated, "Every day. * * * When Mr. Lewis passed away there was nobody to be with her, and she asked me to stay until the funeral was over, and she made her own suggestion that this doctor had been caring for her for six months, thought she would go to his home, as the housekeeper she had was quitting and going back East. I couldn't leave my home, I had my obligations regarding my son. I stayed with her until she went to this rest-home at her request." This witness denied that she ever instructed "Dr. Herzen at the sanitarium not to allow any visitors to see Mrs. Lewis." She also denied that she kept the Francs from seeing Mrs. Lewis at her own home.

[7] Since the evidence produced on behalf of appellants failed to show any activity on the part of respondent Sadie Lou Kramer in the procurement of the will of August 1, 1942, it was inadequate to prove undue influence in the execution of the will. In re Estate of Arnold, supra. The evidence being insufficient to show that the will of decedent was the result of influence on the part of said respondent, the court properly granted the motion for nonsuit.

For the reasons stated, the order dismissing the petition to revoke the probate of the will is affirmed.

No. 12640.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

Motion to Modify Writ Denied June 22, 1944.

1. Executors and administrators ⇨85(4)

The remedial powers of Probate Court in discovery and accounting proceedings under the Probate Code are limited to remedial powers conferred by section 614, and court in such proceeding cannot determine dispute between person cited and representative of estate as to title to property or amount claimed to be due as result of accounting nor order disposition of property or punish for contempt for failure to obey any order so made. Probate Code, §§ 613-615.

2. Executors and administrators ⇨85(4)

Where probate discovery and accounting proceedings resolved itself into a dispute between executor and petitioner as to credit allowable to petitioner in operation of decedent's business, Probate Court was without jurisdiction to enforce collection of disputed items by execution or contempt proceedings. Probate Code, §§ 613-615.

3. Executors and administrators ⇨85(1)

The purpose of statute providing a method of compelling an accounting under oath by one who has been entrusted with any part of estate of a decedent is to place executor or administrator in possession of such facts as would authorize a civil suit to restore property to estate. Probate Code, § 615.

Special proceeding by Daniel F. McCarthy, petitioner, against Superior Court for the City and County of San Francisco, and T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge thereof, respondents, for a writ of prohibition to prohibit respondent court, sitting in probate, from enforcing by execution or contempt proceedings an order directing petitioner to turn over certain sums to the executor of the estate of Allie C. M. Osborne, deceased.

Writ issued.

Albert J. McGuire, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Lloyd J. Cosgrove, of San Francisco, for H. M. S. Osborne.

KNIGHT, Justice.

Petitioner has applied for a writ of prohibition to prohibit the superior court, sitting in probate, from enforcing by execution or contempt proceedings an order made in a proceeding instituted therein under the provisions of sections 613, 614 and 615 of the Probate Code, in the matter of the Estate of Allie C. M. Osborne, deceased.

The facts are as follows: For many years immediately preceding Mrs. Osborne's death, which occurred on March 30, 1942, she conducted a real estate and insurance business on Mission Street in San Francisco under the name of Stewart & Osborne, in connection with which she maintained a commercial account in the name of "Stewart & Osborne, Agent," at the Mission Branch of the American Trust Company. Part of her business consisted of collecting rentals for a great many property owners, which rentals she deposited in her bank account and afterwards drew checks thereon in favor of her clients for the amounts due them. For more than ten years petitioner had been associated with Mrs. Osborne's business in the capacity of a real estate and insurance salesman, working on a commission basis; and he assisted generally in carrying on the business. During such association they bought and sold considerable real property on their own account as joint tenants. Some of the property was income producing, and a few parcels stood in their names as joint tenants at the time of her death. In buying property it often became necessary for them to borrow money on trust deeds and mortgages; and in selling they frequently accepted deeds of trust and mortgages in part payment; so that at the time of Mrs. Osborne's death they were receiving income from real and personal property owned jointly by them, and they were also making payments on outstanding joint obligations. Furthermore at the time of Mrs. Osborne's death certain commissions were due petitioner on unpaid insurance premiums.

About two years prior to Mrs. Osborne's death she executed and delivered to the bank a power of attorney in the usual form required by banks, authorizing petitioner to draw checks on the bank account, and when she became ill and was about to be taken to the hospital, she instructed petitioner to carry on the business for her and to pay the clients of the office from the bank account whatever sums of money were due them. Thereafter and on Saturday, March 28, 1942, petitioner closed the bank account maintained by Mrs. Osborne and transferred the balance therein, amounting to \$3,182.31, to a new account which he opened at the same bank in the name of "Stewart & Osborne, by Daniel F. McCarthy." Mrs. Osborne died on the following Monday, March 30, 1942, and during that week and after her death, petitioner drew checks on said account to pay a number of the clients the amounts due them as rental collections. At the end of that week and on April 6, 1942, the executor named in her will and his counsel conferred with petitioner, at which time petitioner informed them fully as to what he had done concerning the bank account; and thereupon they authorized and instructed petitioner to continue on with the business in the usual manner and to account to them from time to time as to its financial condition. Pursuant to that arrangement petitioner remained in charge and operated the business until October 1, 1942, at which time the bank account was exhausted and a disagreement arose over the accounting. Thereupon petitioner filed suit against the executor, asking for a court settlement of the accounts, alleging the existence of a partnership between himself and Mrs. Osborne; but before an answer was filed therein he voluntarily dismissed the suit. The executor then instituted the proceeding in the probate court under the authority of sections 613, 614 and 615 of the Probate Code, by the filing of a complaint on oath wherein he alleged that petitioner had in his possession and under his control, and was concealing, certain sums of money belonging to the decedent's estate, to-wit: (1) \$3,182.31 withdrawn by petitioner from the American Trust Company; (2) rentals in a sum unknown to the executor but known to the petitioner, collected by petitioner from property owned jointly by the decedent and petitioner; (3) moneys collected on promissory notes secured by trust deeds and mortgages owned jointly by the decedent and petitioner, the exact amount of which was unknown to the executor but known to the petitioner; (4) premiums collected on insurance policies, the amount of which was unknown to the executor but known to petitioner. The complaint then went on to allege that although petitioner had furnished "various statements and sets of figures, that they do not, nor do any of them constitute an intelligible report or account of the amount, disposition or location of said moneys * * *." The prayer of the complaint was that petitioner be cited to appear and show cause why he should not (1) return and pay over to the executor "all money and property held and concealed" by petitioner; (2) account for all moneys belonging to the decedent which had been disbursed by petitioner, and (3) pay over to the executor "one half ($\frac{1}{2}$) of all moneys collected upon property or obligations owned jointly by" petitioner and decedent.

In obedience to the citation that was issued by the probate court petitioner appeared in person and by attorney and gave an account of the moneys referred to in the complaint; he also answered all questions put to him concerning the same. The hearing extended over three separate sessions of the court, with an intervening two weeks between the first and second sessions, and four weeks between the second and third sessions, to enable petitioner to supply a more definite account of the moneys he was charged with having received and disbursed. At the final session petitioner produced an expert accountant whom he had employed to audit the books, and according to the reports furnished by the accountant petitioner was indebted to the estate in the sum of $366.77, which petitioner agreed to pay. The executor refused to accept that amount; whereupon the proceeding was ordered submitted, and thereafter and on December 9, 1943, the court made and entered an order wherein it found that petitioner had "under his possession and in his control the sum of $2,153.24 * * * belonging to the Estate * * *." and that he "should be ordered to pay over" to the executor that amount; furthermore, "that said Executor shall have the aid of contempt process of this Court in the enforcement of this order and that executor [execution] shall issue thereon"; whereupon it was "ordered, adjudged and decreed" that petitioner was "indebted to the Estate of Allie C. M. Osborne, Deceased, in the sum of $2,153.24"; that he pay over to the executor said sum, and the costs incurred herein, and that a writ of execution issue thereon.

[1] Under the circumstances we are of the opinion that petitioner is entitled to the issuance of the writ. Sections 613, 614 and 615 of the Probate Code are reenactments of the provisions of sections 1459, 1460 and 1461 of the Code of Civil Procedure in substantially the same language. Estate of Escolle, 134 Cal.App. 473, 25 P.2d 860. Section 613 provides a means of discovery, by way of citation and examination, in cases where a person is suspected of having embezzled, concealed, smuggled or fraudulently disposed of property belonging to the estate of a decedent; and section 615 provides a method of compelling an accounting under oath by a person who has been entrusted with any part of the estate of the decedent. The remedial powers conferred upon the probate court for the enforcement of the provisions of sections 613 and 615 are embodied in section 614, the pertinent portions of which declare that if the person suspected of having embezzled, concealed, smuggled or fraudulently disposed of the property of the estate refuses to appear and submit to an examination touching the matters of the complaint, the court, by warrant for that purpose, may commit him to the county jail, there to remain until he submits to the order of the court or is legally discharged. Or if, upon such examination it appears that he has embezzled, concealed, smuggled or fraudulently disposed of any property of the decedent, the court may make an order requiring him to disclose his knowledge thereof to the executor or administrator, and may commit him to the county jail, there to remain until the order is complied with, or he is legally discharged. It appears to be well settled, however, that the power thus granted to the probate court by the foregoing sections ends with the discovery of the property and the enforcement of the remedial powers of the statute, and does not extend beyond that; and that where a dispute arises between the person cited and the representative of the estate as to the title to property, or the amount claimed to be due as the result of the accounting, the probate court cannot in such proceeding determine the issue, nor order property delivered up to the executor or administrator, or to be deposited as the court may order; nor under such circumstances does it have the power to imprison the person for contempt for failure to obey any order so made. In re Estate of De Barry, 43 Cal.App.2d 715, 111 P.2d 728; In re Estate of Troy, 92 Cal.App. 352, 268 P. 426.

[2, 3] In the present case, as stated, the petitioner appeared in response to the citation and rendered an account of the moneys and property received and disbursed by him in carrying on the decedent's business; also of the moneys and property owned jointly by him and the decedent; and he submitted to an examination touching all of those matters. The record discloses no evidence showing, nor does the probate court find, that there has been any embezzlement, concealment, smuggling or fraudulent disposal of the moneys or property of the estate. The proceeding resolved itself into a dispute over a matter of accounting, which involved three items for which petitioner claimed credit, to-wit: (1) $169.18 claimed to have been paid out by him as office expenses incurred prior to Mrs. Osborne's death; (2) $1,148.70 claimed to have been paid out by him as operating expenses of the business between the date of her death and October, 1942, when he surrendered the business to the executor; and (3) $468.70 which he claims he had previously paid to the executor as part of the estate's one-half of the net earnings received from the joint holdings. Therefore, in view of such dispute and the authorities above cited, the probate court is without legal authority to enforce the collection of those sums of money by execution or contempt proceedings. In other words, as said in substance in Re Estate of Olmstead, 216 Cal. 585, 15 P.2d 495, the object of section 615 is to place the executor or administrator in possession of such facts as would authorize a civil suit to restore the property held by another and claimed to belong to the estate.

It is ordered, therefore, that a writ of prohibition issue herein prohibiting the respondent court from taking further action by way of execution or contempt proceedings for the enforcement of the order entered on December 9, 1943.

THOMPSON, Justice.

Two appeals are presented upon this record. They emanate from a contest of will before probate. The contestant, Frankie Green Dick, the daughter of Robert Franklin Green, deceased, appealed from an order granting a new trial, after a jury returned verdicts in her favor on the issues of unsound mind and undue influence. The motion for new trial was prematurely made. The court failed to adopt the special findings of the jury or to determine the chief issue regarding the due execution of the will pursuant to Section 50 of the Probate Code. No judgment was rendered as required by Section 373 of that Code.

The proponents of the will also appealed from an order denying their motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdicts, which motion was made pursuant to Section 629 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The contestant asserts that an appeal in a probate proceeding does not lie from an order denying a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, and that proponents' appeal should therefore be dismissed. The contestant also claims that the order granting a new trial is ineffectual and void because the motion therefor was prematurely made without the adoption of the special findings of the jury, the determination of the other essential issues, including the due execution of the will, or the rendering of a judgment.

Robert Franklin Green, the testator, executed the will in question October 18, 1935. He was then about seventy-three years of age. He married his wife, Rosa Green, in 1904. They lived together as husband and wife only a brief period of time. They separated in 1904, since which date they have not lived together as husband and wife. At the time of their separation their property rights were settled. The estate consisted entirely of his separate property. The contestant, Frankie Green Dick, was born as the issue of the marriage. Mr. Green died August 31, 1939. The will, which was filed for probate, devised and bequeathed his entire estate in equal shares to his sister Mary Jane Snyder and his two nieces, Mrs. Freeman and Mrs. Erich. Ray E. Burson of Lodi was appointed executor without bond, and in the event of his death the Bank of America of that city was appointed executor of the will. The daughter filed a contest to the will before probate. That contest raised three issues, unsound mind, undue influence and fraud exercised in procuring the execution of the will. At the trial the last issue of fraud was withdrawn. The issues of unsound mind and undue influence were submitted to a jury for determination. Verdicts favorable to the contestant were rendered by the jury upon both issues. Evidence was adduced at the trial of the due execution of the will. The court failed to adopt findings either approving or disapproving the special findings of the jury. No finding was adopted regarding the essential question of the due execution of the will. No judgment was rendered. After the special verdicts of the jury were returned the proponents moved for judgment notwithstanding the verdicts pursuant to Section 629 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which was denied. The proponents then moved for a new trial under Section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which was granted by the court on the express ground of insufficiency of the evidence to support the special findings of the jury. From that order and from the order denying proponents' motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdicts, separate appeals were perfected. Both appeals are presented on the same record.

[1] We will first consider proponents' purported appeal from the order denying their motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdicts.

The proponents of the will gave notice of appeal from the order of the trial court denying their motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, under Section 629 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section provides in part: "Where a new trial is granted to the party moving for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, the order denying the motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict shall not be reviewed on appeal, unless the adverse party appeal from the order granting a new trial, in which case the order denying judgment notwithstanding the verdict may be reviewed on appeal."

Frankie Green Dick, the contestant of the will, who has also appealed from the order granting a new trial, contends that no appeal lies from an order in a probate matter denying a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, because Section 1240 of the Probate Code does not provide for an appeal from such an order. The contestant therefore asserts that proponents' purported appeal should be dismissed. With that contention we agree.

[2] The right of appeal is purely statutory. In the absence of such statutory authorization no right of appeal exists. Superior Wheeler Cake Corp. v. Superior Court, 203 Cal. 384, 264 P. 488; 1 Bancroft's Probate Pr. 410, sec. 223; 2 Cal. Jur. 111, sec. 4. Section 1240 of the Probate Code, which was adopted May 11, 1931, was based on former subdivision 3 of Section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In re Estate of Armstrong, 8 Cal.2d 204, 64 P.2d 1093; In re Estate of O'Dea, 15 Cal.2d 637, 104 P.2d 368; In re Estate of Allen, 175 Cal. 356, 165 P. 1011. In the O'Dea case, supra, the Supreme Court says, in holding that an appeal in a probate matter does not lie from an order denying relief under Section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, "We reiterate our adherence to the general rule, as stated above, and to the exception thereto as declared in [Re] Estate of Allen, supra." [15 Cal.2d 637, 104 P.2d 369.] The Allen case declares in that regard: "The order sought to be reviewed is not one from which an appeal lies. * * * the appellate jurisdiction in probate matters extends only to such orders and judgments as are specified in the third subdivision of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure. (Citing authorities.) This rule is subject to the limitation that an appeal will lie from an order granting or denying a motion for a new trial. * * * But, with this exception, subdivision 3 is the only part of section 963 to which resort may be had in determining what orders or judgments in probate may be made the subject of an appeal."

The exception above referred to, recognizing the right to appeal from an order in a probate proceeding granting or denying a motion for new trial, which was contained in subdivision 2 of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but not in subdivision 3 thereof, is apparently based on the statute as it existed in 1917, when the Allen case was decided. Since that time subdivision 2 of section 963 was amended in 1923 to also authorize an appeal "from an order * * * denying a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict." That same amendment is still contained in section 963. Upon the authority of the Supreme Court recognizing the right of appeal in probate matters from an order granting or denying a motion for new trial, we are unable to perceive why, if that appeal lies, the same authorization should not also apply to orders granting or denying motions for judgments notwithstanding the verdicts, which ground is now included in the same subdivision of that section. This conclusion is reinforced by the language of section 629 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1937. However, it has been definitely determined otherwise. In re Estate of Webster, 43 Cal.App.2d 6, 18, 110 P.2d 81, 87, 111 P.2d 355. In the case last cited, in which a hearing by the Supreme Court was denied, it is specifically said: "The attempted appeal from the order denying the motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, not being an appealable order under section 1240 of the Probate Code, is dismissed."

On the authorities above cited, the proponents' purported appeal from the order denying their motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict should be dismissed.

[3, 4] We shall now consider the validity of the order of court granting proponents' motion for a new trial.

The contestant gave notice of appeal from the order granting a new trial. The jury merely determined the two issues of alleged unsound mind and undue influence, which were submitted to it, in favor of the contestant. The record contains no decision of the court on any other issues. The question of due execution of the will, as required by section 50 of the Probate

Code, apparently has not been determined. No decree pursuant to section 332 of the Probate Code, admitting the will to probate, or denying probate, has been rendered or entered. Section 373 of the Probate Code provides that: "The jury must return a special verdict upon the issues submitted to them by the court; and upon the verdict, or upon the proof taken if a jury is waived, the court must render judgment, either admitting the will to probate or rejecting it."

The contestant asserts that the motion for new trial was premature and that the court lacked jurisdiction to grant the new trial since essential issues had not been determined and no judgment had been rendered. In support of that contention the contestant relies on In re Estate of McKenna, 138 Cal. 439, 71 P. 501; Cloud v. State Terminal Co., Ltd., 22 Cal.App.2d 568, 71 P.2d 600, and Frye v. Pacific Freight Lines, 27 Cal.App.2d 748, 81 P.2d 1027. In the McKenna matter, supra [138 Cal. 439, 71 P. 502], it is said:

"No finding, judgment, order, or other decision of the court appears in the record, or is referred to in the bill of exceptions; and it is said by the appellants' counsel in his brief, and, in effect, admitted by counsel for respondent, that there is none. The motion for new trial, the statement and affidavits on which it was made, and the order denying the motion, all relate exclusively to the verdict of the jury.

"It is clear, therefore, that there has been no decision of the case, and that the proceedings for new trial were prematurely taken, and, on that ground, that the motion was rightly denied. Morris v. De Celis, 41 Cal. 331; De Gaze v. Lynch, 42 Cal. 362; Baker v. Borello, 131 Cal. [615], 617, 618, 63 P. 914. The verdict of the jury did not dispose of all the issues raised by the petition of the contestants, and it was therefore the duty of the court to find upon the issues not thus disposed of. [In re] Estate of Benton, 131 Cal. [472], 475, 63 P. 775. Code Civ.Proc., § 1329."

In Re Estate of Benton [131 Cal. 472, 63 P. 776], last cited, the court said:

"The findings of the jury upon the issues submitted to them stand the same as the findings of fact made by the court in a civil action; that is, when we are brought to the consideration of their sufficiency to support the judgment rendered."

In the Frye case, supra, in which a hearing by the Supreme Court was denied, the court held that "proceedings for a new trial taken prematurely are a nullity and ineffectual for any purpose," and that a premature service of notice of motion for a new trial could not be waived. To the same effect are the cases of Middleton v. Finney, 214 Cal. 523, 6 P.2d 938, 78 A.L.R. 1104, and Root v. Daugherty, 201 Cal. 12, 255 P. 181.

It has been uniformly held that a motion for new trial under section 656 of the Code of Civil Procedure is premature until the court or a jury has determined all the issues involved. Barnes v. Foley, 189 Cal. 226, 207 P. 885; Bell v. Marsh, 80 Cal. 411, 22 P. 170; Bradley Co. v. Bradley, 37 Cal.App. 270, 173 P. 1009; San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irr. Co. v. James J. Stevinson, 30 Cal.App. 405, 158 P. 768; 20 Cal.Jur. 171, sec. 112; 1 Hayne on New Trial and Appeal, 103, sec. 18. The findings of a jury in a contest of will are special in their nature and must be adopted by the court before they become effective. Probate Code, sec. 373; 2 Hayne on New Trial and Appeal, 1299, sec. 234. In the authority last cited it is said:

"The tendency is to regard them [the verdicts in probate proceedings] as verdicts in equity cases; i. e., as advisory, and without effect, until adopted. * * *

"If verdicts in probate proceedings are thus to be regarded as advisory, as in equity, and require to be adopted before they become effective, the initiation of new trial proceedings before such adoption is premature, as in equity."

In the case of James v. Superior Court, 78 Cal. 107, 20 P. 241, a writ of mandamus was denied. The petition sought to compel the court to settle a statement on motion for new trial in a probate proceeding. Certain issues of fact were presented and decided by a jury in a probate proceeding. The jury was discharged and nothing further was done. The court took no further action. The Supreme Court said:

"The verdict of the jury in this proceeding * * * was merely advisory to the judge, and of no force or effect until adopted by him.

"In that state of the case we think the notice of intention to move for a new trial, and the presentation * * * of the settlement were premature."

We conclude that the motion for new trial in the present case was premature and that the court was therefore without jurisdiction to grant the motion.

The question of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the special findings of the jury on the issues of unsound mind and undue influence is elaborately argued by the respective parties. In view of our conclusion that the order granting a new trial was ineffectual and void, it is unnecessary and futile to discuss the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict.

The purported appeal from the order denying proponents' motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdicts is dismissed.

The order granting a new trial for lack of evidence to support the special findings of the jury on undue influence and unsound mind is reversed. Respondents, Henry F. Ellis et al., to recover costs on appeal.

Petition by J. B. In the fall of 1942 the Civil Aeronautics Administration of the United States Department of Commerce notified the City of Napa and the County of Napa that it desired to establish an airport south of the City of Napa, to be used as a public municipal airport except as it might be used by the United States Government for war and emergency purposes, and that the government proposed to expend not less than $800,000 in the construction of said proposed airport. The said Civil Aeronautics Administration requested said city and county to secure the lands necessary for said airport and submitted with said request a description of the lands sought, in accordance with surveys made by said government agency. The City of Napa withdrew from all interest in the said proposed airport and the County of Napa proceeded with the matter, and on July 2, 1943, the Board of Supervisors of said county passed a resolution to the effect that the public interest required the establishing of a county airport for the passage, landing and taking-off of aircraft on, upon, over and across the 622.42 acres of land described in said resolution; that the use of all of said lands was necessary as a right of way for the passage, landing, and taking-off of aircraft and for county airport purposes; and authorizing the District Attorney to institute such action or actions "as are necessary to condemn said lands for a right of way for the passage, landing, and taking off of aircraft and for county airport purposes."

On July 15, 1943, the County of Napa commenced in the Superior Court of said county an action to condemn 119.85 acres of land belonging to petitioner J. B. Almada "as a right of way for the passage, landing and taking-off of aircraft and for county airport purposes." The land of petitioner was one of a number of contiguous parcels of land owned by different owners, all of said parcels sought to be condemned aggregating the total of 622.42 acres. On the same day that the complaint was filed the said Superior Court made an order entitled "Order Granting Plaintiff Right to Take Immediate Possession of Proposed Right of Way for the Passage, Landing and Taking off of Aircraft and for County Airport Purposes, and Fixing Damages." After the filing of said order, the said Civil Aeronautics Administration entered into the possession of said land of petitioner and continues in possession thereof. Thereafter petitioner J. B. Almada filed in the said Superior Court a motion to set aside the said order granting immediate possession, which said motion was, after hearing, denied by said court. Petitioners then filed in this court a petition for a writ of certiorari, and an alternative writ was issued by this court commanding said Superior Court to certify to this court a transcript of the record and proceeding in said action in order that the same might be reviewed by this court and appropriate action taken thereon in relation thereto. A certified copy of the various pleadings, proceedings and orders filed in said Superior Court in said action have been filed herein and constitutes the record before this court.

Petitioners in their written memorandum of authorities and upon the oral argument made the following contentions:

"1st. That the land sought to be condemned was not a 'right of way', but was a large block of land sought for airport purposes.

"2nd. That the land sought to be condemned, to-wit: 622 acres, being for airport purposes, plaintiff was not entitled to immediate possession, or before judgment, or to have the block of land determined to be a 'right of way'.

"3rd. That the Court did not have jurisdiction to make the order for immediate possession, and acted in excess of its jurisdiction because it did not have, or receive evidence respecting the value of the crops and pasturage on the land, and the interests of lessees therein."

It is apparent at the outset that the principal question here involved is whether or not the land sought to be condemned can be considered a "right of way" as that term is used in section 14 of Article I of the Constitution of California, which provides:

"Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having first been made to, or paid into court for, the owner, and no right of way or lands to be used for reservoir purposes shall be appropriated to the use of any corporation, except a municipal corporation or a county or the State or metropolitan water district, municipal utility district, municipal water district, drainage, irrigation, levee, reclamation or water conservation district, or similar public corporation until full compensation therefor be first made in money or ascertained and paid into court for the owner, irrespective of any benefits from any improvement proposed by such corporation, which compensation shall be ascertained by a jury, unless a jury be waived, as in other civil cases in a court of record, as shall be prescribed by law; provided, that in any proceeding in eminent domain brought by the State, or a county, or a municipal corporation, or metropolitan water district, municipal utility district, municipal water district, drainage, irrigation, levee, reclamation or water conservation district, or similar public corporation, the aforesaid State or municipality or county or public corporation or district aforesaid may take immediate possession and use of any right of way or lands to be used for reservoir purposes, required for a public use whether the fee thereof or an easement therefor be sought upon first commencing eminent domain proceedings according to law in a court of competent jurisdiction and thereupon giving such security in the way of money deposited as the court in which such proceedings are pending may direct, and in such amounts as the court may determine to be reasonably adequate to secure to the owner of the property sought to be taken immediate payment of just compensation for such taking and any damage incident thereto, including damages sustained by reason of an adjudication that there is no necessity for taking the property, as soon as the same can be ascertained according to law. The court may, upon motion of any party to said eminent domain proceedings, after such notice to the other parties as the court may prescribe, alter the amount of such security so required in such proceedings."

[1] In 1918 said section 14 of Article I was amended by adding the portion commencing with the word "provided" and hereinbefore set forth. This amendment gave any of the political subdivisions therein mentioned the right in an eminent domain proceeding to "take immediate possession and use of any right of way * * * required for a public use" in accordance with the provisions of the amendment. The purpose of this amendment was well expressed in the following quotation from the official argument appearing in the election pamphlets:

"The principal purpose of this amendment is to permit the state, a county, a municipal corporation, or a drainage, irrigation, levee or reclamation district, when acquiring rights of way only, in eminent domain proceedings, to take possession upon commencing a condemnation suit and depositing in court such amount of cash money as is fixed by the court to secure the owners in the final payment of the compensation and damages fixed by the jury. If it should appear later that this amount is in adequate the court is empowered to increase it.

"Experience has shown that cities, in acquiring long stretches of rights of way for public purposes, are often held up by unreasonable and arbitrary owners who attempt to take advantage of a rule which requires that the city can not go into possession prior to a jury actually fixing the compensation to be paid."

Petitioners concede that the County of Napa has a right to condemn the land in question for airport purposes under subdivision 20 of section 1238 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but petitioners contend most earnestly that said county was not entitled to immediate possession, or to possession before judgment, and that the Superior Court of Napa County exceeded its jurisdiction in making its order for immediate possession.

[2] The District Attorney of Napa County on behalf of respondent, and the Attorney General, appearing as amicus curiae on behalf of respondent, argue that the term "right of way" should be liberally construed and that "land condemned for the passage, landing and taking-off of aircraft and for county airport purposes constitutes a right of way within the meaning of Art. I, Section 14." They stress the undoubted importance of aerial travel and transportation and argue that airports and airport facilities are but necessary links in the chain of aerial highways and are but necessary adjuncts to aerial transportation. This argument is ingenious but not convincing. We believe that it must be held that when in 1918 the said section 14 of Article I was amended so as to provide for the taking of immediate possession of a "right of way," the people intended the term "right of way" to have its usual and ordinary meaning.

Webster's New International Dictionary defines a right of way as "a right of passage over another person's land." And this definition has been so universally incorporated into innumerable decisions that it may be said to be generally accepted. Sometimes it is a right of way for a road, sometimes for a ditch, sometimes for a canal, but whatever the particular right of way may be for, it is a right of passage over another person's land, or, in other words, an easement to use the land of another for such particular purpose. See 54 C.J. 824. As was said in the case of San Pedro, etc., R. Co. v. Pillsbury, 23 Cal.App. 675, at page 680, 139 P. 669, 671: "The term 'right of way' denotes the tenure by which land is held; it is descriptive of the easement right and not of the land to which it is affixed."

In the early case of Kripp v. Curtis, 71 Cal. 62, at page 63, 11 P. 879, the court said:

"The privilege which one person, or particular description of persons, may have of passing over the land of another in some particular line is termed a right of way.

"It is an incorporeal hereditament, (3 Kent, Comm. 419; Washb. Easem. 215; Boyce v. Brown, 7 Barb. [N.Y.] 80,) an easement which does not necessarily divest the owner of the fee of the land, and, for all other purposes except the servitude or use as a way, he owns it, and may have his action for an injury to his residuary interests as fully as he would be entitled to were it all of his own. Gidney v. Earl, 12 Wend. [N.Y.] 98."

Section 802 of the Civil Code provides: "The following land burdens, or servitudes upon land, may be granted and held, though not attached to land: * * * Five. The right of way." And in Stockton Gas, etc., Co. v. San Joaquin County, 148 Cal. 313, at page 322, 83 P. 54, at page 58, 5 L.R.A., N.S., 174, 7 Ann.Cas. 511, it is said: "Under section 802 of the same Code, 'the right of way' is designated as among the land burdens which may be granted or held, although not attached to land. This right of way, an easement, is real property, and is distinctly and necessarily local in character, and situated in and upon land."

In 9 Cal.Jur. it is said at page 964:

"The privilege which one person or particular description of persons may have of passing over the land of another in some particular line is termed a right of way. Technically, a right of way is merely an easement and does not necessarily divest the owner of the fee of the land although the term is often used indiscriminately to describe either the easement itself or the strip of land that is occupied for the easement."

[3] It is apparent from the complaint in the eminent domain proceeding, and from the maps of said proposed airport and of the land sought to be condemned therefor, that what is being sought by the County of Napa is a tract of land for county airport purposes. Under subdivision 2 of section 1238 of the Code of Civil Procedure the county had the undoubted right to condemn said land for such purpose. But we do not believe that merely by designating said land as "a right of way for the passage, landing and taking-off of aircraft" the County of Napa could transform said tract of land into a "right of way" within the meaning and intent of section 14 of Article I. Since the "immediate possession" amendment as to right of way was added to the constitution in 1918, said "immediate possession" clause has been further amended to include "lands to be used for reservoir purposes," and it may well be that a still further amendment adding state, county and municipal airports would be highly desirable. However, such an amendment must come, if at all, in the manner provided for in the constitution, and not through strained judicial interpretation.

In view of the foregoing we conclude that the Superior Court of the County of Napa exceeded its jurisdiction in making its order of July 15, 1943, granting the County of Napa immediate possession of land of petitioner J. B. Almada and that said order should be annulled.

The order is annulled.

Guardian and ward ☞13(1)

Where petition for adoption was filed more than three months before petition for guardianship was filed and only apparent purpose of guardianship petition was to enable petitioner to obtain physical custody of child, the court had right to determine issues presented under the adoption proceeding before ruling on merits of guardianship proceeding.

2. Courts ☞26

proceeding was continued until after trial and determination of adoption proceedings involving same child.

4. Guardian and ward ☞10

A decree of abandonment does not create a forfeiture of all right of parent to subsequently apply for appointment of guardian for minor child, but parent may regain custody of his child upon proper showing if intervening rights have not arisen.

5. Adoption ☞12

Where child had been judicially determined to be an abandoned child, notice of adoption proceeding to parent was unnecessary.

6. Adoption ☞15

Where trial court had knowledge of fact that minor had been declared an abandoned child and that father's petition for appointment of guardian was pending, but after hearing all evidence court granted decree of adoption, the decree of adoption was entitled to all presumptions which attach to any other judgment of court, and burden rested on objecting father to establish an abuse of discretion by trial court.

7. Adoption ☞13, 15

In proceedings for adoption of minor which had been declared an abandoned child, a wide discretion is reposed in trial judge, and his decision should not be disturbed by reviewing court, in absence of clear showing of abuse of discretion.

8. Adoption ☞13

Where minor had been declared an abandoned child, granting petition of a great aunt and her husband for adoption of the child over objections of father who had filed petition for appointment of guardian was not an abuse of discretion, under record.

9. Guardian and ward ☞10

Where minor had been declared an abandoned child and petition of great aunt and her husband for adoption had been granted, order denying father's petition for appointment of guardian was proper.

10. Guardian and ward ☞13(8)

Where minor had been declared an abandoned child and petition for adoption had been granted, in dismissing father's proceeding for appointment of guardian, failure of court to find that father was not a fit and proper person to have custody of the child was not prejudicial, since intervening rights of adoptive parents justified the dismissal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; W. L. Bradshaw, Judge.

Proceedings in the matter of the guardianship of Kathleen Norma Peterson, wherein Leo R. Peterson filed a petition for letters of guardianship, and Earl V. Pitzer filed objections, and proceeding in the matter of the adoption of Kathleen Norma Peterson, a minor, wherein Earl V. Pitzer and Mildred A. Pitzer filed petition for adoption which was opposed by Leo R. Peterson. From order denying letters of guardianship and from decree of adoption, Leo R. Peterson appeals. The two appeals were consolidated.

Decree of adoption and order denying letters of administration affirmed.

Mack, Werdel & Bianco, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

West & Vizzard, of Bakersfield, for respondents.

GRIFFIN, Justice.

By stipulation, the two appeals have been consolidated. Appellant Leo R. Peterson is the petitioner for letters of guardianship and the objector in the adoption proceeding. He is the father of Kathleen Norma Peterson, five years of age. On September 1, 1942, by order of the Superior Court of Kern County, the minor was declared to have been abandoned by her parents and freed from their custody and control. This decree was affirmed on appeal. In re Peterson, 56 Cal.App.2d 791, 133 P.2d 831. On February 24, 1943, petitioners Earl V. Pitzer and Mildred A. Pitzer filed a petition for adoption of the minor. On June 2nd, 1943, the father of the child filed a petition for letters of guardianship alleging his relationship, the entry of the decree of abandonment, and prayed to be appointed guardian of the child. On June 10, 1943, the Pitzers filed objections thereto alleging that Peterson had forfeited all right to guardianship because he had wilfully abandoned and failed to provide for his child; that he had been judicially deprived of her custody by a decree of abandonment and that they had filed a petition for leave to adopt the child, which petition would be heard before July 1, 1943. They also alleged that the petition for guardianship was filed for the purpose of hindering and delaying the adoption.

On June 18, 1943, the guardianship proceeding came on for hearing before Judge Lambert in department two of the Kern County court. Testimony was produced by Peterson indicating a change of his marital and home status. He set forth certain facts indicating that the home and marital conditions described in the former opinion (In re Peterson, supra), had changed and that his home was now a suitable place for the care of the minor and that he was a fit and proper person to have custody of his child. Before any evidence was produced by Pitzers and before any decision was made in the guardianship matter, when it was called to the attention of the court that the adoption proceeding was soon to be heard, according to the minutes, by oral stipulation, the court continued the further hearing of the matter to July 16, 1943. The reporter's transcript indicates the continuance was on the court's own motion or suggestion, and without objection by either party. It apparently was the belief of the trial judge that the adoption proceeding might adjudicate and make unnecessary a determination of the guardianship proceeding.

Because of the decree of abandonment, no notice of the petition for adoption was served on appellant. He claims that it was not until the objections to the guardianship proceedings were filed that he discovered the pendency of the petition for adoption. On June 29, 1943, he filed his objection thereto in which he alleged his efforts to prevent the decree of abandonment, his remarriage, his fitness to have the minor child in his custody, and similar allegations.

On July 1, 1943, the adoption proceeding was heard in department 3 of that court before Judge Bradshaw. Peterson introduced about the same evidence as was produced in the guardianship proceeding. The entire file of that proceeding was introduced into evidence. On July 8, 1943, Judge Bradshaw entered a minute order granting the petition for adoption and directed that findings and decree be prepared accordingly. On July 14, 1943, Peterson filed a notice of motion that on July 23, 1943, he would move for an order setting aside "the submission" and to reopen the adoption proceeding for the purpose of presenting therein the final determination of the guardianship proceeding. On July 16, 1943, when the guardianship proceeding came on for further hearing before department two, the judge of that department, of its own motion, transferred the proceeding to department 3 and set July 23, 1943, as the time for further hearing. When the matter came on for hearing in department 3 on July 23, appellant moved the court for an order setting aside the "order of submission". The guardianship matter was never ordered submitted in department 3. The motion was made upon an affidavit which recited the proceedings taken. It was there urged that the guardianship proceeding was the only case where the fitness of appellant was a proper issue and that such issue should be determined before any final decree was entered in the adoption proceeding. The motion was denied. At the same time the court denied the petition for letters of guardianship stating that "to allow the adoption * * * automatically would do away with the guardianship proceeding". No further evidence was presented to or heard by the judge denying the petition for guardianship. The court thereafter, on July 23, 1943, signed findings of fact and conclusions of law and a decree granting the petition for adoption.

In the findings in the adoption matter it is recited that the child had been abandoned and declared free from the custody and control of her parents; that Mrs. Pitzer is a great aunt of the minor and that the child had been under her care and had been supported by her since November, 1938; that the father had not contributed to the child's support since then. The trial court then concluded that the Pitzers were fit and proper persons to become the adoptive parents and that the best interests of the child would be promoted by the adoption of the child by them. A proposed sentence in the findings that Peterson "is not a proper person to have the custody and control of said minor" was, by the trial court, stricken out. A decree was then entered granting the order of adoption. The trial court, on August 2, 1943, signed an "order" in the guardianship proceeding reciting the various steps that had been taken in the proceeding; that the court had granted the petition for adoption and the "court being fully advised of the premises" ordered that the petition for letters of guardianship be denied and dismissed.

On appeal from this order and the decree granting the adoption appellant first contends that under the evidence produced, and in the absence of a finding of his unfitness, he was, as a matter of right, entitled to an order appointing him guardian of the minor child; that therefore the order of adoption was erroneously granted.

[1-3] We will first consider the question of the appeal from the decree granting the adoption. The petition for adoption was filed more than three months before the petition for guardianship was filed. It was disclosed by the evidence that the minor had no property and the only apparent purpose of the petition for letters of guardianship was to enable petitioner to obtain physical custody of the child. The guardianship proceeding was continued by the court, either by stipulation of the parties, or without objections, until after the hearing and determination of the adoption proceeding. It cannot be said that the trial court had no right to hear and determine the issues presented under the adoption proceeding before ruling on the merits of the guardianship proceeding. Brown v. Campbell, 100 Cal. 635, 636, 35 P. 433, 38 Am.St.Rep. 314. Where a court has general jurisdiction of a subject, it has power to make a full disposition of the matter and conclude the litigation respecting it. Kennedy v. Hamer, 19 Cal. 374. Appellant cannot now be heard to complain for the first time on appeal that the hearing of the guardianship proceeding was continued until after the trial and determination of the adoption proceeding. Myers v. McDonald, 68 Cal. 162, 8 P. 809; 2 Cal.Jur. p. 246, sec. 74.

[4] It has been held that a decree of abandonment does not create a forfeiture of all right of a parent to subsequently apply for an appointment as guardian of a minor child. Guardianship of McCoy, 46 Cal.App.2d 494, 497, 116 P.2d 103. He may regain the custody of his child upon a proper showing if intervening rights have not arisen such as adoption of the child by another. Matter of Guardianship of Michels, 170 Cal. 339, 149 P. 587.

[5-7] In the instant case the father appeared and presented his objections to the adoption although notice to the parent was unnecessary where the child had been judicially determined to be an abandoned child. The trial court had knowledge of the fact that the minor had been declared an abandoned child and that a petition for the appointment of a guardian was pending. After hearing all the evidence it granted the decree of adoption. In such a case the order of adoption is entitled to all the presumptions which attach to any other judgment of such courts and the burden rests upon appellant to establish an abuse of discretion by the trial court. In such a case a wide discretion is reposed in the trial judge and his decision should not be disturbed by a reviewing court in the absence of a clear showing of an abuse of such discretion. Adoption of Kelly, 47 Cal.App.2d 577, 118 P.2d 479; In re Hickson's Adoption, 40 Cal.App.2d 89, 93, 104 P.2d 411.

In In re Fahlman, 84 Cal.App. 248, 250, 257 P. 893, 894, it is said:

"The trial court, in addition to oral testimony as to the fitness and capacity of the persons applying for adoption of the minor, had before it the individuals making the application and also the individuals filing the opposition thereto, and as sections 224, 225, 226, and 227 of the Civil Code, relating to adoption of minors, give no preference whatever to relatives, or other persons, making application for adoption, it would require a very clear case of the abuse of the judicial discretion vested in the trial court to authorize an appellate court to set aside an order of adoption, where the proceeding is shown to be taken and had according to the procedure specified by the Codes, and the fact of relationship only is urged as a cause for reversal.

"In guardianship proceedings, where both the estates and custody of minors may be involved, the Codes set forth certain preferences as to who may be appointed, but when it comes to the matter of adoption, the future welfare of the minor is the only matter for consideration. Under such circumstances, the Legislature has left such determination to the judicial discretion of the trial court."

[8] It there was held that an appellate court is confined to the record and when the record shows nothing reflecting upon the persons to whom the letters have been awarded, a reviewing court cannot declare the determination of the trial court erroneous, even though all the persons opposing the granting of letters may likewise be fit and proper persons to whom adoption letters might be granted. Appellant has cited Guardianship of McCoy, supra, and Matter of Guardianship of Michels, supra, but it is evident that authorities involving guardianship matters do not serve as authority to create a priority or preference in favor of appellant in the adoption matter herein. It therefore appears from the evidence and record in the adoption proceeding that the trial court was warranted in granting the decree of adoption. This court may not successfully hold that any abuse of discretion has been shown in granting it. That decree, therefore, must be affirmed on appeal.

[9] The judge who granted the decree of adoption was fully authorized to proceed with the further hearing of the petition for guardianship. At the time of the signing of the order denying and dismissing that proceeding intervening rights of the adopting parents had arisen under the decree of adoption. The order denying the petition and dismissing the proceeding, for the reasons shown in the order, was proper and must be affirmed.

[10] In dismissing the proceeding, the failure of the court to find in the order that the "appellant was not a fit and proper person to have the custody of the child" was not prejudicial. The only finding necessary on this subject, under the facts disclosed, was that intervening rights had arisen and therefore there was no need or necessity for the appointment of a guardian. The order sufficiently disposes of that issue. Guardianship of Sharp, 41 Cal. App.2d 79, 84, 106 P.2d 244.

The decree of adoption and order denying letters of guardianship are and each is affirmed.

CROWE et al. v. McBRIDE.*

Civ. 2869.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Hearing Granted July 24, 1944.

1. Negligence ⇨121(2)

The "res ipsa loquitur doctrine" is applicable where accident is of a kind which does not ordinarily occur in absence of negligence on part of one having management or control of thing which caused the injury.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Res Ipsa Loquitur".

2. Negligence ⇨121(2)

The "res ipsa loquitur doctrine" is based upon theory that defendant, having charge of instrumentality which caused the injury, either knows the cause of the accident or had means of knowledge in that connection which was superior to that possessed by the injured party.

3. Physicians and surgeons ⇨18(6)

Where patient was injured when lamp globe exploded while physician was giving her a treatment with large infrared heating lamp, "res ipsa loquitur doctrine" was not applicable to establish negligence on part of physician.

4. Negligence ⇨121(2)

The "res ipsa loquitur doctrine" is only a rule of evidence raising an inference of negligence from proved facts and not an independent ground of liability.

5. Physicians and surgeons ⇨18(8)

Evidence failed to establish that physician was negligent in giving patient a treatment with large infrared heating lamp without using screen on lamp to protect patient when globe exploded, so as to render physician liable for injuries sustained by patient, in absence of showing that such lamp had ever previously exploded or justifying inference that physician should have anticipated such an occurrence.

juries sustained by the plaintiff Bertha Crowe. From a judgment for defendant, following granting of defendant's motion for nonsuit, the plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

Harry P. Sweet, of San Diego, for appellants.

Gray, Cary, Ames & Driscoll, of San Diego, for respondent.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

This is an action for damages. Mrs. Crowe suffered from arthritis and neuritis and at frequent intervals over a period of four years Dr. McBride had been giving her treatments in which he used large infrared heating lamps. On December 6, 1940, while she was taking one of these treatments the globe of the lamp suddenly exploded and parts of the hot glass fell upon her body, causing the injuries of which complaint is made.

The complaint alleged that the defendant "did not use due and proper care and skill" in giving this treatment and that he "so carelessly and unskillfully employed, manipulated, operated and controlled the appliances and apparatus, particularly the electric lamps, used in and about said treatment as to seriously, painfully and permanently injure" this plaintiff.

The evidence is very meager. Mrs. Crowe testified that on this occasion she laid on a table with her back exposed; that she was supposed to have a 20 minutes light treatment; that it was a rather large lamp "something on the order of one of those", indicating a light globe in the courtroom; that the defendant fixed the light in a position about two and one-half feet above her body; that he then left, leaving her alone in the room; that after she had been in this position about 15 minutes the light globe exploded without warning; and that the hot glass fell upon her body.

The defendant, called by the plaintiffs under section 2055 C.C.P., testified that this lamp was an infrared deep therapy lamp; that the globe was a General Electric 1000-watt bulb; that he had made no inspection of the globe and could make none, other than turning it on to see if it was working; that he did not know what caused the globe to explode; that he had never heard of one exploding before; that there was no defect in the globe which was noticeable; that he had had globes of this type burning continuously for as much as seven hours without trouble; that there are hundreds of lamps of this type in use; that there are probably 150 or 200 in San Diego; that he frequently used this same lamp ten or twelve times a day; that the bulb in question was a standard one in general use; and that no manufacturer, so far as he knew, had ever theretofore recommended the screening of such lamps as a precautionary measure.

At the close of the plaintiffs' case the court granted the defendant's motion for a nonsuit and from the ensuing judgment the plaintiffs have appealed.

As the appellants state, "the sole question involved concerns the applicability of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur". The question to be decided is whether or not the fact that this lamp globe exploded so speaks for itself as to justify an inference that the explosion occurred because of some negligent act on the part of the respondent.

The first point raised is that a plaintiff is not bound by testimony given under section 2055 C.C.P., and that the evidence given by the respondent may not be considered in passing upon this appeal from a judgment based upon a nonsuit. For present purposes, at least, this may be conceded.

It is next contended that the facts here appearing call for the application of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur. It is first argued that no proof of a special standard of care was here required; that this is one of that class of malpractice cases in which the acts done are so patently negligent that no expert testimony is required; and that in that class of cases the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is applicable and may be relied upon. In support thereof the appellants cite Ales v. Ryan, 8 Cal.2d 82, 64 P.2d 409; Ragin v. Zimmerman, 206 Cal. 723, 276 P. 107; Moore v. Steen, 102 Cal.App. 723, 283 P. 833; Brown v. Shortlidge, 98 Cal. App. 352, 277 P. 134; and Bence v. Denbo, 98 Ind.App. 52, 183 N.E. 326. In these cases, respectively, a sponge was left in a patient during an operation, burns were suffered from too long or improper exposure to an X-ray machine, a surgeon while removing tonsils had knocked out one of the patient's teeth, and an X-ray machine had been so handled that it was permitted to fall upon the face of the plaintiff. In these cases, no proof of a special standard of care was required and the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur was held applicable.

The appellants then argue that this doctrine is applied in cases where injury has been caused by mechanical equipment which is under the exclusive control of the defendant, citing cases. In Chauvin v. Krupin, 4 Cal.App.2d 322, 40 P.2d 904, 906, the plaintiff was burned while being given a permanent wave in a beauty shop. The court there said: "The injury was one which in the natural course of things would not have occurred had defendants used due care, and plaintiff was therefore entitled to recover, unless the defendants offered a satisfactory explanation to overcome the presumptive evidence of their negligence." In Helms v. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., 21 Cal. App.2d 711, 70 P.2d 247, the plaintiff was injured while standing on a sidewalk by a falling portion of the glass globe of an electrolier. It was held, in effect, that the danger could have been known by the defendant and that the question of whether proper inspection had been made was one for the jury. In Windas v. Galston & Sutton Theatres, 35 Cal.App.2d 533, 96 P.2d 170, the injury was the result of a block of plaster falling from the ceiling. In holding the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applicable the court there observed that plaster does not ordinarily fall from a ceiling if proper care is used to see that the ceiling is safe.

[1, 2] In these and many other cases it is pointed out that the res ipsa loquitur doctrine is applicable where it appears that the accident is of a kind which does not ordinarily occur in the absence of negligence on the part of the one having the management or control of the thing which caused the injury. The doctrine is further based upon the theory that the defendant, having charge of the instrumentality in question, either knows the cause of the accident or had a means of knowledge in that connection which was superior to that possessed by the injured party. Connor v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe R. Co., 189 Cal. 1, 207 P. 378, 26 A.L.R. 1462. But, as said in Johnson v. Ostrom, 128 Cal.App. 38, 16 P. 2d 794, 795:

"The converse of this rule is likewise true. If the evidence affirmatively shows the operator or manager of the instrumentality by means of which the injuries are inflicted has no superior knowledge or by the exercise of reasonable care is unable to secure information regarding the cause of the accident, or the evidence establishes the fact that the complainant possesses all the knowledge or information thereof which is reasonably accessible to the operator of the machine, then the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur has no application."

In the instant case, there was no evidence tending to show why this light globe exploded or tending to show that the accident was one which, according to common experience, would not ordinarily occur except through some fault of the respondent. In other words, disregarding any explanation offered by the respondent, there was no evidence justifying any inference that any amount of care which might have been exercised by the respondent would have prevented the explosion or that he failed to use proper care. In examining him under section 2055, C.C.P., some attempt was made to ascertain whether or not he had inspected this light globe. If we disregard his testimony in this respect there is nothing in the evidence or in common experience which would justify an inference that an inspection could have been made which could have been of any avail in disclosing any defect which might have been expected to cause such an explosion. As is well known, such a light globe is a sealed unit which cannot be inspected in any manner which might be material here. As this court said in O'Rourke v. Day & Night W. H. Co., 31 Cal.App.2d 364, 88 P.2d 191, 194: "The article in question, the safety pilot, came to the respondent as a sealed unit. Its very nature precluded an internal inspection and any such inspection would have necessarily destroyed the adjustment of its parts, which was essential to its operation."

[3,4] The respondent possessed no knowledge insofar as anything which caused this accident is concerned which was superior to that possessed by Mrs. Crowe. There is nothing in common experience which would suggest that the explosion which here occurred was one which would not have taken place except for the negligence of the respondent, and it may not even be said that the respondent had the management or control of the instrumentality in the sense that he had it within his power to control anything which caused the explosion. The complaint alleged that the respondent so carelessly and unskillfully used, operated and controlled this electric lamp that he caused the injuries to Mrs. Crowe. There is no evidence to support that allegation and under the circumstances which here appear no inference is possible that the explosion occurred only because of negligence on the part of the respondent, and the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is not applicable. Scellars v. Universal Service, 68 Cal.App. 252, 228 P. 879. As was said in Dorswitt v. Wilson, 51 Cal. App.2d 623, 125 P.2d 626, 627: "There is no room in this case for the application of the res ipsa loquitur doctrine. That is only a rule of evidence raising an inference of negligence from proved facts and not an independent ground of liability."

Appellants' last point is that the inference of negligence arising from the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur could not be disregarded by the trial court. This is sufficiently answered by what we have already said. Where the doctrine is not applicable no such inference arises.

Although the appellants state that the sole question here presented is the applicability of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur they include in their opening brief certain evidence relating to the use of a screen on such a lamp. Mrs. Crowe, having testified that she had taken these treatments on many occasions was asked whether there was "any difference between this light and the other lights." She replied: "Only that the others have screens on and this didn't have any screen at the time." The respondent, during his examination, explained that at times he used copper screens on such lights for the purpose of changing the effect of the rays, that before the accident in question he had used such screens only for that purpose and that since the accident he has used them for a protective measure.

[5] It may first be observed that this phase of the case has no relation to the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur. Any possible effect of this evidence does not go to the cause of the explosion, but is in the nature of an attempt to show a particular manner in which the respondent was negligent, that is, in failing to use a screen for the purpose of lessening the damage. Again disregarding any explanatory evidence given by the respondent, the evidence of plaintiffs in this regard is not sufficient to show negligence on the respondent's part. There was no evidence that such a lamp had ever previously exploded and none justifying the inference that the respondent should have anticipated such an occurrence, or that he should have used such a screen. It is in no way claimed that the lack of a screen caused the explosion and there is no evidence justifying the inference that the presence of any screen, which would not have interfered with the use for which the lamp was intended, would have even reduced the amount of injury suffered by Mrs. Crowe. On this phase of the case it was incumbent upon the appellants to produce sufficient evidence to support the allegations of their complaint, and this they did not do.

The judgment is affirmed.

LORD v. INGELS, Director of Motor Vehicle Department of California, et al.
Civ. No. 14148.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 3, California.

Hearing Denied July 24, 1944.

1. Constitutional law ☞60(1)

The courts will not determine constitutionality of a statute as an abstract question but only when called on to do so in order to protect rights of a party to a pending action.

2. Constitutional law ☞46(1)

An order following stipulation of parties to action by plaintiff engaged in caravanning automobiles to enjoin officers of State Motor Vehicle Department from enforcing statutory provisions imposing fees on automobiles driven on state highways in such business, directing plaintiff to pay to department $15 for each car caravanned on state highways, to be retained in a special fund pending final determination of constitutionality of statute, and specifically reserving continuing jurisdiction in court, did not create a departure from rule that no court will determine constitutionality of statute as an abstract question. St.1937, p. 2253.

3. Dismissal and nonsuit ☞60(2)

A stipulation that court should reserve continuing jurisdiction until final disposition of moneys paid into State Motor Vehicle Department in lieu of statutory fees by person engaged in caravanning automobiles into state after final determination of the constitutionality of statute imposing such fees did not extend time within which the action could be brought to trial beyond the statutory five-year period, where a trial was required because questions of fact were involved. Code Civ.Proc. § 583; St.1937, p. 2253.

4. Dismissal and nonsuit ☞60(1)

The statute requiring action to be brought to trial within five years after filing was intended to expedite trials. Code Civ.Proc. § 583.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Swain, Judge.

Action by Harry A. Lord against Ray R. Ingels, as Director of the Motor Vehicle Department of the State of California, and others, to enjoin defendants from enforcing statutory provisions imposing fees of $15 on each automobile driven on state highways over the route followed by plaintiff in his business of caravanning automobiles into the state from other states. From an order dismissing the action for failure to prosecute it within five years, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Warren E. Libby, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., and Frank Richards, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondents.

BISHOP, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff's appeal from the order dismissing his action because it had not been brought to trial within five years after its birth is mainly based upon the proposition that there is a fund in custodia legis whose disposition was made dependent upon the determination of a constitutional question, and until the question is decided and the fund disbursed the court cannot rid itself of the action. We find no circumstance in this case exempting it from the mandatory provisions of section 583, Code of Civil Procedure, which direct the dismissal of an action not brought to trial within five years after it is "filed."

Plaintiff, engaged in the year 1937 in the caravanning of automobiles into this state from states which are eastern to us, sought by this action to enjoin the defendants, who were officers of the State Motor Vehicle Department, from enforcing those provisions of a new statute (Stats.1937, p. 2253) which imposed fees totaling $15 upon each car driven upon the state highways over the route followed by plaintiff in his operations. The temporary restraining order which was issued upon the filing of the complaint was supplanted, in due course, by a preliminary injunction, granted upon the giving of a bond in the sum of $2,000, which ordered the defendants not to enforce the statute. The number of cars caravanned was so great that within a very short time the protection given the state by the $2,000 bond was gone, and a new arrangement was entered into. There first was a stipulation in which it was recited that, measured by the statute which the plaintiff was defying, the fees and penalties owed by the plaintiff already totalled $5,152.50, of which amount the sum of $3,152 had been paid to the Motor Vehicle Department. It was further stipulated, and then ordered, that the preliminary injunction be dissolved and the $2,000 bond released from all liability. However, the defendants were again forbidden to enforce against the plaintiff any of the provisions of the statute. He, in turn, was directed to pay to the Motor Vehicle Department $15 for each car which he caravanned on the state highways, within the purview of the statute. The order then continued in these words: "all sums which are so paid and the sum of $3,152.50 heretofore paid to said Motor Vehicle Department of the State of California as recited and receipted for in said Stipulation of December 17, 1937, shall be retained by said Department of Motor Vehicles in a special fund pending the final determination in this action on appeal or otherwise of the constitutionality of the aforesaid Statute, at which time in the event that the said Statute shall be determined to be unconstitutional the sums so paid shall be returned upon application to the plaintiff herein by the defendants, or their successors in office, and in the event that the said Statute shall be determined to be constitutional the said sums so paid shall be retained by the Department of Motor Vehicles and shall be applied according to the provisions of said Chapter 788, p. 2253, of the California Statutes of 1937.

"It Is Hereby Further Ordered that this Court specifically reserves continuing jurisdiction until final disposition of said moneys as aforesaid to make orders in regard to such final disposition and particularly to make such Order as is meet and proper in the event that such Statute is finally held to be partially valid and partially invalid."

We have already noted plaintiff's position. "Having created this special trust fund in custodia legis in lieu of bond for temporary injunction," he states "the trial court must determine the constitutionality of the statute and decree a disposition of the fund before it dismisses the action and terminates and surrenders all its jurisdiction over the fund created in this case." Later he adds: "The appellant is still insistent upon the Court determining the constitutionality of Chapter 788, Statutes of 1937." That the statute in question is constitutional, so far as the Federal Constitution is concerned, has been determined in Clark v. Paul Gray, Inc., 1939, 306 U.S. 583, 59 S.Ct. 744, 83 L.Ed. 1001, but apparently the plaintiff wants the state court to pass upon his contentions.

[1,2] We do not interpret the order, which followed quite meticulously the wording of the stipulation upon which it was based, as intending to create a departure from the rule prevailing in this state that no court undertakes to determine the constitutionality of a statute as an abstract question, but only when called upon to do so in order to enforce or protect the rights of a party to a pending action. The establishing of this fund in the Motor Vehicle Department was an incident to, not the object of, this action. The object of the action was to protect the plaintiff from the burden and embarrassment that would follow from the enforcement of a statute which he claimed had no validity because it violated both the Federal and State Constitutions. A final judgment, granting or denying a permanent injunction was contemplated when the stipulation was entered into and the order made providing a substitute arrangement for the bond usually required. A determination of the constitutionality of the statute could be anticipated only as a step in arriving at the judgment. There would be no occasion for the court to pass upon the validity of those provisions of the statute which did not affect the plaintiff, and if his allegation, denied by the defendants in their answer, that the fees which the defendants were threatening to collect on cars not owned by the plaintiff but which he was caravanning, would have to be paid out of his pocket, and not by the cars' owners, was not found to be true, plaintiff would appear not to be affected by the burden of the statute and so in no position to question its constitutionality.

[3] If, however, the stipulation and subsequent order be interpreted as an acknowledgement that plaintiff did have an interest in the constitutionality of the statute, so that, at least for the purposes of an order disbursing the fund, no proof of his interest would be necessary, even so there remained issues of fact which had to be determined before plaintiff's contentions that the statute was unconstitutional could be disposed of. In his complaint he lists some eighteen reasons why the statute clashes with the State and Federal Constitutions. Among other reasons advanced are these: "That the charges and fees required of the plaintiff under said statute are arbitrary, unreasonable and excessive in amount, and bear no reasonable relation to the plaintiff's use of the highways of the State of California. * * * That said tax and charge is wholly disproportionate to other taxes, fees or other licenses charged by the State of California, either for the registration of vehicles in said state or for vehicles using the highways in said state; * * * That said tax and charge is exorbitant and arbitrary and unfair to such a degree that the interstate business in which plaintiff is engaged in the State of California will return a revenue to the said state in proportion far in excess of other fees, licenses or taxes charged other persons for the use of the highways of said state." It is obvious that none of these objections can be ruled upon from a mere reading of the statute; defendants' denial of all the allegations of the paragraph in which these objections were listed raised issues of fact which made proof necessary before the trial court could be in a position to pass upon the constitutional questions involved.

This is not a case, therefore, such as was Martin v. Gibson, 1941, 48 Cal.App. 2d 449, 119 P.2d 1012, where there was no issue of fact, so that no "trial" could be had. Here there were issues of fact; the court could not determine the legal issues involved until the factual issues were tried; there was no trial within five years of the filing of the complaint. No excuse for failing to bring the action to trial has been offered. No reason appears why it could not have been tried during any of the five years while it was pending. The suggestion that the stipulation which preceded the order may be interpreted as a stipulation of the parties that the time within which the action may be brought to trial was extended, does not survive a reading of the stipulation; the "continuing jurisdiction" was plainly to enable the court to make orders disposing of the fund after it had exhausted its ordinary jurisdiction by entering a judgment, not to postpone indefinitely the time within which a trial, looking to a judgment, might be begun. The lament of the plaintiff that the dismissal of this action relegates him to the necessity of bringing another action has its echo in every case dismissed for failure of prosecution.

[4] The action, on the face of the record, was one which section 583, Code of Civil Procedure, says must be dismissed. "The statute", this court said in Bank of America v. Moore & Harrah, 1942, 54 Cal. App.2d 37, 43, 128 P.2d 623, 626, referring to section 583, "has the very salutary purpose of expediting trials. Its language is clear and definite and the integrity of its meaning has generally been upheld by the courts in a plenitude of decisions. In the several legislative amendments to which it has been subjected the legislature has not seen fit to temper the rigor of the language or its forthright construction and support by the courts; the tendency, rather, has been to extend and make more certain its operation."

We see no reason to doubt the correctness of the order appealed from; it is affirmed.

1. Insurance ☞668(2)

In action on life policy wherein insurer contended that soliciting agent was not agent of insurer but was acting as broker for insured's assignee, soliciting agent's status as broker or agent was question for jury.

2. Insurance ☞388(4)

Where for six years insured's assignee had paid premiums to soliciting agent without receiving receipt therefor signed by insurer's president or secretary as required by life policy and all such payments were made while insured was in default, and in only one instance had insurer demanded and received application for reinstatement, insurer was estopped from insisting on strict compliance with policy until it had given reasonable notice of its change in policy.

3. Insurance ☞388(4)

In absence of fraud, where insured makes timely effort to transmit life policy premium, substantial objection should be required to defeat it as a payment when there are acts and conduct of insurer which would induce insured to omit to follow strict letter of policy.

4. Insurance ☞388(4)

A past course of conduct of acceptance by insurer of payment of premiums after grace period may establish a waiver by insurer of right to declare forfeiture for failure to pay premiums at stipulated time, or insurer may be estopped from asserting forfeiture where insured has been reasonably led to believe that payments made within a reasonable time after grace period will be acceptable.

Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Keesling & Keil, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Nathan G. Gray, of Berkeley, for respondents.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

In a trial by a jury the plaintiffs had a verdict for the sum of $3000 based upon a policy of insurance on the life of F. C. Gleed, deceased. The plaintiff Gleed was the widow and the plaintiff Boggs was an assignee of deceased.

The appeal from the judgment is based upon the ground that the policy lapsed prior to the death of the insured because of non-payment of the premium then due. The respondents defend the judgment on the ground that time of payment under the strict terms of the policy was waived, and that defendant is estopped from contesting the policy on that ground.

The contested policy was issued on May 12, 1936, through one Hansen, a duly authorized soliciting agent, and by him delivered to the insured. Thereafter, until the death of the insured, Mrs. Boggs paid all the premiums to Hansen—sometimes in cash and sometimes by her personal check. For each payment Mrs. Boggs received a receipt signed "Edward F. Hansen, Agent," and containing the policy number and the amount received. On June 12, 1942, in accordance with her usual custom, Mrs. Boggs gave to Hansen her check drawn in his name to cover the premium due on May 12, 1942. Hansen deposited the check in his own bank and drew his check in the name of appellant which was deposited for collection by appellant and returned unpaid because of insufficient funds in the Hansen account. On June 18 the appellant notified Hansen that his check had been dishonored, and that the company would hold it until it received a new remittance. On the same day appellant mailed a letter to the insured advising him that the policy had lapsed and requesting an application for reinstatement. The insured died early the following morning and this letter was found unopened in his home.

[1] Appellant now contends that Hansen was not its agent, but that he was acting in the capacity of broker for Mrs. Boggs, that the express terms of the policy permitted payments of premiums to be made "to an authorized agent of the Company only in exchange for the Company's receipt therefor signed by the President or the Secretary," that the check of Hansen was received for collection only, and did not constitute a payment of the premium. The respondents refer to the license of the Insurance Commissioner of this State under which, at the request of the appellant, Hansen was appointed and authorized to act as an agent for appellant with all the powers conferred by the laws of this state. The respondents also rely upon the defense of waiver and estoppel and, since this is determinative of the appeal, we will confine our discussion to that issue with the observation that the question of Hansen's status as broker or agent was a question of fact for the jury, that we find no evidence that he at any time acted as a broker for the insured, and that there is evidence both ways as to his status as broker or agent in his dealings with Mrs. Boggs.

[2] On the issue of waiver and estoppel the evidence is that for a period of six years all premiums had been paid by Mrs. Boggs to Hansen, either in cash or by her personal check, and that no one of these payments was exchanged for the company's receipt signed by the president or secretary as required in the policy. It is also in evidence that each and all of these payments were made in this manner while the insured was in default, and in many cases after the period of grace had expired. During this period of six years eighteen separate premiums became due. Fourteen of these were accepted by appellant after the period of grace had expired. In only one instance—September, 1940—the appellant demanded and received an application for reinstatement.

[3] In Huber v. New York Life Ins. Co., 18 Cal.App.2d 269, 274, 63 P.2d 318, 320, which is a case similar to this in many respects, the district court of appeal said: "In the absence of fraud, where a party makes an effort to transmit his premium in time, it seems to us that substantial objection should be required to defeat it as a payment when there are acts or conduct on the part of the Insurance Company which would induce the insured to omit to follow the strict letter of the policy * * *."

insurer of payments of premiums after the grace period may establish a waiver by the insurer of the right to declare a forfeiture for failure to pay premiums exactly at the stipulated time, or the insurer may be said to be estopped to assert the forfeiture where the insured may be said to have been reasonably led to believe that payments made within a reasonable time after the grace period would be acceptable. Nelson v. National Guaranty Life Co., 131 Cal.App. 669, 21 F.2d 1022; Vinther v. Sunset Mut. Life Ins. Co., 11 Cal.App.2d 118, 53 P.2d 182; Turner v. Redwood Mut. Life Ass'n, 13 Cal. App.2d 573, 57 P.2d 222." To the same effect is Bryson v. National Travelers Cas. Co., 206 Cal. 475, 479, 274 P. 957.

Upon these authorities we conclude that the course of conduct in relation to the payments of premiums running over a period of six years was such that the respondents were entitled to assume that the terms of the policy need not be adhered to strictly, and that the appellant was estopped from insisting upon a strict compliance with those terms until it had given the respondents reasonable notice of its change in policy.

I. Judgment ¶570(3, 4)

Where action against minor was nonsuited on theory that he was powerless to delegate authority to drive automobile owned by him, whereupon the plaintiff dismissed the action as to other defendants with statement that he intended to file another action against minor and person driving automobile, such nonsuit and dismissal did not constitute bar to subsequent action. Civ.Code, § 33.

2. Judgment ⇨570(1)

In the absence of a retraxit or a trial on the merits, neither a dismissal of an action nor a nonsuit is a bar to subsequent suit for the same cause.

3. Limitation of actions ⇨182(5)

Failure to plead bar of statute of limitations to action for personal injuries resulting from automobile collision waived such defense. Code Civ.Proc. § 340, subd. 3.

A gratuitous loan of automobile by minor who was not present at time of accident rendered minor liable for negligence of borrower under the statute. Vehicle Code, § 402, St.1937, p. 2353; Civ.Code, § 33.

7. Army and navy ⇨34

The trial court has a sound discretion in determining from the showing made whether defense would be materially affected by a denial of continuance asked for under Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act. Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, § 201, 50 U.S.C.A.Appendix, § 521.

8. Army and navy ⇨34

A mere certificate showing that defendant was engaged in the military service was insufficient showing for continuance, where defendant's deposition was on file, the defendant was not present at the accident, defendant conceded that he owned the automobile involved and that it was being driven by his permission, and defendant's attorney had represented defendant throughout the entire litigation and was familiar with the facts. Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, § 201, 50 U.S.C.A.Appendix, § 521.

9. Army and navy ⇨34

The Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act should receive a liberal construction to properly protect soldiers and sailors, but the act may not be invoked to delay or defeat an orderly and expeditious trial of valid suits. In action for damages arising out of automobile collision where defendants did not plead estoppel or res judicata by virtue of former nonsuit, refusal to admit transcript of proceedings and minute order was proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; A. L. Pierovich, Judge.

Action by Elbert A. Ridley against William Young and others for damages for property damage and personal injuries sustained in automobile collision. From a judgment for plaintiff for $5,105, the named defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

T. L. Chamberlain and Gerald Beatty Wallace, both of Auburn, for appellant.

F. H. Bowers, of Roseville, for respondent.

THOMPSON, Justice.

The defendant, William Young, also known as Joseph William Young, has appealed from a judgment which was rendered against him and his codefendants jointly and severally, for property damage and personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff as the result of an automobile collision.

William Young owned the automobile which was involved in a head-on collision with plaintiff's machine on the public highway near Roseville on the afternoon of August 3, 1941. The plaintiff's machine was demolished and he received serious injuries. The defendant Dale Hastay was then driving William Young's car with his permission. Both William Young and Dale Hastay were minors. Each of them held an operator's license issued with the written endorsements of their parents as required by Section 350 of the Vehicle Code, St.1937, p. 1596.

The plaintiff filed a complaint against the defendants on August 19, 1941, for damages sustained as a result of their negligence. It was alleged that the defendants were the owners of the machine which was driven by Dale Hastay at the time of the accident as the agent and employee of the other defendants. Separate answers were filed by William Young and the other defendants denying the material allegations of the complaint. The cause was set for trial for February 16, 1942. After a jury was impaneled the plaintiff's attorney made his opening statement to the jury, in which he declared that he relied upon proving that Dale Hastay was driving William Young's automobile at the time of the accident as his agent and upon his business. Some evidence was then adduced in behalf of the plaintiff, but before he had rested his cause the defendant William Young moved for a nonsuit in his own behalf on the ground that he, as a minor, could not lawfully authorize an agent or employee to drive his automobile. It was contended that any attempt on the part of a minor to create a relationship of respondeat superior in the use of his machine was void, or at least voidable, under Section 33 of the Civil Code, and that the negligence of Dale Hastay could therefore not be imputed to the owner of the car so as to render him liable for damages. Upon that theory the motion for nonsuit was granted February 17, 1942, in favor of William Young. The cause was dismissed against him. No appeal was taken from that order. The plaintiff's attorney then voluntarily dismissed the action against the other defendants, saying, "I propose to file another action against Dale Hastay and William Young."

March 2, 1942, more than one year after the accident occurred, the plaintiff filed a new complaint in that court against the same defendants, based on the same automobile casualty. The complaint was couched in two counts. The first count alleged that Dale Hastay was negligently driving William Young's automobile with his consent, at the time of the accident, and that said negligence was imputed to the owner of the machine and to the parents of Dale Hastay who had endorsed in writing his verified petition for an operator's license as required by Section 350 of the Vehicle Code. The second count of the complaint alleged that at the time of the accident Dale Hastay was driving the machine with the consent of the owner William Young upon a joint enterprise in which all defendants were interested.

Separate answers were filed by William Young and by Dale Hastay and the other defendants. Guardians ad litem were duly appointed to represent the minors. Each answer denied the material allegations of the complaint and alleged that the accident was the result of the contributory negligence of the plaintiff. Each answer set up the nonsuit with respect to William Young and the plaintiff's voluntary dismissal of the former action as a bar to this suit. The answer of Dale Hastay also set up the statute of limitations as a bar to the second suit, but William Young admitted that he owned the machine and that it was driven with his express consent, but failed to plead the bar of the statute of limitations.

Upon due notice as provided by Section 597 of the Code of Civil Procedure the defendants Elton Hastay and Lucille Hastay moved the court to dismiss the second action on the ground that it was barred by the nonsuit and voluntary dismissal of the former cause and by the statute of limitations. That motion was fully heard and denied.

This case was then set for trial by the court for March 17, 1943. At the trial evidence was adduced in behalf of the respective parties. The cause was argued and submitted for decision. The court adopted findings to the effect that William Young owned the automobile which was driven by Dale Hastay with his permission at the time of the accident; that Dale Hastay held an operator's license at the time of the accident which was issued by the Motor Vehicle Department upon the written approval of his parents as required by Section 350 of the Vehicle Code; that the collision was caused by the negligence of Dale Hastay, as a result of which plaintiff's automobile of the value of $105 was demolished and he received personal injuries entitling him to damages in the further sum of $6,738.50; that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence; that the defendants were not engaged in a joint venture with Dale Hastay, and that neither the nonsuit nor the dismissal of the former action is a bar to this suit.

The court thereupon rendered judgment against the defendants, but limited the liability of William Young and of Elton Hastay and Lucille Hastay, his wife, pursuant to Sections 352 and 402 of the Vehicle Code, St.1935, p. 145, St.1937, p. 2353, to the sum of $5,105. From that judgment the defendant William Young only has appealed. We are not concerned with the judgment against the other defendants.

The appellant contends that the granting of the nonsuit in his favor, and the voluntary dismissal of the former suit by the plaintiff, are bars to this action; that William Young, a minor, and the owner of the automobile involved in the accident, was powerless under Section 33 of the Civil Code, to authorize Dale Hastay to drive his machine so as to render him or any of the defendants liable for his negligence; that the court erred in refusing to admit in evidence the pleadings of the former case, and erred in denying plaintiff's motion for a continuance of the trial on the ground that he was engaged in the armed forces of the United States.

The findings are supported by the evidence.

[1] Neither the order granting a nonsuit in the former action in favor of the appellant nor the plaintiff's voluntary dismissal of that suit is a bar to this action. The former suit was not tried or determined on its merits. A nonsuit was granted in favor of William Young on the theory that he was powerless under Section 33 of the Civil Code to delegate authority for Dale Hastay to drive his automobile. The subsequent dismissal of the suit by the plaintiff did not amount to a retraxit of his cause of action. McColgan v. Jones, Hubbard & Donnell, Inc., 11 Cal.2d 243, 78 P.2d 1010. At the time of that dismissal in open court the plaintiff's attorney clearly indicated that he was not conceding he had no valid cause of action for he then said, "I propose to file another action against Dale Hastay and William Young." There was no detriment to the appellant on account of that nonsuit in his favor.

[2] The rule is well established that, in the absence of a retraxit or a trial on the merits, neither a dismissal of an action nor a nonsuit is a bar to a subsequent suit for the same cause. Mohn v. Tingley, 191 Cal. 470, 478, 217 P. 733; Anglo-California Nat. Bank v. Superior Court, 15 Cal.App.2d 676, 679, 59 P.2d 1053; Walton v. Southern Pacific Co., 8 Cal.App.2d 290, 48 P.2d 108; 15 Cal.Jur. 131, sec. 185.

In the present case it is immaterial, so far as this appellant is concerned, whether the present complaint states a cause of action different from that which was alleged in the original complaint. Both complaints were founded on the same automobile casualty. It is true that the amended complaint in the first action charged that Dale Hastay was driving the automobile at the time of the accident "as agent for each of said defendants and within the course and scope of said employment" and that he was then engaged in a joint enterprise in behalf of all of the defendants, while the present complaint alleges only that Dale Hastay was then negligently operating the machine "with the permission and consent of each of the defendants."

[3] In the case of McKnight v. Gilzean, 29 Cal.App.2d 218, 84 P.2d 213, this court affirmed an order of the trial court sustaining a demurrer to an amended complaint in an automobile casualty case on the ground that it added two causes of action for imputed negligence under Section 402 of the Vehicle Code to the original complaint which was based entirely on the doctrine of respondeat superior. In the McKnight case, however, the statute of limitations was specifically pleaded as a bar to the new causes alleged for the first time in the amended complaint. In the present case the appellant William Young failed to plead the bar of Section 340, subdivision 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure by either his demurrer or answer. He therefore waived that defense.

The statute of limitations as provided in the foregoing section, if properly pleaded, may bar the liability of the owner of an automobile for imputed negligence of the driver thereof who is operating the machine with the owner's consent, under Section 402 of the Vehicle Code, or the liability of the parents of the driver who have signed and verified his application for an operator's license as required by Section 352 of the Vehicle Code, unless the action is commenced within one year from the date of the injury complained of. Franceschi v. Scott, 7 Cal.App.2d 494, 46 P.2d 764; McFarland v. Cordiero, 99 Cal.App. 352, 278 P. 889.

The bar of the statute of limitations was, however, waived by the appellant in this case by failure to raise that issue by either demurrer or answer to the complaint. Laffoon v. Collins, 212 Cal. 750, 758, 300 P. 808; Brownrigg v. DeFrees, 196 Cal. 534, 541, 238 P. 714; Pedro v. Soares, 18 Cal. App.2d 600, 610, 64 P.2d 776; 16 Cal.Jur. 603, sec. 199.

[4] The appellant asserts that the judgment against him is void for the reason that he was a minor of the age of eighteen years at the time of the accident and that the permissive use of his automobile by Dale Hastay may therefore not create a liability against him on account of imputed negligence of the driver of the machine because Section 33 of the Civil Code prohibits a minor from "delegating power". William Young, the owner of the machine, was not present at the time of the accident. We are of the opinion there is no merit in this contention. The limited liability of the owner of an automobile for imputed negligence of a driver who is operating the machine by permission is specifically created by statute without distinction between adults and minors. Sec. 402, Vehicle Code. Subdivision (a) of that Section provides:

"Every owner of a motor vehicle is liable and responsible for the death of or injury to person or property resulting from negligence in the operation of such motor vehicle, in the business of such owner or otherwise, by any person using or operating the same with the permission, express or implied, of such owner, and the negligence of such person shall be imputed to the owner for all purposes of civil damages."

Section 33 of the Civil Code, upon which the appellant relies, reads:

"A minor cannot give a delegation of power, nor, under the age of eighteen, make a contract relating to real property, or any interest therein, or relating to any personal property not in his immediate possession or control." (Italics added.)

It will be observed the preceding statute infers that a minor, even under the age of eighteen years, may make a contract relating to personal property which is "in his immediate possession or control." The automobile in this case was in his possession. Section 41 of the Civil Code provides that a minor is civilly liable for a wrong done by him, although liability for exemplary damages depends upon his capability to understand that the act is wrong.

[5, 6] The general rule with respect to contracts made by a minor is that he may avoid liability thereon, with certain exceptions. But he is nevertheless liable for his own torts provided he is capable of understanding that they are wrong. House v. Fry, 30 Cal.App. 157, 157 P. 500; Hughes v. Quackenbush, 1 Cal.App.2d 349, 357, 37 P.2d 99; 14 Cal.Jur. 134, secs. 23 and 24;

27 Am.Jur. 812, sec. 90; 127 A.L.R. 1442, note. A minor may make certain contracts not prohibited by law (Sec. 34, Civil Code), subject to disaffirmance as provided by Section 35 of the Civil Code. Certain prohibited contracts of minors, including deeds executed by minors under eighteen years of age, are void. Hakes Inv. Co. v. Lyons, 166 Cal. 557, 137 P. 911; Sec. 33, Civil Code. Since, on the policy of protecting infants, the contracts of a minor, with certain exceptions (Sec. 36, Civil Code), may be void or voidable by disaffirmance, as provided by Section 33 of the Civil Code, it has been held he may not appoint agents, servants or employees thereby rendering him liable for their torts. 14 Cal.Jur. 121, secs. 10-12; 103 A.L.R. 487, note. Assuming, without so deciding, that the owner of an automobile who is a minor may not be liable under Section 402 of the Vehicle Code for the tort or negligence of an agent, servant or employee who is authorized by contract expressed or implied to use his machine in the performance of the business of the minor, or for a joint enterprise in which the owner and driver of the machine are interested, no such appointment, founded on contract, either express or implied, is involved in the present appeal. The foregoing principle announced in the authorities wherein it is held that minors are exempted from liability is based on the existence of the relationship of respondeat superior where an agency or employment is created. This case was not tried on that theory. William Young was not present at the time of the accident. He had no control over Dale Hastay's operation of the car. His answer specifically so states and the court so found. Nor was the machine then being used in any business in which the owner was interested. The original complaint did allege a relationship of agency or employment between the owner and the driver of the automobile, but that complaint was dismissed and the present complaint merely alleges that the car was being driven "with the permission and consent" of the defendant William Young. No contract or agreement was involved in this action. The transaction was a mere gratuitous loaning of the automobile. Regardless of the distinction in the authorities between the liability of minors growing out of torts and contracts, we assume that Section 402 of the Vehicle Code, which creates a new and different liability for imputed negligence, renders the appellant liable for the tort of the driver of his car under the circumstances of this case, in spite of the fact that he was only eighteen years of age. No question is raised regarding his ability to understand the dangers incident to the operation of his automobile. He could not escape his statutory liability for the tort of one who was driving his machine with his express consent by attempting to disaffirm his permission to drive the car after the accident had occurred.

In the case of Krum v. Malloy, 22 Cal.2d 132, 137 P.2d 18, 19, a judgment in favor of a minor of the age of nineteen years, who was co-owner with his father of the automobile involved in the accident, but who was not present at that time, was reversed by the Supreme Court, on the ground that the court failed to find upon the issue as to whether the minor had consented to his father's driving of the machine. The Supreme Court said:

"The crux of the case as it stands before us is the question as to whether defendant Claire E. Malloy, the nineteen-year-old son of Paul, is liable by imputation, under section 402 of the Vehicle Code, * * * for Paul's (his father's) negligence. * * *

"A co-owner, therefore, of an automobile, who desired its exclusive possession and usage for a time, would need the permission, express or implied, of his co-owners to that end. * * *

"It was error for the court to neglect to find directly on the essential issue of whether Paul Malloy's operation of the automobile at the time of the accident was with, or was without, Claire E. Malloy's permission."

If, as the appellant in the present case contends, a minor who owns an automobile, or a joint interest in one, may not bind himself to become liable under Section 402 of the Vehicle Code, for imputed negligence of the driver of an automobile by consenting to the use of his car, it would have been immaterial that the trial court in the Krum case, supra, failed to determine whether or not the father, Paul Malloy, was driving the machine with or without permission of his minor son and co-owner. The reversal of the judgment in that case clearly infers that the Supreme Court assumed the absent minor who owned a joint interest in the automobile would be liable for imputed negligence if his consent to drive the machine had been obtained.

In the case of Silver Swan Liquor Corp. v. Adams, 43 Cal.App.2d Supp. 851, 110 P. 2d 1097, the Appellate Department of the Superior Court determined that a non-resident minor, who was sued for damages for negligence in operating his automobile in California, is not exempt under Section 33 of the Civil Code from the provisions of Section 404 of the Vehicle Code, St. 1935, p. 154, on account of his infancy from substituted service of process in Canada. Section 404 provides that when any nonresident of California operates his automobile on the highways of this State he will be deemed to have authorized an appointment of the Director of Motor Vehicles in the event of a suit based on an automobile casualty in which he is involved as "his true and lawful attorney upon whom may be served all lawful processes" against him in that action. In the Adams case it was contended the substituted service of process was void under Section 33 of the Civil Code, because the defendant was a minor without authority to "delegate power" to appoint an agent or attorney. A motion to quash the service of summons was granted by the trial court. The Appellate Department of the Superior Court reversed that order, holding that the minor was not exempt from the provisions of the Vehicle Code. In support of that decision the court quoted with approval the following language from Gesell v. Wells, 229 App.Div. 11, 240 N.Y.S. 628, 631, which was affirmed on appeal (254 N.Y. 604, 173 N.E. 885):

"Surely they [the automobiles] are not less dangerous in the hands of minors. It is inconceivable that there should have been any legislative intent to exclude minors. But it is urged that the statute in question is based upon an implied agreement which, in the case of an infant, may be repudiated at his election. It would be strange if a police regulation of the state could be thus evaded."

The preceding language is appropriate to the present case. Section 402 of the Vehicle Code is general in its application with respect to imputed liability. No distinction is made between adults and minors. If the legislature had intended to exclude minors from its application it would have been easy to have so stated. It is a police regulation of highways for the safety of the public. In the absence of a statute to the contrary, we must assume it was intended to apply to minors as well as adults.

By inference, Section 33 of the Civil Code authorizes minors, even under the age of eighteen years, to make contracts relating to personal property which is in their immediate possession or control. In the present case the appellant was over eighteen years of age, and he made no contract. He merely loaned his automobile for the benefit of his friend. He is therefore liable for imputed negligence of the driver of his car under the circumstances of this case.

[7] The court did not err in denying the application of William Young's attorney for a continuance of the trial under Section 100 of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act, 50 U.S.C.A. Appendix, § 510, on the ground that the defendant was then engaged in the United States military service. The trial court has a sound discretion to determine from the showing made whether the defense would be "materially affected" by a denial of the continuance. Briner v. Briner, 60 Cal.App.2d 473, 140 P.2d 995; Boone v. Lightner, 319 U.S. 561, 63 S.Ct. 1223, 87 L.Ed. 1587; Pope v. United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co., 67 Ga.App. 415, 20 S.E.2d 618; 50 U.S.C.A. Appendix, § 521. The section last cited reads:

"At any stage thereof any action or proceeding in any court in which a person in military service is involved, either as plaintiff or defendant, * * * may, in the discretion of the court in which it is pending, on its own motion, and shall, on application to it by such person or some person on his behalf, be stayed as provided in this Act, unless, in the opinion of the court, the ability of plaintiff to prosecute the action or the defendant to conduct his defense is not materially affected by reason of his military service." (Italics added.)

[8] In the present case no affidavit for continuance was filed. No showing whatever was made to indicate that William Young could not obtain a leave of absence to attend the trial, or that his defense would be materially affected by his absence. Nothing but a certificate showing he was engaged in the military service was offered in evidence. His deposition was on file in this case. His answer alleged that he was not present at the time of the accident; that he had no control over Dale Hastay's operation of the machine and that he knew nothing of the circumstances incident to the automobile collision. His answer concedes that he was the owner of the machine in question and that it was being driven by Dale Hastay "with the permission of this answering defendant." No agency or employment of the driver was alleged. His attorney had represented William Young throughout the entire litigation and was perfectly familiar with the facts. We are directed to no material facts favorable to the appellant to which he might have testified if he had been present at the trial. We are unable to perceive that his defense to the action was materially, or at all, affected by his absence from the trial. The court, therefore, did not abuse its discretion in refusing to continue the trial.

[9] While it is true that the act in question should receive a liberal construction with the object to properly protect soldiers and sailors who are engaged in the military and naval services of the United States, it may not be invoked for the purpose of delaying or defeating an orderly and expeditious trial of valid suits.

[10] The court did not err in sustaining plaintiff's objection to the introduction in evidence of the pleadings which were filed in the former action, for the reason that the transcript of proceedings and the minute order, which are incorporated in this record, clearly show the former case was not determined on its merits and that a nonsuit was granted in favor of William Young in the first cause before the plaintiff had rested his case. It was granted as the court said on the theory that William Young, a minor, could not create a relationship of "master and servant" or of "agency" between himself and Dale Hastay, the driver of his car, so as to render him liable for imputed negligence. Young's answer does not plead the judgment of dismissal of the first action as res judicata, nor does it plead estoppel by reason of the statute of limitations. Since the dismissal of the original action was not a determination of the merits of the cause, and that judgment did not constitute res judicata, the proffered pleadings in that case were not competent on the trial of this case and the objection thereto was properly sustained. Campanella v. Campanella, 204 Cal. 515, 520, 269 P. 433, 435. Under similar circumstances the Supreme Court so held. It is said in the Campanella case:

"It is clear that the [former] judgment is not res adjudicata and therefore not a bar to the present action nor an estoppel upon any issue therein and that the ruling refusing to admit the judgment roll in evidence was proper. The judgment roll not only fails to show a ruling upon the merits but discloses that no such ruling was made."

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

I. Common law ☞9

The doctrine of "mobilia sequuntur personam" is a fiction of the common law under which intangible personal property has its situs or location in the state or country wherein the owner resides, unless it has acquired a business situs elsewhere.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Mobilia Sequuntur Personam".

2. Taxation ☞104

Where trust property from which a nonresident derived his income was owned by and in the lawful possession of trustees having their situs in California, the income of such nonresident was derived from sources within the state and was taxable therein; the doctrine of "mobilia sequuntur personam" not applying to give the property situs at beneficiary's domicile. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Action by Arthur William Bourn Vincent against Charles J. McColgan, as Bank and Corporation Franchise Tax Commissioner, for a refund of personal income tax.

Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Reversed.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., and Hartwell H. Linney and James E. Sabine, Deputy Attys. Gen., for appellant.

McCutchen, Thomas, Matthew, Griffiths & Greene, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, Justice.

This is a suit to obtain a refund of personal income tax paid in 1937 with respect to income for the calendar year 1936.

Plaintiff during all of the year 1936 was a non-resident. He was a minor during all of the year 1936 and until July 16, 1940. During the year 1936 plaintiff's father, Arthur Rose Vincent, was the duly appointed, qualified and acting guardian of plaintiff's estate. On the last mentioned date, the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of San Mateo made an order accepting the resignation of plaintiff's father as guardian and appointing the American Trust Company, a corporation, in his stead. The American Trust Company continued in this capacity until plaintiff attained his majority in 1940.

On May 15, 1937, plaintiff, by the guardian of his estate, filed plaintiff's income tax return for the calendar year 1936, showing income tax in the amount of $2621.27, which amount subsequently was paid. A claim for refund was filed which was not allowed by the Commissioner, and this suit was brought to recover. The judgment of the trial court was rendered in favor of plaintiff.

Income for the calendar year 1936 was as follows:

(1) Interest on savings bank account with Wells Fargo Bank & Union Trust Co. $45.88;

(2) Interest on State of California bonds $935.00;

(3) Income from fiduciaries, payable to plaintiff as a beneficiary of certain trusts, as follows:

(a) From said Wells Fargo Bank & Union Trust Co., as trustee of a residuary trust created by the last will and testament of Agnes M. Bourn, deceased $4,402.55;

(b) From The Bank of California, National Association, as trustee of a residuary trust created by the last will and testament of said Agnes M. Bourn, deceased $4,402.55;

(c) From said Wells Fargo Bank & Union Trust Co., as trustee of a trust created by W. B. Bourn, now deceased $14,459.74

(d) From said The Bank of California, National Association, as trustee of a trust created by said W. B. Bourn, now deceased $14,459.74;

(e) From said Wells Fargo Bank & Union Trust Co., as trustee of a trust created by instrument dated July 19, 1910 between William B. Bourn and Agnes M. Bourn, as trustees, and James L. Laidlaw and William B. Bourn, as trustees, said trust being hereinafter referred to as the "Vincent Trust" $14,696.71.

All of said income, other than the interest on said State of California bonds which was exempt, was reported and included in plaintiff's said personal income tax return for 1936.

All of the income received from the various trusts was from securities and other intangible property except for a small percentage from real property situate in California.

All of the income received from the two residuary trusts created by the last will and testament of Agnes M. Bourn, deceased, was distributed to the trustees of said trusts out of the estate of said Agnes M. Bourn, deceased, on December 31, 1936. The executors of the estate of Agnes M. Bourn, deceased, were the same two banks that were also the trustees of the trusts created by her last will and testament.

The executors of the estate of Agnes M. Bourn, deceased, and the trustees of the various trusts were Wells Fargo Bank and Union Trust Co., a California corporation, and The Bank of California, National Association, a national bank having its principal office and place of business in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

It was stipulated that neither any trustee as trustee of a trust here involved, nor any guardian as a guardian, nor plaintiff himself, during the year 1936, carried on or did any business, or trade, or practice, or carried on any profession. However, it also was stipulated that under the terms of the trusts discretion was conferred upon the trustees as to the administration of the trust estates and the trustees had authority to invest and reinvest, sell, exchange and dispose of the trust property.

During the year 1936 the trustees of certain of the trusts sold various assets of the trusts and purchased other assets.

It further was stipulated that the seat of each trust was at all times during the year 1936 in San Francisco, California. The grantors of the trusts, at the time of the creation of the various trusts as well as at the time of their death, were residents of California.

The guardianship of plaintiff's estate was subject to the jurisdiction of the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of San Mateo and the guardian could sell no property of the estate of plaintiff or purchase any property or make any investments or reinvestments without the approval of that court.

Agnes M. Bourn, who created certain of the trusts by her last will and testament was a resident of California at the time of her death.

All of the trusts were administered in California.

Pertinent portions of the statute involved are the following:

Section 5 of the Act provides in part as follows:

"There shall be levied, collected and paid for each taxable year upon the entire net income of every resident of this State and upon the net income of every nonresident which is derived from sources within this State, taxes in the following amounts. * * *" St. 1935, p. 1093.

Section 7(f) of the Act provides that:

"In the case of taxpayers other than residents the gross income includes only the gross income from sources within this State. * * *" St. 1935, p. 1095.

And, finally, Section 12(c) of the Act provides:

"The net income of the estate or trust shall be computed in the same manner and on the same basis as in the case of an individual, except that * * *

"(3) Income Properly Paid or Credited. In the case of income received by estates of deceased persons during the period of administration or settlement of the estate, and in the case of income which, in the discretion of the fiduciary, may be either distributed to the beneficiary or accumulated, there shall be allowed as an additional deduction in computing the net income of the estate or trust the amount of the income of the estate or trust for its taxable year, which is properly paid or credited during such year to any legatee, heir, or beneficiary, but the amount so allowed as a deduction shall be included in computing the net income of the legatee, heir, or beneficiary. In such cases the income of the legatee, heir, or beneficiary not a resident shall be taxable only to the extent provided in subsection (f) of section 7 of this act." St.1935, p. 1105. (Italics ours.)

The question involved is: Was the income from sources within this state?

[1,2] In addition to the facts hereinabove recited, counsel have not called to our attention any part of the record showing that the respondent now has or ever had any possession whatever of any part or portion of the securities involved. The appellant claims that said securities were at all times herein mentioned held by California trustees in active trust. He might go further and contend that a naked trust is not presented in any manner by the record before us. 65 C.J. 227, Trusts, sec. 16; Gray v. Union Trust Co., 171 Cal. 637, 639, 154 P. 306. That said trusts were vested in trustees that had their situs at all times in the State of California cannot be disputed. The respondent contends that it has been held that the doctrine of mobilia sequuntur personam—movables follow the law of the person—obtains in the State of California. That it so obtains in proper cases will be conceded. However it remains to ascertain whether said doctrine applies to the facts of this case. The doctrine is a fiction of the common law. 40 C. J. 1232. As said by the court in Liverpool, etc., Ins. Co. v. Board of Assessors for the Parish of Orleans, 221 U.S. 346, 354, 31 S.Ct. 550, 553, 55 L.Ed. 762, L.R.A.1915C, 903, "The legal fiction expressed in the maxim mobilia sequuntur personam yields to the fact of actual control elsewhere." The court cites Blackstone v. Miller, 188 U.S. 189, 23 S.Ct. 277, 47 L.Ed. 439. In that case, 188 U.S. at page 204, 23 S.Ct. at page 278, 47 L.Ed. 439, the court said: "The domicile, naturally, must control a succession of that kind. Universal succession is the artificial continuance of the person of a deceased by an executor, heir, or the like, so far as succession to rights and obligations is concerned. It is a fiction, the historical origin of which is familiar to scholars, and it is this fiction that gives whatever meaning it has to the saying mobilia sequuntur personam. But being a fiction it is not allowed to obscure the facts, when the facts become important." Furthermore, it should be noted that there are well defined exceptions applicable to the maxim mobilia sequuntur personam. In Miller v. McColgan, 17 Cal.2d 432, commencing on page 438, 110 P.2d 419, on page 423, 134 A.L.R. 1424, the court said: "Having fixed upon the source of the particular income as the corporate stock, the next task is to assign to this source a taxable situs. Under the doctrine of mobilia sequuntur personam, shares of stock in a corporation have their situs or location in the state or country wherein their owner resides, unless they have acquired a business situs elsewhere." And then, on page 444 of 17 Cal.2d, 110 P.2d on page 425, the court continues as follows: "At this point it should be noted that the general principle in relation to situs for the purposes of taxation of intangible personal property embodied in the maxim mobilia sequuntur personam has a well-established exception to the effect that there may be a business situs of intangibles distinct from the domicile of the creditor. But respondent has not divided his activities so as to bring himself within this exception. He did not set his property aside in a Philippine trust or engage in business in the Philippines. In consequence, nothing appears here to indicate that the mobilia rule is not applicable to this case." The principal difference between the case just cited and this case is that although respondent did not personally put said securities in a trust, nevertheless Agnes M. Bourn, the trustor, did put them in a trust and they have remained in that trust ever since. The distinction is of much importance. Under the uncontradicted facts the trust property was owned and actively located in San Francisco at all times herein mentioned. The case of De Ganay v. Lederer, 250 U.S. 376, 39 S.Ct. 524, 63 L.Ed. 1042, presented facts quite similar to the record before us. Commencing on page 381, of 250 U.S., 39 S.Ct. on page 526, 63 L.Ed. 1042, the court said:

"We have no doubt that the securities, herein involved, are property. Are they property within the United States? It is insisted that the maxim 'mobilia sequuntur personam' applies in this instance, and that the situs of the property was at the domicile of the owner in France. But this court has frequently declared that maxim, a fiction at most, must yield to the facts and circumstances of cases which require it, and that notes, bonds and mortgages may acquire a situs at a place other than the domicile of the owner, and be there reached by the taxing authority. It is only necessary to refer to some of the decisions of this court. (Citing cases.) Shares of stock in national banks, this court has held, for the purpose of taxation may be separated from the domicile of the owner, and taxed at the place where held. Tappan v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 19 Wall. 490, 22 L.Ed. 189.

"In the case under consideration the stocks and bonds were those of corporations organized under the laws of the United States, and the bonds and mortgages were secured upon property in Pennsylvania. The certificates of stock, the bonds and mortgages were in the Pennsylvania Company's offices in Philadelphia. Not only is this so, but the stocks, bonds and mortgages were held under a power of attorney which gave authority to the agent to sell, assign, or transfer any of them, and to invest and reinvest the proceeds of such sales as it might deem best in the management of the business and affairs of the principal. It is difficult to conceive how property could be more completely localized in the United States. There can be no question of the power of Congress to tax the income from such securities. Thus situated and held, and with the authority given to the local agent over them, we think the income derived is clearly from property within the United States within the meaning of Congress as expressed in the statute under consideration. It follows that the question certified by the Circuit Court of Appeals must be answered in the affirmative." That case has been cited and followed many times. It is sufficient to refer to Safe-Deposit & T. Co. v. Commonwealth of Virginia, 280 U.S. 83, 92, 50 S.Ct. 59, 74 L.Ed. 180, 67 A.L.R. 386; Hill v. Carter, 9 Cir., 47 F.2d 869, 871; Curry v. McCanless, 307 U.S. 357, 59 S.Ct. 900, 83 L.Ed. 1339, 123 A.L.R. 162.

Applying the doctrine to the facts of this case, it clearly appears that the respondent's contention may not be sustained. All of the securities were in the lawful possession of trustees who had their situs in California. The legal title rested in those trustees. They were vested with broad discretionary powers of managing, collecting, investing, selling, and of reinvesting the proceeds. All of such facts refute the fiction that said securities or any of them followed the respondent out of the state.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

KINCAID, Judge.

This appeal is taken from a judgment of conviction of violating section 372, Penal Code, a misdemeanor. The complaint charges that the defendant wilfully and unlawfully maintained a public nuisance which was injurious to the health and offensive to the senses, and which interfered with the comfortable enjoyment of life and property by the neighborhood, in that there was all night barking of dogs at the defendant's animal hospital, and that refuse and rubbish were burned during the day.

The evidence discloses that the defendant is a licensed veterinarian who is operating a "Dog and Cat Hospital" on premises which he leases, and which are located on a main business street in the City of Beverly Hills, California. The small building which he occupies for such business is located on the front part of the lot and his incinerator for the burning of refuse is on the rear portion, some 100 feet back. His place of business is adjoined by other business establishments, but there are occupied residences to the rear of, and otherwise near defendant. While there is evidence that some 300 people live within a one-block radius of the defendant's place of business, five of them testified as to hearing dogs bark, which interfered with their sleep, and that at irregular intervals the odor of burning animal excrement emanated from the defendant's incinerator. Six of such neighbors testified in behalf of the defendant, that they were not annoyed by any such occurrences or conditions.

It is the contention of defendant that, under the foregoing facts, section 372, Penal Code, is inapplicable to him, and that the judgment of conviction against him of violating such section cannot be sustained. With this contention we agree.

Section 370, Penal Code, defines a public nuisance. The pertinent part of section 372, Penal Code, is as follows: "Every person who maintains or commits any public nuisance, the punishment for which is not otherwise prescribed, * * * is guilty of a misdemeanor." (Emphasis added.) This latter section of the code was enacted in 1872, and has never been amended.

In 1903, the Legislature added section 373a to the Penal Code, and it has never since been amended. The pertinent parts thereof are as follows: "Every person who maintains, permits, or allows a public nuisance to exist upon his or her property or premises, and every person occupying or leasing the property or premises of another who maintains, permits or allows a public nuisance to exist thereon, after reasonable notice in writing from a health-officer or district attorney to remove, discontinue or abate the same has been served upon such person, is guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished accordingly; * * *." (Emphasis added.)

[1, 2] Section 372, Penal Code, is general in its terms and application, and is only available for use in the prosecution of criminal public nuisances which are not specifically covered by other Penal Code sections carrying their own prescribed punishment. Among such other sections are 316, 372a, 373a, 374b, and 375, of the Penal Code. The facts of this case bring it within the specific provisions of section 373a, because they relate to the maintenance of a public nuisance by a person who occupies or leases the property or premises of another. "It is the general rule that where the general statute standing alone would include the same matter as the special act, and thus conflict with it, the special act will be considered as an exception to the general statute whether it was passed before or after such general enactment. Where the special statute is later it will be regarded as an exception to or qualification of the prior general one." People v. Breyer, 1934, 139 Cal.App. 547, 550, 34 P.2d 1065, 1066. When a general and a particular statute are inconsistent, the latter is paramount to the former. Code of Civil Procedure, sec. 1859; Civil Code, sec. 3534.

[3] This conclusion does not leave section 372 without operative effect. Section 373a is limited to the maintenance etc. of a nuisance by a person on his own property or on that of another which he occupies, or rents. It does not extend, for instance, to cases like People v. Montoya, 1933, 137 Cal.App.Supp. 784, 28 P.2d 101, where the nuisance was in the public street, or to any other case where defendant commits a nuisance on property he does not own, lease or occupy. All such cases may be prosecuted under section 372.

[4] It is conceded that no written notice of any kind was ever served upon the defendant by a health officer, district attorney or otherwise to discontinue or abate the acts alleged in these proceedings to constitute a nuisance. The service of such a notice is required by section 373a to be given within a reasonable time prior to the commencement of any prosecution for the maintenance of such nuisance, in order to give the one so charged an opportunity to rectify or discontinue the condition of which complaint is made. The justness of such a preliminary requirement is evident when measured by the situation which confronts the defendant by these proceedings. The evidence shows him to be a licensed professional man who is conducting a legitimate business at an established location. The mere possession of dogs or cats does not create a nuisance per se. See In re Cohn, 1940, 37 Cal.App.2d 39, 98 P.2d 769. Although appropriate civil remedies might have been resorted to by way of abatement of any such alleged nuisance, the defendant, without being given the opportunity of remedying the claimed evils through notice that they were offensive to his neighbors, found himself under arrest charged with the commission of a crime.

[5, 6] It is only where, " * * * after notice by the authorities to discontinue the same, the person maintaining such nuisance, fails or omits to discontinue it or remove the cause thereof, [he] will be prosecuted and punished for such dereliction. His omission to abate the nuisance is in reality wherein he offends the law." People v. Pozzi, 1928, 91 Cal.App. 150, 157, 266 P. 860, 862. It is thus evident that the complaint herein fails to state a public offense by the defendant of a violation of section 373a, as no facts are alleged showing him to have failed or omitted to abate any nuisance after notice by the proper authorities to discontinue the same.

Appeal from Municipal Court of City of Los Angeles; Frank G. Tyrrell, Judge.

Action by 20th Century Lites, Inc., against Herman Goodman to recover monthly payments claimed to be due under a written contract whereby plaintiff leased neon sign installations to defendant. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Harrison Weil, Stanley Phipps and Everett B. Laybourne, all of Los Angeles, for plaintiff and appellant.

Sims & Wallbert and James H. Sims, all of Los Angeles, for defendant and respondent.

KINCAID, Judge.

This appeal arises out of an action commenced by plaintiff to recover certain monthly payments claimed due under a written contract whereby plaintiff leased neon sign installations to defendant in consideration of agreed payments to be made by defendant for the contractual period. The defendant, among other defenses, alleges that by reason of the governmental order of August 5, 1942, prohibiting the illumination of all outside neon or lighting equipment between the hours of sunset and sunrise, he has been prevented, without fault on his part, from using such installations during the nighttime, and that such use was the desired object and effect contemplated by the parties at the time of the execution of the contract.

The lease contract of September 3, 1941 is one wherein plaintiff retains the title to the neon signs and tubing which it installed and maintained on the exterior of defendant's "drive-in" restaurant. The court found from the evidence that the parties had each performed all terms and conditions of the contract to August 4, 1942; that on August 5, 1942 the Government of the United States, as an emergency war measure, ordered a cessation of all outside lighting, including neon illuminated signs, at all hours between sunset and sunrise, covering the district in which defendant's place of business is located; that said proclamation of cessation has, during all the time in question, remained in full force and effect, and that, because of this fact, the defendant has been prevented from illuminating such signs during such hours; that subsequent to August 5, 1942 defendant offered to surrender to plaintiff such contract, to terminate same, and to permit plaintiff to remove such signs, but plaintiff refused to accept the offer and thereafter, beginning September 1, 1942, defendant failed to pay the monthly rental payments in the contract set forth.

The trial court properly concluded and found that, by reason of such governmental proclamation, the desired object or effect that the parties to the contract intended to attain at the time it was entered into, was frustrated without the fault of either party on and after August 5, 1942, and that defendant was harmed thereby. It further found that on and after said date both parties to said contract were excused from any further performance of any one of the terms or conditions thereof, and that said contract thereupon terminated.

[1,2] The legal principles which are here applicable are set forth in the case of Johnson v. Atkins, 1942, 53 Cal.App.2d 430, 433, 127 P.2d 1027, 1029, wherein the court quotes with approval from Restatement of the Law of Contracts, section 288, as follows: "Where the assumed possibility of a desired object or effect to be attained by either party to a contract forms the basis on which both parties enter into it, and this object or effect is or surely will be frustrated, a promisor who is without fault in causing the frustration, and who is harmed thereby, is discharged from the duty of performing his promise unless a contrary intention appears.'” To the same general effect such decision further quotes (page 434 of 53 Cal.App.2d, page 1030 of 127 P.2d), from 13 C.J. 642: “Where from the nature of the contract it is evident that the parties contracted on the basis of the continued existence of the person or thing, condition or state of things to which it relates, the subsequent perishing of the person or thing, or cessation of existence of the condition, will excuse the performance, a condition to such effect being implied, in spite of the fact that the promise may have been unqualified.” These principles are apparently recognized by Civil Code, sec. 1511, subd. 1. Among the California cases in support thereof are Johnson v. Atkins, supra; Hackfeld & Co. v. Castle, 1921, 186 Cal. 53, 198 P. 1041; and La Cumbre Golf & Country Club v. Santa Barbara Hotel Co., 1928, 205 Cal. 422, 271 P. 476.

[3,4] Plaintiff contends that the foregoing principles of law, which have been called the doctrine of commercial frustration, are inapplicable under the terms and conditions of the contract made by the parties herein; that the contractual provisions for block lettering of the signs, thus making them visible in the daytime when they are not illuminated, and the availability of the illumination of the sign during daylight as well as dark hours, demonstrate that there has been no destruction of the subject matter of the contract and that the desired object was not completely frustrated. It argues that the enforced termination of illumination of the signs during the night hours caused only a condition rendering the transaction less attractive and less profitable to defendant.

In considering the soundness of plaintiff's position, it is first necessary to examine the contract in order to ascertain the nature of the “desired object or effect to be attained” by the transaction which the agreement represents. The contract describes the thing leased to defendant as an “electrical advertising display.” The defendant is required to use it at his place of business and not elsewhere. Ordinarily, words of a contract are to be understood in their ordinary or popular sense. (Civil Code, sec. 1644.) Webster's New International Dictionary defines the noun “display” as “An opening or unfolding; exhibition; manifestation. Ostentatious show; exhibition for effect; parade.” When qualified by the adjective “electrical” it becomes an electrical exhibition or electrical manifestation. In order to be an electrical display, it must use electricity, in which event it then becomes illuminated and is an “electrical advertising display.” Unelectrified, it is merely a display. While unilluminated, it would remain as a sign, still it would not be the “electrical advertising display” which the contract called for and which manifestly was the “desired object or effect to be attained.”

[5,6] The contract is silent as to what hours of the day or night the signs were to be illuminated, although it requires the use of the “electrical advertising display” for a period of 36 months. The absence from the contract of any provision fixing hours of the day or night during which the sign is to be illuminated does not create an uncertainty. The parol evidence was inadmissible for the purpose of interpreting any such claimed uncertainty, but it was properly admitted to show a state of facts to which the doctrine of commercial frustration was applicable. The cases do not hold that such facts must appear on the face of the contract, and the purpose of proving them is not to vary the terms of the contract itself, but to show that a state of facts has arisen which results in its termination. The evidence is admissible, not for the purpose of inserting in the contract a provision requiring the defendant to use the sign at night or forbidding him to use it at any other time, but only to show that its illumination at night was the desired object to be obtained by the parties, and that the possibility of such illumination formed the basis on which both parties entered into the contract.

The defendant testified that he had never at any time illuminated the signs in the daytime, and that at the time of his negotiations with plaintiff's representative for such signs defendant advised plaintiff that he was interested in a neon sign for nighttime illumination for his place of business, which he needed because he was “blocked off more or less on a side street.” Plaintiff's agent then demonstrated a tube which he said was a much larger and brighter neon tube than the ordinary one, and that by installing it in the tower of the building, it would give illumination at night from a great distance and would bring traffic into his place. Such a tube was ultimately installed as a part of the display.

It is apparent, therefore, that the "desired object or effect to be obtained" by defendant in his hiring of the "electrical advertising display" was the dual purpose of illuminating the exterior of his place of business at night, and the advertising thereof by means of the electrically illuminated signs during the nighttime, whereby passing trade would be notified of the presence of his place of business and would be attracted thereto. The merely incidental facts, that it remained physically possible to illuminate the display with electricity in the daytime and the signs were visible even though unlighted during the daylight hours, are of such inconsequential moment as to have no effect on the application of the rule.

[7] When considered with the fact that all of such neon installations were on the exterior of the building, the required termination of the use of electricity in such signs, between the hours of sunset and sunrise, constituted a "cessation of existence of the condition" which was the "desired object or effect" and was the essential, primary and principal basis for which the signs were rented. The court's finding that such were the facts is substantially supported by the evidence.

[8] We cannot agree with plaintiff's contention that the doctrine of commercial frustration may not be applied unless the defendant can show that the legal prohibition of the use to which the electrical equipment may be put was complete and that such use was entirely prevented for any purpose permitted under the contract of letting. The weight of authority in the United States is to the contrary, and is to the effect that such doctrine may be invoked whenever official governmental action prevents the hirer from using the property for the primary and principal purpose for which it was hired. In such event the contract of hiring is terminated even though other incidental uses might remain available for the thing hired.

[9-10] Such governmental proclamation having, without the fault of either party to the contract, frustrated the "desired object or effect to be obtained," the doctrine of commercial frustration is applied through the means of implying a condition to exist in the contract whereby under such circumstances as are here found, the parties shall be excused from any further performance of its terms. This rule is cited in Johnson v. Atkins, supra, 53 Cal. App.2d page 431, 127 P.2d page 1028 wherein an excerpt from the case of Straus v. Kazemekas, 100 Conn. 581, 124 A. 234, 238, is quoted as follows: "'Where from the nature of the contract and the surrounding circumstances the parties from the beginning must have known that it could not be fulfilled unless when the time for fulfillment arrived, some particular thing or condition of things continued to exist so that they must be deemed, when entering into the contract, to have contemplated such continuing existence as the foundation of what was to be done; in the absence of any express or implied warranty that such thing or condition of things shall exist the contract is to be construed as subject to an implied condition that the parties shall be excused in case, before breach, performance becomes impossible or the purpose of the contract frustrated from such thing or condition ceasing to exist without default of either of the parties. 12 A.L.R. 1275.'"

The lease contract herein contains no provisions with regard to the contingencies here considered. The right to illuminate the signs at night being the primary foundation essential to the desirability and usefulness of the contract, the termination of that right under the conditions here found results in a situation wherein the contract must be deemed subject to the implied condition that the parties had in mind, at the inception of the contract, that such primary foundation should be continuing in existence. Such being the case the trial court properly held that from and after August 5, 1942 the contract was terminated and both parties thereto were excused from further performance.

[11] Plaintiff argues that, even conceding the facts above referred to as being true, the doctrine of commercial frustration cannot be invoked in this case, because of the fact that it has been put to an expense in manufacturing and installing the signs; that the termination of the contract on such grounds would violate the principles of equity. It relies strongly on the case of San Joaquin L. & P. Corp. v. Costaloupes, 1929, 96 Cal.App. 322, 274 P. 84, in support of this contention. The latter case may be distinguished from the one here under consideration, as the court there held the contract to be one to deliver electrical energy to a certain described piece of land irrespective of its use. Although a fire had destroyed the factory wherein it had been contemplated that the electricity would be used, the court said (page 327 of 96 Cal.App., page 86 of 274 P.): "All that appears here is that by reason of the premises the defendants could not use any more power or light in these particular buildings, but, if at any time, they chose to rebuild or make other use or application of the light and power, they could have enforced their right of delivery of electrical energy." This is a vastly different situation than is presented by the contract and the facts of our case. Here, the plaintiff agreed to furnish an "electrical advertising display" which contemplated its being continuously operatable by electrified illumination at night. Furthermore, the defendant was not in the position of the user of electricity in the cited case, in that he could not relieve his situation by any voluntary act of his own, such as rebuilding his factory or making other use of the hired product. The facts herein are such as to prohibit the application of this exception to the general rule.

[12] The defendant, by way of petition for rehearing, for the first time advanced the proposition that, because of the governmental order of November 1, 1943 abolishing the dim-out requirements, the effect of such dim-out regulation was to merely suspend, rather than terminate, the contract during the approximately fourteen months' existence of such regulation. Rehearing was granted, and this proposition was argued and considered.

Such is not the rule in cases where the doctrine of commercial frustration applies. On the application of such doctrine, the promisor "is discharged from the duty of performing his promise * * ." Johnson v. Atkins, supra, 53 Cal.App.2d page 434, 127 P.2d page 1029. (Emphasis added.) On page 433 of 53 Cal.App.2d, on page 1029 of 127 P.2d, we find, " * *" such a frustration brings the contract to an end forthwith, without more and automatically."

This rule has been recognized by the United States Supreme Court in the case of Allanwilde Transport Corp. v. Vacuum Oil Co., 1918, 248 U.S. 377, 39 S.Ct. 147, 149, 63 L.Ed. 312, 3 A.L.R. 15, where it was urged that the government's embargo on ships leaving American ports during a part of World War I, because of the enemy submarine menace, constituted but a temporary impediment, and therefore did not terminate the contract. In holding to the contrary, the court said: "The duration was of indefinite extent. Necessarily, the embargo would be continued as long as the cause of its imposition—that is, the submarine menace—and that, as far as then could be inferred, would be the duration of the war, of which there could be no estimate or reliable speculation. The condition was, therefore, so far permanent as naturally and justifiably to determine business judgment and action depending upon it."

The cases where the doctrine of commercial frustration, with its immediate termination of the obligations of the promisor applies, are to be distinguished from that type of case wherein such doctrine is inapplicable and the governmental embargo or regulation is not a permanent prohibition but is temporary only. The case of United States Trading Corp. v. Newmark G. Co., 1922, 56 Cal.App. 176, 186, 205 P. 29, is of the latter class, and does not conflict with the rule heretofore enunciated.

The judgment is affirmed, respondent to recover his costs of appeal.

There is no such privity between officers or stockholders of a corporation as to impute the knowledge of one to another in his individual capacity.

5. Fraud ⚭58(1)

Finding that termination of agency contract rendered valueless agency corporation's capital stock, the sale of which allegedly was procured by fraud, was not sustained by evidence showing that at time of misrepresentations corporation had prospects for placing principal's machines, which if contracts therefor were placed within reasonable time would give corporation's stock a value of some $100,000 or more.

6. Principal and agent ⚭82

Where agency contract for sale of machines called for 12½ per cent. commission of all rental payments received by principal, but principal reserved right to adopt other methods of placing machines and exercised that right in sale of one machine, some commission was payable to agent on the purchase price, and the 12½ per cent. rate would at least prima facie establish rate of commission to be paid in case of sales.

7. Brokers ⚭52

A broker having obtained an option is entitled to a commission when customer exercises option within the life thereof by entering into the transaction which broker was employed to negotiate.

8. Principal and agent ⚭81(5)

An agent selling goods on commission is entitled to a commission on goods sold by him during continuance of the agency, though goods were not delivered or paid for or even though orders were not received by principal until after termination of agency relationship.

9. Principal and agent ⚭81(5)

Where agency contract contemplates that agent shall receive compensation for sales of which agent was the procuring cause, agent is entitled to commission on sales procured by him though sales were actually consummated by principal after termination of the agency.

10. Principal and agent ⚭81(5)

Where services to be performed by agent are severable, agent may, in absence of a contrary provision in agency contract, recover for services performed before termination of the relationship.

11. Principal and agent ⚭81(5)

Distributing agent, having brought about execution of contract for the purchase of a machine from principal subject to trial with option to purchase additional machines on specified terms, was entitled to commissions on whatever sales were made pursuant to such contract, though in meantime, agency contract was forfeited for agent's breach thereof.

12. Fraud ⚭59(3)

The measure of damages for fraudulent procurement of sale of capital stock was the difference in actual value between what stockholders received and what the shares were in fact worth, the "actual value" of the stock being determined by the worth of the corporate assets, not the "market value" of the stock. Civ.Code, § 3343.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Actual Value" and "Market Value".

13. Fraud ⚡57

In determining measure of damages for fraudulent procurement of sale of capital stock, future profits may be shown for the light they throw on actual value of the stock at time of its fraudulent purchase. Civ.Code, § 3343.

14. Damages ⚡6

One whose wrongful conduct has rendered difficult the ascertainment of damages cannot escape liability because damages cannot be measured with exactness.

15. Fraud ⚡9, 57

Stockholders who relied on false representations that agency corporation had placed no machines for its principal, inducing belief that when agency contract was canceled the stock in agency corporation would be valueless, could recover damages on showing that subsequent sales of principal's machines were made as result of efforts of corporation under canceled contract, and such sales should be considered in computing value of stock sold. Civ. Code, § 3343.

Action by J. A. Zinn and others against Ex-Cell-O Corporation and others to rescind a sale by plaintiffs to named defendant of shares of the capital stock of Sealed-Pure Systems, Inc., or to recover damages for alleged fraudulent procurement of such sale. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed as to one defendant and reversed as to other defendants.

Prior opinion, Cal.App., 141 P.2d 948.

Livingston & Livingston, David Livingston, and Louis F. Di Resta, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Webb, Webb & Olds, U. S. Webb, and Walter K. Olds, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

Plaintiffs instituted an action for rescission or damages based on the alleged fraudulent procurement of the termination of an agency contract and the sale by them to defendant Ex-Cell-O Corporation (hereinafter referred to as Ex-Cell-O) of shares of capital stock of Sealed-Pure Systems, Inc., (hereinafter referred to as Sealed-Pure). Judgment in the trial court was in favor of the defendants. The plaintiffs appealed.

The question presented is whether the findings of the trial court are supported by the evidence and furnish support for the judgment.

On October 30, 1937, plaintiff Zinn and his associates procured from Ex-Cell-O, a manufacturer of machines designed to make cardboard milk containers, an exclusive agency contract, which provided that within ninety days plaintiffs should place three machines, and within six months they should place one machine in Seattle, one in either Oakland or San Francisco, and one in Los Angeles, all under lease-royalty contracts with the manufacturer. Plaintiff and his associates then incorporated Sealed-Pure, with a capital stock of 10,000 shares of no par value, and, with the consent of Ex-Cell-O, assigned to it the agency contract in return for stock. The defendant Malkson received stock in return for cash. One machine was immediately placed with Gold Star Creameries (hereinafter referred to as Gold Star), a corporation in which Zinn and his associates were stockholders. This is conceded to have been a substantial compliance with the requirement that a machine be placed in Seattle, but no other machines were placed within the ninety-day or six-month periods. Gold Star had financial difficulties, and Sealed-Pure, apparently with the acquiescence of Ex-Cell-O, lent considerable money to Gold Star in the belief that it would be fatal to the prospect of placing other machines in the Pacific Coast territory if the first one installed there should be a failure. As a result of these loans Sealed-Pure also encountered financial difficulties, and discord arose among its promoters.

In February, 1938, the sales manager of Ex-Cell-O went to Seattle and arranged that Sealed-Pure should open an office in San Francisco with defendant Malkson as general manager, and that Zinn should devote his attention exclusively to the business of Gold Star. From the time the arrangement was made, Malkson had charge of Sealed-Pure's activities. Gold Star continued to operate at a loss and was unable to pay the moneys due Sealed-Pure. As a result, Malkson was short of funds and Ex-Cell-O made advances to him on the security of the Gold Star notes.

During all of this time Ex-Cell-O took no steps to cancel the agency agreement. In January, 1938, it expressly agreed to an extension of the ninety-day period provided aggressive sales efforts were made. Zinn, and later Malkson, devoted much time in attempting to place machines with Lucerne Cream and Butter Company, a subsidiary of Safeway Stores, Inc. (hereinafter referred to as Safeway), which operated chain stores in the Pacific Coast territory. By July, 1938, these negotiations reached the point where Safeway requested that an officer of Ex-Cell-O come to San Francisco for the purpose of negotiating a contract. At the request of Malkson, defendant Bixby secretary-treasurer of Ex-Cell-O, went from Detroit to San Francisco, and on July 25th, he and Malkson obtained a contract with Safeway for the placing in Oakland of one machine on ninety days' trial, with an option to purchase it for $32,500, and additional machines at $37,500 each. As part of the same transaction they received a purchase order for the trial machine at $32,500.

While in San Francisco, Bixby told Malkson that Ex-Cell-O planned to cancel the Sealed-Pure agency contract. Malkson expressed his regret, but asked Bixby to engage him as Pacific Coast agent if that were done. Bixby proceeded to Seattle and three days after the Safeway contract was signed, on July 28th, met Zinn and his associates. Bixby told them that Sealed-Pure had failed to place any machines in California as required by the agency contract, and that Ex-Cell-O was going to abolish the agency, in which event the Sealed-Pure stock would be valueless. Zinn and his associates first demurred to the proposed cancellation and made unsuccessful attempts to raise additional funds. They then negotiated with Bixby for the sale of their Sealed-Pure stock to Ex-Cell-O, and Bixby told them he would try to get one dollar a share for them. Zinn then said to Bixby in the presence of others, "How do I know you haven't already got an order in your pocket or have made some deal we don't know anything about?" Bixby replied, "If I had an order in my pocket or had made any deal I would tell you about it." Bixby denied that this conversation took place but he did not reveal that an agreement had theretofore been made with Safeway for the installation of one machine and for an option to purchase others.

On August 1st Ex-Cell-O wrote Sealed-Pure cancelling the agency agreement, and negotiations were entered into for the sale of the Sealed-Pure stock to Ex-Cell-O. These negotiations were completed, and the transfer of the stock was made on August 30th. Subsequently Sealed-Pure was dissolved by Ex-Cell-O, and Ex-Cell-O appointed Malkson its Pacific Coast agent. Within a short time Safeway bought six machines. It may not be questioned that these machines had been placed through the efforts of Malkson on behalf of Sealed-Pure.

[1] When Zinn learned of the Safeway installation at the end of August, 1938, he took no action. The testimony disclosed that, relying on Bixby's representations, the plaintiffs believed that the installation was made pursuant to an arrangement effected by Ex-Cell-O after the Sealed-Pure agency agreement was cancelled, and it was not until January, 1939, when Zinn learned that a large quantity of cardboard for milk bottles had been ordered by Safeway on August 1, 1938, that he suspected for the first time that a machine had already been placed by Sealed-Pure when Bixby's representations were made. He immediately instituted an investigation. This action was then brought to rescind the sale to Ex-Cell-O of Sealed-Pure stock, or for damages. Rescission being impossible by reason of the dissolution of Sealed-Pure, the plaintiffs abandoned that claim and sought damages only.

The trial court found that Bixby made the representations alleged, that the same were false, and that plaintiffs believed and relied upon them; but further found that even had plaintiffs known that the representations were false they would not have rejected defendants' offer to purchase their stock at the price paid. The court also found that Sealed-Pure was in default under its contract with Ex-Cell-O; that Ex-Cell-O had a right to declare the contract forfeited; that plaintiffs were entitled to notice of the intended termination and cancellation and to a reasonable time within which to comply with the terms and conditions before a forfeiture thereof could be declared, but that plaintiffs waived their right to notice and to time within which to comply with the contract; that both plaintiffs and defendants acquiesced in the cancellation of the contract by Ex-Cell-O.

[2] The evidence is insufficient to support the finding that plaintiffs would have sold their stock at the price paid for it if they had known that their efforts had been rewarded by the contract with Safeway.

[3] Both the evidence and the findings are clear to the effect that the false representation was believed and relied upon by the plaintiffs. This court has held that "a single material misstatement, knowingly made, with intent to influence another into entering into a contract, will, if believed and relied on by that other, afford as complete ground for rescission as if it had been accompanied by a multitude of other false representations." Davis v. Butler, 154 Cal. 623, 98 P. 1047, 1048; see, also, 12 Cal.Jur. 741, and cases there cited.

[4] The defendants seek to impute Malkson's knowledge as an officer of Sealed-Pure to the plaintiffs. That knowledge may not be so imputed. There is no privity between the officers and stockholders of a corporation which would impute the knowledge of one to another in his individual capacity. Pitman v. Walker, 187 Cal. 667, 670, 203 P. 739.

[5] The court's further finding that the effect of the cancellation of the agency contract was to render the stock of Sealed-Pure valueless is also without substantial support in the evidence. The evidence shows value, and the trial court recognized value and the falsity of Bixby's representation as to lack of value by its finding that at the time the representation was made by Bixby, Sealed-Pure had prospects for the placing of certain of the machines, which, if contracts therefor were placed within a reasonable time, would give the stock of Sealed-Pure "a value of $100,000 or more as alleged by plaintiffs."

[6] The agency contract called for a 12½ per cent commission to Sealed-Pure of all rental payments received by Ex-Cell-O, but Ex-Cell-O reserved the right to adopt other methods of placing the machines than by lease-royalty, and in the case of the contract with Safeway it exercised that right. Under those circumstances some commission would be payable to Sealed-Pure on the purchase price, and the 12½ per cent commission fixed in the contract as commission on lease-royalty agreements would at least prima facie establish the rate of commission to be paid in case of sales.

[7] It is apparent that when Sealed-Pure brought about the execution of the contract with Safeway it had done all that was required by the agency contract as modified, to entitle it to receive commissions if thereafter Safeway elected to purchase one or more machines pursuant thereto. The applicable rule is stated in 12 C.J.S., Brokers, § 86, p. 200: "Although the broker has obtained only an option, he is entitled to a commission when the customer exercises the option, within the life thereof, by entering into the transaction which the broker was employed to negotiate." To the same effect are: Dinkelspiel v. Nason, 17 Cal.App. 591, 120 P. 789; Mitchell v. Derby Oil Co., 117 Kan. 520, 232 P. 224; Finnerty v. Stratton's Estate, 53 Colo. 17, 123 P. 667; Snead v. Wood, 24 Ga.App. 210, 100 S.E. 714; Mahoney v. Pitman, Tex.Civ.App., 43 S.W.2d 143; Campbell v. Rawlings, 52 App.D.C. 37, 280 F. 1011; 8 Am.Jur. 1094.

[8-10] Having fully performed the service which would entitle Sealed-Pure to commissions upon sales subsequently made under the trial-option agreement, the only question remaining is the effect of the termination of the agency contract upon the agent's right to commissions.

The applicable rule with supporting authorities is stated in 3 C.J.S., Agency, § 187, p. 88: "The rule that the agent is entitled to recover for services rendered before his discharge is particularly applicable where the contract of agency is severable. Accordingly, an agent selling goods on commission is entitled to a commission on goods sold by him during the continuance of the agency, although the goods were not delivered or paid for, or even where the orders were not received by the principal, until after the termination of the relationship. If the contract contemplates that the agent shall receive compensation for sales of which the agent was the procuring cause, the agent is entitled to a commission on sales procured by him although the sales were actually consummated by the principal after the termination of the agency." And § 189, at page 91 of the same volume: "Where the services to be performed by the agent are severable, he may, in the absence of a contrary provision in the agency contract, recover for services performed before the termination of the relationship."

The rule is applied in cases involving similar situations. Brea v. McGlashan, 3 Cal.App.2d 454, 39 P.2d 877; Sackett v. Centaur Motor Co., 189 Ill.App. 372; S. H. Greene & Sons v. Freund, 2 Cir., 150 F. 721, 80 C.C.A. 387; White Co. v. W. P. Farley & Co., 219 Ky. 66, 292 S.W. 472, 52 A.L.R. 541; Crosby v. Pacific S. S. Lines, 9 Cir., 133 F.2d 470.

In Sackett v. Centaur Motor Co., supra, plaintiff had an agency for the sale of automobiles on a commission "of the gross sales emanating" through his office. He was discharged and claimed commissions on automobiles sold on orders given after his discharge pursuant to what amounted to options arranged by him before discharge. The court said at page 375 of 189 Ill.App.: "If the alleged contracts were nothing more than arrangements, when an 'arrangement' with a prospective purchaser ripens into a sale, it gives a right to the agent to a commission for the reason that the agent's efforts are the efficient cause of the sale."

[11] The rule exists for the protection of the agent and is applicable to the undisputed facts of this case. Sealed-Pure "obtained" Safeway as a buyer pursuant to the contract brought about by it, and was entitled to the commissions on such sales despite the termination of its agency. For this reason the termination of the agency contract did not render the stock of Sealed-Pure valueless as found by the trial court.

[12-14] The evidence and the findings settle the plaintiffs' right to a recovery of the difference in the value of the stock by reason of the prospective sales brought about by the efforts of Bixby and Malkson on behalf of Sealed-Pure, and the amount which the plaintiffs actually received for their stock. Section 3343 of the Civil Code provides that one defrauded in the sale of property is entitled to recover the difference between the actual value of that with which he parted and the actual value of that which he received. The value of the stock is to be determined by the worth of the corporate assets, not the "market value" of the stock. Note in 57 A.L.R. 1153, and cases therein collected. Future profits may be shown for the light that they throw on the value of the stock at the time of its fraudulent purchase. Hacker Pipe & S. Co. v. Chapman Valve Mfg. Co., 17 Cal.App.2d 265, 271, 61 P.2d 944; Wakeman v. Wheeler & Wilson Mfg. Co., 101 N.Y. 205, 4 N.E. 264, 54 Am.St.Rep. 676. In Sinclair Refining Co. v. Jenkins, etc., Co., 289 U.S. 689, 53 S.Ct. 736, 739, 77 L.Ed. 1449, 88 A.L.R. 496, the Supreme Court stated: "To correct uncertain prophecies in such circumstances is not to charge the offender with elements of value nonexistent at the time of his offense. It is to bring out and expose to the light the elements of value that were there from the beginning." One whose wrongful conduct has rendered difficult the ascertainment of the damages cannot escape liability because the damages could not be measured with exactness. Pacific, etc., Co. v. Alaska Packers' Ass'n, 138 Cal. 632, 638, 72 P. 161; 15 Am.Jur. 412, and cases cited.

[15] The plaintiffs in any event are entitled to recover on the showing that subsequent sales to Safeway were made as a result of the efforts of Sealed-Pure under the cancelled contract and those sales should be taken into consideration in computing the value of the stock sold. Whether by reason of the termination of the agency contract Sealed Pure was entitled to recover against Ex-Cell-O for wrongful repudiation of the agency contract is a matter bearing upon any possible additional damages.

The record shows that Malkson was not a party to the false representations. The judgment as to that defendant is therefore affirmed. As to the defendants Ex-Cell-O Corporation and Bixby the judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. MEYER.

Cr. 3783.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

June 1, 1944.

Hearing Denied June 29, 1944.

Criminal law §1182

Where evidence was overwhelming that defendant was guilty of infamous crime against nature and of lewd and lascivious conduct upon 13 year old boys and the trial was fairly conducted and the rulings complained of, if erroneous, were of a trivial nature which did not result in a miscarriage of justice, the conviction would be affirmed. Pen.Code, §§ 286, 288.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie E. Still, Judge.

Frederic Meyer was convicted of the infamous crime against nature, and of lewd and lascivious conduct upon the private parts of 13 year old boys, and he appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

Morris Lavine, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., and T. G. Negrich, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

W. J. WOOD, Justice.

Defendant was found guilty by a jury on eight counts of an information containing six counts charging the commission of the infamous crime against nature, Sec. 286 of the Penal Code, and four counts charging lewd and lascivious conduct upon the private parts of thirteen year old boys, Sec. 288 of the Penal Code. The boy mentioned as the victim in counts V and VI, not having been served with process of the court, did not appear at the trial and counts V and VI were dismissed. The five boys mentioned as victims in the other counts gave testimony detailing the actions of defendant on their persons at a summer camp for boys, which was being conducted by defendant. Their testimony clearly established defendant's guilt of the various charges.

There is no occasion to again besmirch the records of this court by here setting out in detail the actions of defendant as related by the boys involved. The evidence of guilt was overwhelming. The trial was fairly conducted. The rulings complained of, if erroneous, were of a trivial nature, which did not result in a miscarriage of justice.

The judgments are affirmed.

Edith Sanders STEWARD, Benjamin Sanders, and Helen Sanders Boehner, Respondents, v. Minnie Maude STODDARD, Appellant.

Civ. 3274.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

June 5, 1944.

Appeal from a decree of the Superior Court of Orange County determining heirship; Franklin G. West, Judge.

A. D. Orme, George S. Carter, and C. C. Hamill, all of Pasadena, for appellant.

Forgy, Reinhaus & Forgy, of Santa Ana, and Leslie P. Kimmell, of Long Beach, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

On stipulation of all parties to this appeal, duly filed herein, it is hereby ordered that the Decree Determining Heirship, dated November 8, 1943, from which this appeal was taken, is hereby modified by striking therefrom the second paragraph, reading as follows:

"It is ordered, adjudged and decreed that Minnie Maude Stoddard, sister of the above named decedent, be and she is entitled to distribution from the said estate of Certificate No. 48 evidencing seven shares of stock of Sheldon University Press standing in the name of V. G. Miller which was the maiden name of the above named decedent; the said Minnie Maude Stoddard is further entitled to distribution from said estate of old coins in the sum of $64.00 and in addition thereto of the sum of $768.04; that the brother and sisters of Leslie L. Sanders, predeceased husband of the above named decedent, said brother and sisters being named as follows, to-wit: Ben E. Sanders, Edith Sanders Steward and Helen Sanders Boehner, are entitled to distribution of all of the rest, residue and remainder of said estate."

And inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"It is ordered, adjudged and decreed that Minnie Maude Stoddard, sister of the above named decedent, is entitled to have distributed to her one-half of the estate of Viola Glen Sanders, deceased, and that Benjamin Sanders (sometimes called Ben E. Sanders), Edith Sanders Steward and Helen Sanders Boehner, are entitled to distribution of all of the rest, residue and remainder of said estate."

As so modified the decree appealed from is affirmed. Each party to pay his own costs on appeal, and, by stipulation, the remittitur shall issue forthwith.

UNITED STATES FIDELITY & GUARANTY CO. v. POSTEL et al.

Civ. No. 12609.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

May 27, 1944.

As Modified June 1, 1944.

1. Fraudulent conveyances ⇨298(1), 299(1)

In action by surety on guardian's bonds against guardian and her attorney, to whom she assigned her interest in assets of her deceased husband's estate as consideration for professional services, to set aside the assignment after surety paid judgment for guardian's default, evidence was insufficient to show that assignment was intended to defraud plaintiff.

2. Fraudulent conveyances ⇨295(1)

The fact that assignment was fraudulent as to assignor's creditors must be proved by clear and convincing evidence.

3. Fraudulent conveyances ⇨91

The fact that debt or part thereof is barred by statute of limitations does not invalidate assignment of claim based thereon as defrauding assignor's creditors, unless fraud be proven as fact.

4. Fraudulent conveyances ⇨86, 88

The extinguishment of security or pre-existing debt constitutes valuable consideration for sale or assignment of property.

5. Fraudulent conveyances ⇨115(1)

A debtor may prefer one creditor to another, in absence of fraud. Civ.Code, §§ 3431, 3432.

6. Fraudulent conveyances ⇨115(1)

The fact that debtor's preference of one creditor to another, as authorized by statute, hinders or delays other creditors in collection of their claims against debtor, or fact that preferred creditor has knowledge of such consequence, does not render preference void. Civ.Code, § 3432.

7. Fraudulent conveyances ⇨77

A guardian's assignment to her attorney of claim against her deceased husband's estate for $17,966.55 in consideration of legal services reasonably worth over $20,000 after surety on her bonds obtained judgment against her for amounts paid by surety to satisfy wards' judgments against guardian, was supported by valid consideration, and hence binding, though it rendered guardian insolvent and constituted preference of one of her creditors over such surety and other creditors.

8. Fraudulent conveyances ⇨91

The Uniform Fraudulent Conveyance Act, defining "fair consideration," does not exclude promise to pay debt barred in part by statute of limitations, if fair consideration is given in good faith by respective parties. Civ.Code, §§ 3439 et seq., 3439.03.

9. Executors and administrators ⇨115, 220

The purpose of statute providing that no executor or administrator may purchase any property of or claim against decedent's estate is to forbid such representative from directly or indirectly purchasing such property or claim for his own advantage and to estate's detriment. Probate Code, § 583.

10. Executors and administrators ⇨115

The statute prohibiting administrator from purchasing any property of or claim against decedent's estate is only declaratory of pre-existing legal principle that a trustee must not deal with himself, and hence does not prevent decedent's heirs from making contract with administrator as one of heirs for division of estate. Probate Code, § 583.

11. Executors and administrators ⇨220

An administrator has no right to be interested, directly or indirectly, in purchase of claim against decedent's estate before court's approval thereof, but may accept assignment of claim in payment of claimant's personal indebtedness to administrator if claim has acquired legal status before assignment, as in case of widow's claim against her deceased husband's estate for alimony awarded her by interlocutory decree of divorce from husband. Probate Code, § 583.

12. Executors and administrators ⇨220

An administrator's acceptance of assignment of approved claim of decedent's widow against decedent's estate in consideration of legal services, worth more than amount of claim, as claimant's attorney in connection with other matters than such claim, did not violate statute prohibiting administrator from purchasing any property of or claim against estate, in absence of showing of resulting injury to any heir of decedent or any one interested in estate. Probate Code, § 583.

13. Executors and administrators ⇨220

Transactions in violation of statute prohibiting administrator from purchasing or being interested in purchase of any property of, or claim against, decedent's estate are not void, but only voidable at instance of parties interested in estate. Probate Code, § 583.

14. Executors and administrators ⇨220

A surety company, recovering judgment against guardian for amounts paid by such company as surety on guardian's bonds to satisfy ward's judgments against guardian, had no interest in guardian's deceased husband's estate, and hence could not attack validity of guardian's assignment of her claim against such estate to her attorney, who was administrator of estate, in consideration of legal services, as violating statute prohibiting administrator from purchasing property of or claim against estate. Probate Code, § 583.

15. Appeal and error ⇨1184

Where respondent died on a date subsequent to submission of the appeal, the appellate court ordered that the judgment be filed nunc pro tunc as the date of the submission of the appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Robert W. McWilliams, Judge.

Action by the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company against Waldo F. Postel, individually and as administrator of the estate of Arthur W. Keck, deceased, and Lizzie Keck, to set aside defendant Keck's assignment of her interest in the assets of the estate to defendant Postel. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

J. A. Chase, of Visalia, for appellant.

Waldo F. Postel, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WARD, Justice.

On May 22, 1925 the plaintiff, a surety company, at the request of Lizzie B. Keck issued to her three surety bonds, each in the amount of $2,600, and being respectively in favor of the three minor children of herself and her husband Arthur W. Keck. The bonds were given to assure the faithful discharge by Mrs. Keck of her duties as the duly appointed guardian of the minors.

Mrs. Keck subsequently, and while the bonds were in full force, defaulted in accounting for the funds of the minors which had come into her possession as guardian, and by reason thereof each of said minors brought suit and secured judgment against the surety company in the sum of $2,771.03. The surety company paid the judgments and thereafter filed an action against Mrs. Keck upon her original application for the bonds and the indemnity agreement contained therein, and obtained judgment against her for the aggregate of the amounts paid by it upon the bonds.

In 1931 an interlocutory decree of divorce was granted Mrs. Keck, which provided for payment of alimony by her husband in the sum of $100 a month. No payments were made on account of said alimony nor was a final decree of divorce ever entered. Mr. Keck died intestate in November of 1941 and the defendant herein, Waldo F. Postel, who had acted as attorney for Mrs. Keck in various matters over a number of years, was, at her request, appointed administrator of Keck's estate, which was appraised at $20,455.18. Based upon the sum due and payable in her judgment for alimony, Mrs. Keck filed a creditor's claim against her husband's estate in an amount of $17,966.55, which claim was duly allowed.

On January 26, 1942 Mrs. Keck made, executed and delivered to her attorney, Postel, an assignment of all her right, title and interest in and to the estate of her husband, and to all the assets of said estate. The consideration for the execution of the assignment was professional services, and costs in connection therewith, rendered by Postel over a number of years commencing in 1928; also amounts loaned her by him from time to time. Mrs. Keck testified that she was altogether satisfied that Postel, her attorney in all of the litigation, should receive what there was; that she did not think the claim of the surety company just and did not feel she owed it anything. On July 10, 1942, by virtue of its judgment against Mrs. Keck the surety company levied on all the assets of the estate of her deceased husband.

[1,2] On the trial the reasonable value of the legal services rendered was testified to be in excess of $20,000. There is no evidence that they were of a lesser value. To that extent it must be assumed that there was an adequate consideration for the assignment. It is contended by appellant that the assignment was motivated by an intent to defraud it and other creditors. There is no evidence of an intent to defraud other creditors, or that any were in fact defrauded. The only evidence introduced was documentary, plus the testimony of Mrs. Keck and Postel. Postel testified that Mrs. Keck suggested the assignment and that at her request he prepared the necessary instruments. Mrs. Keck testified that she "phoned" Postel and told him to prepare the papers and bring them to her; that she understood she was conveying all of her interest in the estate to Postel, who had represented her in previous litigation covering a number of years and had given her financial aid. She testified further: "He did more for me than anybody in this world or anybody's family would do for them, as far as carrying me as he did; took care of everything; he is surely entitled to it, and I hope he does get plenty out of it, whatever it might be."

There is nothing in the documentary evidence or in any inference that may be drawn therefrom indicating that the transaction was fraudulent, a fact which must be proved by clear and convincing evidence. The court on this issue found against appellant. The record in this respect does not disclose evidence justifying a contrary finding. Raine v. Spreckels, 54 Cal.App.2d 169, 128 P.2d 709.

[3-7] The assignment by Mrs. Keck appears to have rendered her insolvent. Appellant contends that the consideration was not in fact a fair one. If this is so the assignment as a matter of law is void. The services by Postel were rendered not only prior to the assignment but prior to the death of Mr. Keck. As previously stated the evidence of their value was not successfully attacked. It is urged that part of the claim for services is barred by the statute of limitations. The fact that a debt or part thereof is so barred does not invalidate an assignment of a claim based thereon unless fraud be proven as a fact. In Ferguson v. Larson, 139 Cal.App. 133, 135, 136, 33 P.2d 1061, 1062, this court said: "The fact that the debt may be barred by the statute of limitations can affect the remedy only, but in no degree can it release the debtor of the moral duty of paying it. Although the note was barred by said statute it constituted a good and valuable consideration. Hoover v. Wasson, 11 Cal.App. 589, 105 P. 945; Manchester v. Tibbetts, 121 N.Y. 219, 24 N.E. 304, 18 Am.St.Rep. 816; 12 R.C.L. 576. It is well settled in this state that the extinguishment of security or a pre-existing debt constitutes a valuable consideration for the sale or assignment of property. Hart v. Church, 126 Cal. 471, 480, 58 P. 910, 59 P. 296, 77 Am.St.Rep. 195. It is also a well-settled law of this state that in the absence of fraud a debtor may prefer one creditor in preference to another. Section 3431 of the Civil Code provides: 'In the absence of fraud every contract of a debtor is valid against all his creditors, existing or subsequent, who have not acquired a lien on the property affected by such contract.' Section 3432 of the same Code provides: 'A debtor may pay one creditor in preference to another, or may give to one creditor security for the payment of his demand in preference to another.' The statutory right of a debtor to prefer one creditor to another is based upon the principle that in the absence of fraud the owner of property may do with it as he pleases (Heath v. Wilson, 139 Cal. 362, 73 P. 182), nor does the fact that such preference hinders or delays other creditors in the collection of their claims render it void, nor the fact that the preferred creditor had knowledge that such consequence would follow the preference. 12 Cal.Jur. 1010, 1011; In the Matter of Muller & Kennedy, 118 Cal. 432, 50 P. 660; Priest v. Brown, 100 Cal. 626, 35 P. 323." See Easton v. Ash, 18 Cal.2d 530, 116 P.2d 433; McGee v. Allen, 7 Cal. 2d 468, 60 P.2d 1026; Hibernia Sav. & Loan Soc. v. Belcher, 4 Cal.2d 268, 48 P. 2d 681; Chichester v. Mason, 43 Cal.App.2d 577, 111 P.2d 362. In view of the holdings in the cases cited, the consideration was valid.

[8] Appellant argues that this rule has been changed by the passage of the Uniform Fraudulent Conveyance Act of 1939, wherein a definition of "fair consideration" is given. (See Civil Code, Div. 4, Pt. 2, Tit. 2, secs. 3439 et seq., Stats.1939, Ch. 329, p. 1667.) Nothing in the wording of the act indicates that it was intended to exclude a promise to pay a debt barred in part by the statute of limitations if there was in fact a fair consideration given in good faith by the respective parties. Sec. 3439.03.

[9] Appellant contends that since Postel, the administrator of the estate, took an assignment from Mrs. Keck of her approved claim against the estate, the record raises the issue whether or not such acceptance of the assignment violated Probate Code, section 583, which provides: "No executor or administrator may purchase any property of the estate, or any claim against the estate, directly or indirectly, nor be interested in any such purchase."

The purpose of the section is to forbid an administrator or executor from directly or indirectly purchasing the property of an estate or a claim against it for his own advantage and to the detriment of the estate. If an administrator is interested even indirectly in a claim which works to the detriment of an estate, he is false to the trust imposed in his acceptance of the obligation to administer the estate and perform the duties required by law, including the protection of the rights of heirs, devisees, legatees, creditors and all who have a legal interest in the estate.

[10] An administrator may not deal with himself. 11 Cal.Jur. 864, sec. 516. This rule does not prevent heirs from making a contract with him as one of the heirs for the division of the estate. Section 583 based upon section 1576 of the Code of Civil Procedure "is only declaratory of the principle of law existing before its enactment, that a trustee must not deal with himself. Burris v. Adams et al., 96 Cal. 664, 31 P. 565." Baker v. Miller, 190 Cal. 263, 269, 212 P. 11, 13. In the last cited case it was definitely held that an administrator could make a contract with other heirs for the division of an estate.

[11] An administrator has no right directly or indirectly to be interested in the purchase of a claim before its approval by the court, but he may accept a claim in payment of a personal indebtedness if the claim has acquired a legal status prior to its assignment as appears from the record in this case. 11 Cal.Jur., p. 1038, sec. 665; Dudley v. Dudley, 300 Mass. 270, 15 N.E. 2d 212, 117 A.L.R. 1371; 11 Cal.Jur. 864; Burnett v. Lyford, 93 Cal. 114, 28 P. 855; In re Estate of McDougald, 146 Cal. 191, 79 P. 878.

Cases cited by appellant are not controlling as applied to the facts of this case. In Jones v. Hanna, 81 Cal. 507, 22 P. 883, the executrix sought "to make a profit to herself" on a purchase of property for the estate. In Re Estate of Watkins, 121 Cal. 327, 53 P. 702, the administrator appeared in the dual capacity of trustee of the estate funds and as the representative of a creditor who had given him a power of attorney to collect a claim against the estate. At page 328 of 121 Cal., at page 703 of 53 P., the court said: "* * * the authority to sign a receipt, conferred by the power of attorney, was but an incident of the authority to collect the money. It necessarily follows that when he became administrator of the estate the operation of the power from Mrs. Lawrence was suspended, if, indeed, his agency for her was not entirely renounced." In Re Estate of Boggs, 19 Cal.2d 324, 121 P.2d 678, an executrix appropriated rental which she claimed as her personal property. The Supreme Court disapproved an arbitrary apportionment and said (19 Cal.2d at page 334, 121 P.2d at page 684): "* * * a further hearing of this matter should be had in the probate court for the purpose of determining the reasonable rental value of her furniture for the period mentioned."

[12] In the present case the administrator was not dealing with himself as administrator, but with a claimant against the estate. He did not represent Mrs. Keck as attorney in connection with the claim. He did not appear in a dual capacity. If injury resulted to an heir, etc., or to any one interested in the estate, such fact does not appear in the record. In addition the trial court found that there was a fair consideration for the assignment.

The judgment upon which execution issued was a judgment against Lizzie B. Keck. It was her interest in the husband's estate that was sought in satisfaction of appellant's judgment. If Mrs. Keck, though insolvent, preferred to pay the indebtedness to Postel rather than appellant's judgment, appellant's remedy lay in bankruptcy proceedings. Civil Code, sec. 3432; Appling v. Brueckner, 97 Cal.App. 750, 276 P. 382.

[13,14] Assuming section 583 applies to claims already approved by the administrator and the court, and therefore in the status of a "quasi" judgment when assigned to the administrator, the answer to the contentions of appellant, based upon section 583, is that appellant is in no position to rely on that section, which was intended to protect those interested in an estate from being legally injured by the acts of an administrator. Transactions in violation of section 583 are not void—only voidable. Boyd v. Blankman, 29 Cal. 19, 87 Am.Dec. 146; O'Connor v. Flynn, 57 Cal. 293; Burris v. Kennedy, 108 Cal. 331, 41 P. 458. They are "voidable only at the instance of those interested in the estate." Santos v. Santos, 32 Cal.App.2d 62, 65, 89 P.2d 164, 166. In Boyd v. Blankman, supra, 29 Cal. at page 36, 87 Am.Dec. 146, the court said: "An examination of the Probate Act will disclose the intent of section one hundred and ninety-three [subsequently enacted as Code of Civil Procedure, sec. 1576, which was used as the basis for the first clause of Probate Code section 583]; and it is apparent that the object was not to declare who might or who might not become a purchaser of the property of the estate; but it was to prevent the property from being sold at a price less than its true value, which might be the case if the administrator, either directly or indirectly, prevented competition among the bidders, by entering into the market, either personally or by his agents, or if, with a view of purchasing, he was tempted to undervalue the property in his proceedings respecting the sale. The protection to the estate designed by that section can be as fully secured by permitting the parties interested in the estate to set the sale aside and have the administrator declared a trustee, as it would be to construe the section so as to allow strangers to impeach the sale, with the consequent risk to the bona fide purchaser, without notice, from the administrator's agent, of losing the premises he purchased, relying on the apparent regularity of the probate proceedings and the confirmation of the sale." (Italics added.) In the present case, for the purposes of this appeal it may be assumed that the acquisition by Postel of Mrs. Keck's claim against the estate of Mr. Keck violated section 583. The appellant is not legally interested—has no legal claim—in the estate of Mr. Keck. Appellant is a judgment creditor of Mrs. Keck, a claimant against the estate of Mr. Keck. The appellant not having an interest in the estate of Mr. Keck cannot raise section 583.

In view of the conclusions reached herein it is not necessary to consider further points raised by respondents.

[15] It having come to the attention of the Court that respondent, Lizzie B. Keck, died April 2, 1944, which date was subsequent to the submission of this appeal, it is ordered that this judgment be filed nunc pro tunc as of the date of the submission of said appeal, to-wit; March 27, 1944. Estate of Randall, 194 Cal. 725, 230 P. 445; *Remondino v. The times for filing any petition for rehearing or hearing in this proceeding shall not be affected by this order, such times to run from the date of the original filing of this opinion, to-wit; May 27, 1944.

The judgment is affirmed.

I. Divorce 203

Where prayer in wife's complaint for divorce made no demand on husband for support and default was duly entered, it was error for trial court to make award for such purpose. Code Civ.Proc. § 580.

2. Divorce ⇨203

In divorce action plaintiff may demand in prayer that alleged property settlement be approved and that decree include order for payments in accordance with contract of parties.

3. Divorce ⇨161

In divorce action, where court would not be authorized to award alimony to wife on husband's default because wife did not pray for alimony, court should set default aside, if justice required payment of alimony and authorize wife to serve amended complaint after which court would be in position to include order for alimony in its decree. Code Civ.Proc. § 580.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John Beardsley, Judge.

Action by Vera H. Eddy against Everett L. Eddy for divorce. From a default judgment awarding alimony, defendant appeals.

Modified, and as modified, affirmed.

Henry M. Lee, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Paul R. Matthews and Wm. H. Hodges, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MOORE, Presiding Justice.

The question for decision is whether that part of an interlocutory decree awarding plaintiff $100 per month is erroneous, in view of the absence from the prayer of the complaint of any demand for support money.

The appeal comes here on the judgment roll. The only documents contained are the following: (1) demurrer to complaint; (2) stipulation that the original complaint be withdrawn and the amended complaint filed; (3) the amended complaint; (4) order for default; (5) minute order for judgment; (6) interlocutory decree; (7) notice of appeal; (8) request for transcript.

The amended complaint is in the usual form for a divorce action based upon extreme cruelty. Paragraph seven alleges "that a property settlement has heretofore been made affecting the community property of the parties for the support and maintenance of the plaintiff, including her attorney's fees."

While the prayer asks that the property document neither appears nor does the judgment in terms approve it. After awarding plaintiff the custody of the minor child the decree proceeds: "Defendant ordered * * * to pay plaintiff $100 per month."

[1] Such order is clearly contrary to section 580, Code Civil Procedure, which forbids the granting of relief in excess of that demanded, if there be no answer. The validity of such an order was before this court in the case of Darsie v. Darsie, 49 Cal.App.2d 491, 122 P.2d 64. In that action the steps taken, the absence of a demand for support money, the default, the order for monthly payments in the decree, parallel the events of the instant case. We there held that where the prayer of the complaint makes no demand on the defendant for support and the default is duly entered, it is error for the trial court to make an award for such purpose. That decision followed Bennett v. Bennett, 50 Cal.App. 48, 194 P. 503, which held that in the absence of a prayer for alimony and of allegations upon which to base such prayer and no answer is filed, the relief granted plaintiff cannot exceed that which he shall have demanded in his complaint. See Staacke v. Bell, 125 Cal. 309, 57 P. 1012; Cohen v. Cohen, 150 Cal. 99, 88 P. 267, 11 Ann.Cas. 520; Benton v. Benton, 122 Cal. 395, 55 P. 152; Metropolitan Life Insurance Company v. Welch, 202 Cal. 312, 260 P. 545; Parker v. Parker, 203 Cal. 787, 266 P. 283. These cases hold that in the absence of a prayer for support, the granting of excessive relief is erroneous; that a defaulting defendant is entitled to assume that the only matter which will be determined by the court is the matter of divorce; that the prayer for general relief cannot enlarge the power of the court to award what is not specifically demanded.

[2, 3] While we recognize the privilege of plaintiff to demand in her prayer that the property settlement be approved and that the decree include an order for payments to be made in accordance with the contract of the parties, yet we have no power to ignore a plain, valid, procedural statute. It is an essential of the proper administration of justice that no unfair advantage ever be taken of any person. When it appeared to the court that justice required the payment of support money it should have set aside the default and authorized the filing and service of an amended complaint containing appropriate allegations and prayer for support money.

to include any appropriate orders in its decree. Darsie v. Darsie, supra.

It is ordered that the judgment be modified by striking therefrom the following words: "and to pay to plaintiff $100.00 per month." Appellant to recover costs on appeal.

PEOPLE v. TONEY.

Cr. 3786.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

June 1, 1944.

Criminal law §1159(4)

In prosecution for lewd and lascivious conduct and for attempt to commit rape, testimony of complaining witnesses, who were girls nine and ten years of age, was not so highly improbable as to call for reversal of conviction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Clement D. Nye, Judge.

R. E. Toney was convicted of lewd and lascivious conduct and of attempt to commit rape, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., and T. G. Negrich, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

Maurice A. Gleason, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. J. WOOD, Justice.

Defendant was convicted on three counts of an information charging lewd and lascivious conduct upon the private parts of two girls, 9 and 10 years old; and on two counts charging attempt to commit rape on one of the girls. He has appealed from the judgments and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The only contention now made by defendant is that "the evidence is so highly improbable that it amounts to no evidence at all". In support of this contention defendant points to the fact that, according to the testimony of one of the girls, defendant's ten year old adopted daughter was in the room at the time of the commission of the acts in question and was also similarly mistreated by defendant; and that defendant's wife was in the adjoining bedroom, the door being open. Defendant's wife and his adopted daughter both gave testimony in conflict with the testimony of the complaining witness.

The testimony of the two complaining witnesses was sufficient to establish the guilt of defendant and it was the duty of the trial judge, who heard the evidence without a jury, to resolve conflicts in the testimony. It cannot be ruled as a matter of law that the findings of the trial judge are not supported by substantial evidence or that the statements of the complaining witnesses are so highly improbable as to call for a reversal of the judgment.

The judgments and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Alfred L. Bartlett, Judge.

Action by Ajax Holding Company against A. B. Heinsbergen and another for damages for defendants' refusal to convey certain property in accordance with a written agreement. From a summary judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Charles A. Bank, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Isadore Moidel (of Moidel, Moidel, Moidel & Goldsmith), of Los Angeles, for respondents.

MOORE, Presiding Justice.

The question for decision is whether the summary judgment of dismissal is correct where the only writing signed by defendants for the sale of a number of city lots and the apartment hotel on a number of them was escrow instructions prepared by plaintiff in which, before signing, defendants inserted a supplement or counter proposal requiring their own approval of letters relative to the transaction to be written by plaintiff, which supplement was never accepted by plaintiff.

Summary judgment herein denied plaintiff damages allegedly suffered by reason of defendants' refusal to convey real and personal property in accordance with a written agreement. The complaint filed August 3, 1943, alleges (1) plaintiff's compliance with, and its readiness to perform, all of its obligations under an agreement in writing to buy from defendants an apartment house, its furniture, and six lots for $215,000, $40,000 payable in cash, the balance to be evidenced by a promissory note secured by a deed of trust on the property; (2) the refusal of defendants to accept the cash, or to perform any term, covenant or conditions imposed by the writing. As an item of special damage it pleads the employment of attorney Bank and the reasonable value of his services in attempting to prevail upon defendants to perform the contract.

The answer filed August 13, 1943, denies the execution of any agreement to sell the property. It alleges that the minds of the parties had never met upon any terms for the sale and purchase; that to the time of filing the complaint offers and counter-offers had been made, but that the parties never unconditionally agreed upon any offer or counter-offer. It admits that they refused to accept $40,000 on account of the alleged sale; that attorney Bank attempted to negotiate a purchase of the property but not on the terms alleged in the complaint, and denies that defendants entered into any agreement for the sale of their property through Mr. Bank, or that his services were necessary.

The only writing ever signed by defendants was certain escrow instructions prepared and placed by plaintiff with the Title Insurance and Trust Company. Defendants' notice of motion for judgment of dismissal filed August 26, 1943, under Section 437c, Code of Civil Procedure, is based upon the grounds (1) that there was never a written contract for the sale as alleged; (2) that plaintiff made an offer by means of proposed escrow instructions;

(3) that defendants made a counter-offer which was never accepted in the escrow; and (4) that defendants never approved the documents required of plaintiff by defendants.

The supporting affidavit of witness Cammert, the escrow clerk, avers that the secretary of plaintiff on May 14, 1943, delivered to affiant the escrow instructions already signed by plaintiff as prospective buyer of six lots and the furnished apartment house situate thereon, that before either defendant signed the document, defendants inserted two paragraphs as supplemental instructions, to wit:

"Obtain for me a letter in re inspection of property & any renewal or replacement of the personal property, which letter we reserve the right to approve prior to close of escrow.

"Obtain for me, subject to my approval prior to close of escrow, a letter re plans and specifications for a proposed improvement." That thereafter affiant notified plaintiff of the insertion of the proposed supplement and requested that plaintiff send an agent of plaintiff to approve in writing the new matter; that on June 21, 1943, affiant forwarded to plaintiff a copy of the proposed supplement and requested their approval and return if satisfactory to plaintiff, but that such document had not been returned prior to August 25, 1943, the date of Cammert's affidavit; that neither has plaintiff ever signed the supplemental instruction nor does the escrow placed by plaintiff contain a writing signed by either of the sellers approving either (1) a letter with reference to the inspection of property and replacement of personal property or (2) a letter with reference to plans and specifications for a proposed improvement; that according to sellers' written instructions they reserved the right to approve both of such letters, which they never did.

Mrs. Heinsbergen's affidavit denied that either alone or with her husband she had ever executed a contract for the sale of their property to plaintiff or that she had ever approved a letter of plaintiff with reference to inspection of the property and renewals or replacements of personal property or a letter with reference to plans and specifications for a proposed improvement as required by the proposed supplemental instruction in the same escrow; and she averred that plaintiff had failed to present for sellers' approval any letter to the escrow depository on the two subjects included in the proposed supplemental instruction.

Mr. Heinsbergen's affidavit contained substantially the averments and denials in the affidavit of his wife. He averred also that he had heard Mr. Tauber, president of Ajax Holding Company, on August 23, 1943, say that the escrow instructions did not contain all the terms and conditions they should have had to conform to the oral agreement of Ajax and affiant for the proposed purchase; that Mr. Tauber said that affiant had asked that affiants' plans and specifications be used in the event any improvement should be made on the two vacant lots; and that affiant wished his own services to be used to supervise such improvements if made; that he knew of no writing signed by either seller approving of any letter of Ajax touching upon plans and specifications for improvements; that he had never read any of the instructions in the escrow; that he had read the complaint before he signed it; that he knows of no written agreement with defendants for the purchase of the apartment hotel and personalty; except the escrow instructions which are referred to in that part of the complaint which alleges a contract of purchase and sale; that there had been a mutual mistake in stating the consideration in the escrow instructions and that after the instructions had been signed by all parties he and Samuel E. Gordon, vice president of Ajax, had told affiant at the Ajax office that the price would be changed and $10,000 would be added so that affiant would receive the price he and Ajax had agreed orally that Ajax would pay for the property.

In reply to the supporting affidavits of defendants, plaintiff presented the affidavits of attorney Bank, Tauber, and Gordon. By such documents it undertook to prove divers negotiations with defendants; the communication of offers and counter-offers to defendants made by Mr. Bank as agent for plaintiff on and after June 25, 1943; the deposit of such communications and the sum of $35,000 required by the initially proposed escrow instructions filed by plaintiff. But no proof was offered that the proposed supplemental instruction of defendants was ever approved by plaintiff. Mr. Bank filed in the escrow a lengthy letter to defendants dated June 25, 1943, but it contains no clean-cut acceptance of the proposed supplemental instruction.

Mr. Tauber gave extensive explanations of the statements averred to have been made by himself on August 23, 1943. Mr. Gordon detailed at length his negotiations with defendants, in one of which he stated to Mr. Heinsbergen that in the event that plaintiff should desire to improve the vacant lots, plaintiff would be willing to consider favorably the use of such plans and specifications and the use of such supervisory services of Heinsbergen whenever such improvements should be made and if, at such time, mutually satisfactory arrangements for compensation should be agreed upon.

[1] To be effective an acceptance must be unequivocal and positive and must comply with the terms of the offer. Laird v. McPhee, 90 Cal.App. 136, 139, 265 P. 501. It must be approved in the terms in which it is made. The addition of any condition or limitation is tantamount to a rejection of the original offer and the making of a counter-offer. Alexander v. Bosworth, 26 Cal.App. 589, 597, 147 P. 607. A counter-offer containing a condition different from that in the original offer is a new proposal and, if not accepted by the original offeror, amounts to nothing. Cooper v. Stansbury, 28 Cal.App. 444, 152 P. 948. The supplement was definite and unambiguous. Its requirement was for two writings, both of which should be approved by defendants prior to close of escrow. No such documents were to be found in the escrow.

[2,3] It follows that by reason of the failure of plaintiff unequivocally to accept the proposed supplemental instruction, the escrow did not evidence a meeting of the minds of the parties. Moreover, plaintiff's letter of June 25, 1943, proposes that the release price of lots 47 and 48 shall be increased from $15,000 to $25,000. This was a material variance from the terms contained in the original offer. In order to prove the existence of a contract it would have been necessary for plaintiff to prove by parol (1) that the parties had agreed that plaintiff should landscape vacant lots 47 and 48 within six months; (2) that improvements on the vacant lots should harmonize in design with the apartment hotel; (3) that plaintiff would be bound by such condition for seven years; (4) that plaintiff would use defendants' plans for the structure on the vacant lots and use Mr. Heinsbergen's services in making such improvements; (5) that plaintiff would make renewals of movable property of like quality and workmanship; (6) that plaintiff would do certain exterior painting and oiling of the roofs within six months. Inasmuch as a contract for the sale of realty is invalid unless in writing signed by the seller (Sec. 1624, Civil Code, Subd. 4) such parol proof would have been inadmissible. (Sec. 1856, Code Civ.Proc.) Since there was no written contract of the parties there was no issue requiring a deliberate trial. It is not in the class of the Walsh and Krieger cases (Walsh v. Walsh, 18 Cal.2d 439, 116 P.2d 62; Krieger v. Denny, 123 Cal.App.Supp. 777, 10 P.2d 820) cited by appellant. In each of them issues of fact were raised by the pleadings. Here there is none. The alleged contract for the sale of realty turned out to be a myth.

[4-6] The contention is made that appellant wrote the required letters in full compliance with the oral agreement which specified only the subject matter but no details. It was not the duty of the trial judge to insert what had been omitted, but merely to ascertain and declare the legal effect of the contents of the writings filed by Ajax in the vain hope of completing the escrow. If a counter-offer is clear and explicit and does not involve an absurdity, its own language is to govern its interpretation. Sec. 1638, Civil Code. When a contract is written, the intention of the parties must be ascertained from the writing alone, if possible. Sec. 1639, Civil Code. Since a contract for the sale of real property is invalid unless it be in writing signed by the party to be charged (Sec. 1624, Civil Code), it cannot be said that we have a contract where a counter proposal to a written offer was never accepted by the original offeror. The supplemental instruction was in plain English. Appellant readily understood that two new terms were to be added to the instructions proposed by plaintiff and that they must be approved by defendants by filing their written approval in the escrow. Instead of accepting the counter offer by a writing attached to the escrow instructions, plaintiff proceeded belatedly to prepare such a letter as it conceived to have been required. In order for the minds to meet upon the subject, the first act required of plaintiffs was to accept the precise offer made. It would then have been in a position to write the letter and request its approval by defendants. It did not even perform the condition proposed, which was that plaintiff get defendants' approval of a letter making definite commitments prior to the close of escrow. The approval of such letter was an essential prerequisite to a binding contract. Where a preliminary contract leaves certain terms to be agreed upon as the final contract it may not be inferred upon what the parties will agree. Kerr Glass Mfg. Corp. v. Elizabeth Arden Sales Corp., 61 Cal.App.2d 55, 141 P.2d 938.

No issue appearing to have been presented by the complaint, the conclusion of the trial court to dismiss the action was correct.

Judgment affirmed.

Ex parte SOLDAVINI.

Cr. 2291.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.

1. Habeas corpus ☞79

Where a return is made to a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, the petition becomes functus officio and the return then is to be taken as true unless petitioner makes a traverse.

2. Habeas corpus ☞83, 85(1)

Though habeas corpus petitioner may make his petition a traverse to the return and thus satisfy the rules of pleading, the burden is upon him to prove by competent evidence the issues of fact which are thus presented.

3. Habeas corpus ☞83

Where petitioner for habeas corpus made no traverse to return filed by parole board, stating that board had determined upon competent proof that petitioner had violated the rules of the prison and that his time credits had been forfeited, and offered no contradictory evidence, the court must accept as admitted the findings of the board. Pen.Code, §§ 2923, 2924, 3060.

4. Habeas corpus ☞23, 85(1)

In habeas corpus proceeding court must presume that evidence before parole board was sufficient to support order that petitioner had violated rules of the prison and that he should be punished by forfeiture of his time credits, and, since the board may revoke any parole without notice, the order may not be attacked in habeas corpus because of some claimed irregularity in language of the complaint before the board. Pen.Code, §§ 2923, 2924, 3060.

5. Prisons ☞15

A parolee's violation of the rules and regulations of parole board would form a sufficient ground for forfeiture of his time credits. Pen.Code, §§ 2923, 2924, 3060.

6. Habeas corpus ☞22(1)

Where, under the record made, petitioner for habeas corpus was under confinement upon a valid judgment serving a valid sentence which had not expired, because of a forfeiture of time credits, petitioner was not entitled to his release. Pen.Code, §§ 2923, 2924, 3060.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Edward P. Murphy, Judge.

Proceeding in the matter of the application of James Soldavini for a writ of habeas corpus. From an order granting the writ and discharging petitioner from custody, the State appeals.

Reversed.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., and David K. Lener, Deputy Atty. Gen., for appellant.

Nathan C. Coghlan, of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

The State appeals from an order granting petitioner a writ of habeas corpus discharging him from custody. In 1933 respondent was delivered to the warden at San Quentin prison following a conviction for attempted robbery. In August, 1934, his term was fixed at twelve years, and in June, 1939, he was released on parole. In October, 1940, he was convicted of burglary in the second degree and sentenced to Folsom prison, where he was received on November 22, 1940. On June 19, 1941, this conviction was reversed on the grounds of the failure of the trial court to instruct the jury on the presumption of innocence. People v. Soldavini, 45 Cal.App.2d 460, 114 P.2d 415.

On January 21, 1941, the Board of Prison Terms and Paroles revoked the parole of respondent, and on May 30, 1941, the Board of Prison Directors, after due notice and hearing, cancelled "such time credits as he has heretofore earned, or may hereafter earn."

On January 16, 1942, respondent was again convicted of burglary in the second degree upon a retrial of the former case. He was granted probation subject to the condition that he serve ten months in the county jail. At the completion of this sentence he was taken into custody by the state parole officer and commenced these proceedings for his release.

The petition is grounded on the assertion that the Board of Prison Directors acted unlawfully in cancelling petitioner's time credits because they acted solely upon the charge of the prisoner's conviction upon the burglary charge and that no other evidence was offered or received. Following the issuance of the writ herein the State Parole Officer made return containing excerpts from the minutes of the two boards relating to the revocation of parole and to the cancellation of the time credits. From these exhibits it appears that the procedure outlined in section 2923 of the Penal Code was strictly followed and the orders of these boards became final as of their date.

In attacking these orders the petitioner asked that his petition be treated as a traverse to the return, but he offered no evidence in support of his assertion and none to contradict the record found in the return, except the wholly inadmissible and irrelevant testimony of himself that he did not plead guilty when he appeared before the Board of Prison Directors.

[1,2] It is the settled rule of our decisions that when a return is made to a petition for a writ of habeas corpus the petition becomes functus officio and that the return then is to be taken as true unless the petitioner makes a traverse. Though he may make his petition a traverse to the return and thus satisfy the rules of pleading, the burden is upon him to prove by competent evidence the issues of fact which are thus presented. In re Collins, 151 Cal.

[3,4] For this reason we must accept as admitted, or uncontroverted, the findings of the prison board that on the hearing oral and documentary evidence was received and considered and that the Board "determined that due proof had been made that the prisoner had with evil intent violated the rules and regulations of the prison," and that he should therefore be punished by a forfeiture of his time credits. The petitioner argues that this order was beyond the jurisdiction of the Board because it was founded solely on the conviction which was subsequently reversed. But the complaint went further than that. It charged the parolee with having been arrested while on parole for two separate criminal offenses. The findings of the Board recite that evidence both oral and documentary was taken at the hearing and that thereupon the prisoner pleaded guilty to the charge. What this evidence was we do not know and cannot learn in this proceeding. We must presume that it was sufficient to support the order, and, since the board may revoke any parole without notice (Penal Code, section 3060) the order may not be attacked because of some claimed irregularity in the language of the complaint.

[5,6] The determinative question on this appeal relates to the "time credits" of petitioner. In 1933 his term of sentence upon his first conviction was set at twelve years. He does not allege or prove that any time credits were granted to him which would reduce his period of service. The burden of such proof was on petitioner. Section 2923 of the Penal Code specifies the grounds upon which time credits may be forfeited. One ground is the violation or disregard of any prison rule or regulation. In October, 1940, the prisoner had been returned to prison as a "parole violator" and the order suspending his parole on January 21, 1941, was presumably for such violation of the rules and regulations of the parole board, and this would form a sufficient ground for the forfeiture of credits. In re Stanton, 169 Cal. 607, 610, 147 P. 264. In conformance with section 2924 of the Penal Code due notice was given the prisoner and a hearing conducted before his credits were cancelled. The record recites that he pleaded guilty. He attacks this portion of the record and contends that he pleaded "not guilty." However, he does not attack the recitals in the order of the Board that "Oral and documentary evidence to show the particulars involved in said matter was introduced and considered by the Board. Thereupon the Board, having duly considered all the evidence, determined that due proof had been made that the prisoner had with evil intent violated the rules and regulations of the prison, was guilty of the offense specified in the complaint, and should be punished therefor by a forfeiture of such time credits as hereinafter specified.

It does not appear that he made any objection to the form of the complaint or to the uncertainty of the charge. The evidence before the Board upon which its order of forfeiture was based is not in the record and cannot be considered by us in this proceeding. Upon the case made the petitioner is under confinement upon a valid judgment serving a valid sentence which has not expired.

The order is reversed.

Legal disputes pertaining to a continuance or cancellation of a franchise of a public utility at the end of its designated period are solely within the jurisdiction of the court and not that of Railroad Commission. Public Utilities Act, Gen.Laws 1937, act 6386.

2. Public service commissions $\Rightarrow$ 19 1/2

Cancellation of a franchise of a public utility during term of its existence for a cause specified therein is primarily a legal question and must be decided by the court, but if the convenience of the public is involved and continued operation is necessary, such interest must be paramount to rights of parties to franchise, in which case jurisdiction of Railroad Commission is dominant. Gen.Laws 1937, act 6386; Const. art. 12, §§ 22, 23.

3. Public service commissions $\Rightarrow$ 6, 21

The Railroad Commission has independent and controlling jurisdiction over public transportation facilities, subject to review by the Supreme Court, and Superior Court has no power to interfere with an order or decision of the Railroad Commission. St. 1915, p. 115; Const. art. 12, §§ 22, 23.

6. Public service commissions $\Rightarrow$ 19 1/2

Whether extent of nonuse or disuse of franchise granted to public utility on an area of tide lands within territorial limits of city was a breach of public duty by franchise holders was question of fact for Railroad Commission. Gen.Laws 1937, act 6386; Const. art. 12, §§ 22, 23.

7. Municipal corporations $\Rightarrow$ 719(4)

Under city charter providing that no franchise for terminal facilities on land exceeding 1,000 feet of frontage on water front shall be granted to any one company, where defendant corporation had already been granted a franchise for such a building upon a full 1,000 feet of water frontage under an ordinance, a provision granting such corporation right to use in common with others 1,000 foot strips lying to the north and south thereof was a "franchise upon land" prohibited by the charter even though land was submerged. St. 1909, p. 1328, § 31, subd. 29.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; John J. Allen, Judge.

Proceeding in quo warranto by the City of Oakland, acting by and through its Board of Port Commissioners, against Key System and others to determine by what right or authority the defendants are exercising certain franchises and privileges upon an area of tide lands within the territorial limits of the municipality. The action as to the defendants not named was dismissed. From the judgment, each of the parties named appeal.

Affirmed in part and reversed in part.

W. Reginald Jones, Port Atty., of Oakland, for City of Oakland.

Brobeck, Phleger & Harrison, of San Francisco, and Donahue, Richards & Hamlin, of Oakland, for Key System.

WARD, Justice.

This is a proceeding in quo warranto, brought by the City of Oakland through its port commission, for the purpose of determining by what right or authority the defendants are exercising certain franchises and privileges upon an area of tide lands within the territorial limits of said municipality and particularly designated and described in the complaint. Joined as defendants with Key System were Railway Equipment and Realty Company, Oakland Terminal Railroad Co. and two fictitious corporations, but as to these the action was dismissed.

Two causes of action were set forth in the complaint, the first dealing with certain rights and privileges granted by section 1 of an ordinance of the city, No. 3099, and the other being confined to such of those rights as purport to have been granted by section 2 thereof.

Judgment was rendered that plaintiff take nothing by its first cause of action; and, as to the second, that the franchise described therein was at no time authorized by law or by the charter of the city, and is null and void. Each party has appealed from the portion of the judgment adverse to it. (In this opinion the municipal corporation will be referred to as the "City," and the Key System by that designation or as the "Company.")

The cause was submitted upon the pleadings and a written stipulation of facts, those pertinent to the questions raised on the respective appeals being the following:

Section 1 of Ordinance 3099 granted to the Company's predecessor, a railroad corporation, for a term of 50 years "the right, privilege and franchise * * * to construct and maintain * * * freight and passenger depots, engine houses, workshops, wharves, docks, slips, ferries, landing places and other terminal facilities and railroads" over a strip of land 1,000 feet in width in San Francisco Bay, extending approximately 2½ miles from the shore to the pierhead line and "during said term to use, operate and conduct said freight and passenger depots, engine houses, workshops, wharves, docks, slips, ferries, landing places and other terminal facilities and railroads, and to collect tolls, wharfage, dockage and other charges thereon." The franchise became effective July 5, 1910.

The granting clauses above quoted are in the precise words of subdivision 29, section 31 of the city charter as it then read, Stats.1909, p. 1328, and the ordinance recites that the property over which the franchise was granted lay within the area as to which that section applied. At the time the franchise was granted the area affected lay within the limits of the City, but the City had no proprietary interest in the lands covered thereby. Title to the land was transferred to the City in 1911.

Section 2 further granted "the right, privilege and franchise during said term of fifty (50) years to use in common with others, and to have maintained as a fairway for the free and uninterrupted passage to and from said wharves, docks, slips, ferries, landing places and other terminal facilities, and for the purposes of general navigation the waters of the bay of San Francisco lying outside of said strip of land described in Section 1" and contiguous thereto, and comprised within 1,000 foot strips lying to the north and to the south of the lands described in section 1 from the bulkhead line to the pierhead line, with an agreement on the part of the grantee that the bulkhead line might be moved westerly from its then location.

By section 3 the parties fixed upon an agreed line of ordinary low tide as of 1852 serving to delimit the westerly line of the privately owned land of the grantee from the Southern Pacific Oakland Mole to the northern line of the City. Also section 4 provides that "in consideration of" the rights granted, the grantee should reconvey to the City such wharfing-out rights as it possessed under the so-called Carpenter grant, should dedicate across its privately owned land certain streets as described and should convey to the City all its interest in lands west of the agreed low tide line. Section 5 requires that exercise of the franchise be commenced within six months.

Section 6 requires the holder of the franchise to pay "as rent" for the privileges thereby granted $1,000 per year for the first 25 years and $2,000 per year for the last 25 years "of said term" and provides that if any installment of rent should be unpaid the City "shall have the right to forfeit and annul the rights, privileges and franchises hereby granted." Section 7 imposed the condition that all fills and other permanent structures "shall revert to and become the absolute property of the City of Oakland upon the expiration of said term of fifty (50) years" with an option granted to the City to purchase structures not subject to such reversion, and section 8 provided that the ordinance should be inoperative unless written acceptance be filed within 90 days "and upon such filing of said written acceptance this ordinance and said written acceptance shall constitute and be a contract between the City of Oakland and said * * * [grantee] and its successors and assigns."

It is agreed that the ordinance was duly accepted; that the conveyances and dedications thereby required were duly made, and that the Company is the successor of the original grantee of the franchise.

All rental payments required by section 6 of the ordinance, including those accruing after the commencement of the action, have been made and retained by the City, which has not returned or offered to return any thereof.

When the franchise was granted, the Company's predecessor had in existence a trestle supporting its double track railroad which extended diagonally across the entire franchise strip from a point near the northerly line thereof at the agreed low tide line to the ferry terminal located in the southwesterly corner of the strip. The location of these facilities is shown in an exhibit attached to the stipulation. These facilities were used by the Company's predecessor in the operation of its railroad lines from the date of the franchise until 1916.

In 1911 the City applied for and obtained from the War Department a permit to extend a solid fill into the waters of San Francisco Bay. This was done as part of a larger project for the general development of the western waterfront of the City, and at the City's request the Company's predecessor constructed such fill on the franchise strip at a cost of $1,136,000. This fill was made during the period 1913-1916 and was located along the northerly line of the franchise strip, being protected by a rock bulkhead along that line. From the easterly line of the franchise strip to a transverse rock wall substantially the entire width of the franchise strip was partially filled by permitting the dredged material to attain a natural slope. This method of construction was adopted to reduce the expense of construction, and also to prepare that part of the franchise area for further reclamation.

At the same time the timber trestle beyond the new fill line was relocated, extending along the north line of the strip and then curving to the south to meet the ferry terminal facilities which were reconstructed and enlarged. This work was completed in 1916 and the interurban train service was operated over these facilities for many years thereafter.

After the work last mentioned was performed, a portion of the original trestle easterly from the terminal remained in place and was used for storing cars until 1933. In 1917 a spur track had been built extending southerly across the franchise strip in the vicinity of the transverse wall, which remained in place for serving an industry located on property of the city south of the franchise strip until 1930, at which time a new means of access to that industry was provided through a permit granted by the City for the construction of additional trackage along the western waterfront.

In 1933 the greater part of the ferry terminal facilities was destroyed by fire. Immediately thereafter the State of California instituted proceedings in eminent domain and under order of court took possession of portions of the franchise strip which it desired for construction of the San Francisco-Oakland Bay Bridge. The terminal facilities were then rebuilt in the area not taken by the state at a cost of $252,000. Subsequently a part of the franchise strip was conveyed to the state for the construction of the San Francisco-Oakland Bay Bridge and the bridge railway facilities owned by the state in connection therewith, subject to certain reserved rights of the Company. The City also conveyed its interest in this property under a contract with the state. In this contract the existence of the franchise was recognized.

The portion of the franchise area as to which the City seeks to declare a forfeiture by abandonment and non-use is an irregularly shaped area a portion of which actually overlaps the area conveyed to the state in 1937 by both the Company and the City. A large portion of the remaining area involved in the first cause of action, was, subsequent to the commencement of this suit, taken by the federal government under eminent domain proceedings and an order of possession of the United States District Court, and is now occupied by the facilities erected by the army for the Oakland Port of Embarcation.

Pursuant to an agreement with the army as part of the federal government, this case is prosecuted by the City, which has instituted condemnation proceedings as to portions of the land covered by the franchise. Between the City and the Company there is no dispute relative to an award in condemnation. The City seeks to clear an alleged cloud on the title. The company may be benefited only to the extent of a continuation of its present rights for the remaining period of the franchise.

From the stipulated facts the trial court concluded "That the use of the property described in Section 1 of Ordinance 3099 of the City of Oakland and set forth in Exhibit A to the Amended and Supplemental Complaint herein, which is the subject of the first cause of action alleged in said complaint, is a matter primarily within the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission of the State of California," and (2) "That the purported franchise described in Section 2 of said ordinance which is the subject of the second cause of action alleged in said complaint was at no time authorized by law or by the charter of the City of Oakland, and that the same is and at all times since the purported grant thereof has been null and void."

Taking up first the City's appeal, it contends that the issue of the use or non-user of the property described in section 1 of Ordinance 3099 of the City of Oakland is not one exclusively within the authority of the Railroad Commission—arguing in this behalf that the test is whether or not the commission has acted in the matter; that the Public Utilities Act affirmatively supports the jurisdiction of the court; that reason is against concluding that the courts have no jurisdiction; and that the right to use the designated portion of the franchise area has been lost by non-use. It supports this contention by the following considerations: that non-user is a recognized cause of forfeiture; that forfeiture may be partial only; that the franchise itself provides for its loss by non-use; that the franchise to engage in the business of wharfinger was never exercised and that the forfeiture was self-executing and occurred before the Railroad Commission had any power in the matter.

The City concedes that as to any existing and continuing use the Company is making of the area described in the complaint the franchise exists, but points out that the only use shown by the record is that dredging material or spoils have been deposited in the area which furnish adjacent support for the rock fill. However, it agreed that the Company is entitled to have this condition continue until the expiration of its franchise in 1960.

[1-3] As previously stated, based upon the findings of fact, the court as a conclusion of law found that the use of the property described in the first cause of action "is a matter primarily within the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission." Ordinarily this statement is correct. However, the jurisdiction is not exclusively with the commission. Questions of public convenience and necessity, and matters directly relating thereto, in connection with the operation of public utility franchises, are the concern of the commission; legal disputes pertaining to a continuance or cancellation of a franchise at the end of its designated period are solely within the jurisdiction of the courts. The cancellation of a franchise during the term of its existence for a cause specified therein is primarily a legal question and must be decided by the courts, but if convenience of the public is involved and continued operation is necessary, such interest may be paramount to the rights of the parties to the franchise, in which case the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission is dominant and controlling. A restriction or limitation in one case may not apply under the facts of another. It is sufficient to say that under constitutional provisions the courts of this state recognize the independent and controlling jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission over public transportation utilities, Const. Calif., art. XII, secs. 22, 23, subject to review by the Supreme Court. Public Utilities Act, Stats. 1915, p. 115. The superior court has no power to interfere with an order or decision of the Railroad Commission. Truck Owners, etc., Inc., v. Superior Court, 194 Cal. 146, 228 P. 19.

The Railroad Commission may have general jurisdiction over a transportation company and may properly have assumed jurisdiction in determining certain questions previously, but if the commission does not in fact act on the particular question involved the courts are forced to prescribe a remedy. In addition, the question involved may be strictly a legal one, in which event the courts take jurisdiction (Sale v. Railroad Commission, 15 Cal.2d 612, 104 P.2d 38; Hanlon v. Eshleman, 169 Cal. 200, 146 P. 656), but the powers of the commission are unlimited if the matter is cognate and germane to the regulation of public utilities. City of San Mateo v. Railroad Commission, 9 Cal.2d 1, 68 P.2d 713.

Thus, in certain cases and as to certain problems relating to public utilities the jurisdiction of the commission is exclusive. As to other matters the regular law courts have jurisdiction. In between these two well defined fields there is a somewhat ill defined field in which the law courts have jurisdiction unless the commission has elected to act as to the particular subject matter. If it has elected to so act the exercise of such jurisdiction ousts the law courts of any jurisdiction assumed by them. It is in this field that the first cause of action falls.

Key System, on the first cause of action, relies upon People v. Northwestern Pac. R. Co., 20 Cal.App.2d 120, at page 122, 66 P.2d 697, at page 698, where the court said: "The briefs of the parties have narrowed the issues on this appeal. It is conceded therein that the superior court has jurisdiction to cancel a franchise under certain circumstances and that while the Railroad Commission has jurisdiction to determine whether the service actually rendered under a franchise is adequate and, if not, to require adequate service, said commission has no jurisdiction to cancel a franchise under any circumstances. It is further conceded that the courts may take judicial notice of the decision of the Railroad Commission." The court then referred to a decision by the Railroad Commission upon the precise question, saying (20 Cal.App.2d at pages 122, 123, 66 P.2d at page 698): "It affirmatively appeared from the allegations of said amended complaint that the defendants had been and were actually operating boats and rendering some service under said franchise despite other allegations of the amended complaint which were based upon the plaintiff's conclusion that the service rendered was a sham and pretense and in fact no service at all because of its claimed inadequacy. But since 1912, exclusive jurisdiction has been vested in the Railroad Commission to determine the adequacy of service actually being rendered under a franchise by any public utility within the purview of the Public Utility Act. (Const. [Calif.], art. 12, §§ 22, 23; Public Utilities Act, Deering's General Laws, * * * Act 6386.) We therefore conclude that when the amended complaint affirmatively showed that some service had been and was actually being rendered under the franchise, said amended complaint was insufficient to state a cause of action for the cancellation of said franchise upon the theory of 'non-user and abandonment' at least in the absence of further allegations showing a decision of the Railroad Commission determining that the service rendered was inadequate."

In the present case the complaint does not allege that any service was rendered at the time of the institution of the proceeding. In the Northwestern Pacific case the Railroad Commission had acted; in the present case, so far as the record indicates, the commission had not acted upon the particular point in controversy.

In Truck Owners, etc., Inc., v. Superior Court, supra, the commission had assumed jurisdiction by granting to plaintiffs a certificate of public convenience but had not "acted" on the question involved in the case, namely, the right of defendants therein to transport freight. At pages 149, 150 of 194 Cal., at page 20 of 228 P., the nature of the controversy is stated: "The cause pending in the respondent court is a suit in equity and that court has jurisdiction to hear and determine the same to enforce its judgment therein, unless it has been divested of such jurisdiction by some provision of the Constitution or by the Legislature acting in pursuance of some constitutional authority. It is not seriously contended by petitioners that the amendment to the Constitution relating to the railroad commission and to public utilities (art 12, §§ 22, 23) contains language sufficient in itself to divest the superior court of its equity jurisdiction to hear and determine a cause involving a complaint against a transportation company, but it is insisted that, because of the broad powers lodged in the Legislature under said section 23, and its exercise of such powers in the enactment of the Public Utilities Act, (Stats.1915, p. 115) and the said Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act, the sole recourse of the plaintiff in the injunction suit was to file its complaint with the railroad commission and there have its rights determined." In that case it was insisted that the Railroad Commission had exclusive jurisdiction to determine the question. The court, distinguishing between jurisdiction generally assumed, and the determination of the question of fact involved, said (194 Cal. at pages 155, 156, 157, 228 P. at page 23.): "In answer to the query it should be borne in mind that we are not here dealing with a situation where the commission has acted. (Italics added.) It may also be noted that the commission undoubtedly has power to inquire into the methods and activities of the plaintiffs, as well as the defendants, in said action as to their transportation operations, either on its own motion or on the complaint of petitioners. Likewise it may be noted that the functions of the commission may be brought into play by an application by petitioners for a certificate of public convenience and necessity. If such certificate be granted, the injunction in the pending cause would cease, for by its own terms it is enforceable against the petitioners only 'until they shall have obtained from the railroad commission of the state of California a certificate declaring that public convenience and necessity require such operation.' Furthermore, if the commission should assume jurisdiction in an investigation as to the activities of the petitioner and the injunction plaintiff, or both, and should determine under subdivision (3) of section 1 of the Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act that the petitioners were not operating 'between fixed termini and over a regular route' and, therefore, were not transportation companies as defined by that act, its finding would not be subject to review and it would then have the power under section 31 of the Public Utilities Act, to make all necessary orders to enforce its decision in the matter. * * * We entertain no doubt that, when the commission has assumed and exercised its jurisdiction, the court would conform its orders and process agreeably to the action of the commission made within its jurisdiction. When the commission has acted, it may be said, as was very aptly stated in Yolo Water & Power Co. v. Superior Court, supra, [43 Cal.App. 332, 185 P. 195]: 'Powers conferred by the constitution upon the railroad commission to supervise and regulate public utilities and to bring suit to enforce its orders and compel public utilities to obey the law, are not inconsistent with the power conferred upon superior courts to entertain injunction suits instituted by others than the commission against public utilities. To so hold will not create any conflict between the courts and the commission, because in all such suits the courts will be bound and guided and controlled in all respects in entertaining and deciding or dismissing them as much by section 23 of the Constitution and the Public Utility Act as by any other provisions of the law.' * * * The question of exclusive control of public utilities is primarily one of legislative policy subject, of course, to constitutional grant or limitation. Where the courts have been denied or have refused to take jurisdiction, it has been said that it was the legislative policy to relegate all such questions to the commission having jurisdiction to entertain the same."

all public utilities are made subject to control and regulation by the Railroad Commission. This grant of power to the commission is reiterated in section 31 of the Public Utilities Act. (St.1915, p. 132.) This jurisdiction, however, is not exclusive, and until the Railroad Commission has acted in reference to any public utility the superior court has jurisdiction in equity to enforce an obligation imposed by law upon such utility. But after the commission has assumed jurisdiction over a public utility for the purpose of administering the law applicable to the activities of the utility, the commission has exclusive jurisdiction over the regulation and control of said utility and may take any action necessary to the proper and complete exercise of this jurisdiction. In the exercise of this jurisdiction the commission may set aside any prior order or determination of the courts in matters coming under the exclusive jurisdiction of the commission. This decision of the Railroad Commission in matters affecting public utilities is final and conclusive except as the same is restricted by section 67 of the Public Utilities Act * * *, which provides for a writ of review to this court in certain matters." (Italics added.) "We further hold that said judgment was valid and binding upon the parties to said action until the Railroad Commission assumed jurisdiction of said utility for the purpose of regulating its operations, and upon its assumption of jurisdiction over the activities of said utility, any order or judgment of the superior court in conflict with the orders of the commission is to that extent ineffective and of no binding effect upon the parties thereto."

[4] In the present case, upon the facts presented the superior court could enter a valid and binding judgment if the Railroad Commission should not assume jurisdiction upon a related question germane to the operation of the utility company. Upon its assumption of jurisdiction over the activities of the utility it would be proper, in view of the heretofore cited cases based upon constitutional provisions, to cease further the determination of a question of fact. If the commission should "act", as by order or otherwise, in determining a question (and it may up to date be assumed that such determination will not be in disregard of established rules of law), such order is binding upon courts.

This brings us to the question of the rights of the parties to invoke the offices of the Railroad Commission on the first cause of action. Irrespective of their rights to demand a hearing, if any legally exist, the commission could under its rules of practice "on its own motion" have initiated an investigation to determine whether the company would be able to meet the requirements of transportation, if any there be, at the present time or in the reasonably immediate future. These are factual matters in connection with which an appellate court should not interfere.

[5] In brief, the matter primarily involved herein may be within the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission, but is not exclusively so—hence a reversal of the order and decree made in the first alleged cause of action becomes necessary.

[6] It has been suggested that in view of the stipulation of facts this court may pass upon the merits of the controversy. Eliminating the interest of the commission, if any, in the continuance of the strip or part thereof as a matter of necessity for public convenience, we find from the record, including the maps and diagrams submitted, that there is a part of the strip (approximately 200 feet in width along the northerly edge of the franchise area) that may still properly be held by the Company. This possibility is a fact admitted by the City. Appellant City does not contend that the entire franchise referred to in the first cause has been forfeited, but only that covering the unused area. Whether the extent of non-use or disuse, if that should be the fact, was a breach of public duty by the franchise holders, seems to be a question of fact which should be determined by the commission. It is advisable that the trial court proceed in accordance with the views herein expressed.

[7] Coming now to the Company's appeal from that portion of the judgment holding to be void any rights purported to be granted by section 2 of Ordinance 3099 in the area referred to as the south fairway, the ground of the trial court's decision was that this grant violated the provisions of subdivision 29 of section 31 of the charter of the City, as it existed at the time of the passage of the ordinance, to the effect that "no franchise for terminal facilities upon land exceeding 1000 feet of frontage on the waterfront shall be granted to any one company or corporation, or to any companies or corporations under one management and control," section 1 of the ordinance, it will be recalled, having already conferred a franchise for such facilities upon a full 1,000 feet of water frontage. It is the contention of the Company that the grant of rights contained in said section 2 of the ordinance is not in any sense a franchise or in fact permission to enjoy in the public domain anything more than is of common right, i. e., right of access over navigable waters,—that the City merely contracted thereby not to impede such rights of access to the lands covered by section 1 thereof, and, in any event, that the rights granted are not "upon land." The Company further urges that if the rights granted to the fairway be void, the judgment nevertheless should be reversed for the purpose of determining what considerations the City has received from the transaction in order that restoration be made.

Section 2 of the grant uses the word "franchise." This use of the word may not be determinative but is indicative of intent and the rights of the contracting parties. There is no doubt that the grantee was given the use of 3,000 feet under the original franchise—one thousand of which is the basis of the judgment on count two of the complaint. This 1,000 feet abuts the 1,000 feet referred to in count one. It may be assumed that the extra north and south fairways were incidental to the main franchise. It should be conceded that the grant covering the middle 1,000 feet was valid, and that the franchise to the north and south fairways was granted in order to facilitate the exploitation of such middle portion. That it was in contravention of the charter provisions previously quoted need not be discussed at length. On this point the company is content to argue that there is some doubt whether it was a franchise at all. The grant of the extra widths was valid if not in contravention of the legal capacity of the grantor to bestow. It was not a grant of right over city owned lands as the fairway belonged to the state. It was contemplated to be a part of or an adjunct to the middle portion and as such was greater in width than the law allowed. City of Oakland v. Hogan, 41 Cal.App.2d 333, 106 P.2d 987.

The company next contends, assuming the right to be a franchise, that the proviso of subd. 29 of section 31 of the charter, Stats. 1909, p. 1328, relates merely to terminal facilities, and that as to such facilities the prohibition refers to "land" and not to access over waters.

A franchise to an area definitely specified, though submerged, is upon land. The granting of the right of navigation over the submerged area subjects that area to a servitude. Necessarily a franchise covering a body of water is in the nature of a franchise to the area of land submerged by it.

The company finally urges that if the franchise for the fairway is void, restoration should be made of the considerations moving from it, including the cost of improvements made and rentals paid.

[8-10] When the grant of a franchise is in excess of the powers of the grantor, there is no obligation on its part to restore any real or supposed benefits. "It is scarcely necessary to observe that no contract can be made by a corporation which is prohibited by its charter or by the statute law of the State. And it is a general and fundamental principle of law that all persons contracting with a municipal corporation must at their peril inquire into the statutory power of the corporation or of its officers to make the contract; and a contract beyond the scope of the corporate power granted or conferred by the legislature expressly, or by fair implication, is void, although it be under the seal of the corporation." (Dillon, Municipal Corporations, 5th Ed., sec. 777, p. 1154.) "For the purpose of clearly defining the rights and duties of all the parties to a municipal contract, an ultra vires contract, as the term will be used herein, and according to its strict and true construction, is a contract which is not within the power of a municipal corporation to make under any circumstances or for any purpose." "Conceding that a contract is ultra vires, the question arises as to what is the effect thereof, and the answer is for the most part plain. If a contract is ultra vires it is wholly void and (1) no recovery can be had against the municipality thereon; (2) there can be no ratification, except by the legislature; (3) the municipality cannot be estopped to deny the validity of the contract; and (4) there can be no recovery on an implied contract, although it has been executed and the municipality has received the benefit of the contract." (McQuillan, Municipal Cor- porations, 2d Ed., sec. 1274, pp. 1115, 1117, 1118.)

[11-13] A proceeding in quo warranto, being remedial in nature, should be determined so as to make the remedy effective, if possible (44 Am.Jur., sec. 4, pp. 90, 91.) When invoked to remedy the abuse, misuse or non-use of a franchise, the action appears to be similar to an equity proceeding by injunction. It may partake of the essentials of an action to quiet title or of declaratory relief. It is an extraordinary proceeding and may at times be used as a drastic cure of the misuse of a special privilege granted by a governmental agency. It has the aspect of an estate in property. In taking away any part of privileges granted for the benefit of the public, a court should be cautious in the use of its jurisdictional power.

[14,15] In the present proceeding the trial court determined that jurisdiction was primarily with the Railroad Commission and refused to entertain jurisdiction. Herein it is determined that, assuming that jurisdiction was primarily with the commission, it is not exclusively so. There should be no conflict between the courts and the commission. Exclusive control is a question that might well be determined by legislative policy. Yolo Water & Power Co. v. Superior Court, 43 Cal.App. 332, 185 P. 195. In the absence of special legislative direction the courts may, in the interests of justice, direct that notice be served upon parties who may probably or possibly be interested in the outcome of the litigation under constitutional or legislative provisions.

Because of the probable or possible interest of the commission in this action, as disclosed by the conclusions of law, that body should be notified of the pendency of this proceeding. The trial court is directed to require plaintiff to notify the commission of such pendency. The form of the notification and the time limit are questions to be determined by the trial court in its discretion in view of the facts of the case.

That portion of the judgment disposing of the first cause of action is reversed, the trial court to proceed in accordance with the views herein expressed. If the Railroad Commission should take action the present proceeding should be held in abeyance until the matter is determined by that body. That portion of the judgment disposing of the second cause of action is affirmed.

MILLS et al. v. SKAGGS et al.

Civ. No. 12665.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.

June 1, 1944.

1. Specific performance ⇨28(1), 31

An agreement, incomplete or indefinite in its material terms, will not be specifically enforced in equity.

2. Specific performance ⇨30

Where terms to which vendors had agreed called for down payment of $600 and monthly payments of $30 upon second deed of trust, and deposit agreement called for down payment of $200 and for monthly payments of $40 on first and second deeds of trust, denial of purchasers' demand for specific performance of deposit agreement was not an abuse of discretion.

3. Specific performance ⇨30

Denial of specific performance of agreement to purchase realty evidenced by deposit receipt which called for monthly payments of $40 on first and second deeds of trust, whereas terms to which vendors agreed called for monthly payments of $30 upon second deed of trust, was not an abuse of discretion on ground that under usual terms of realty loans agreement should be construed as providing for $24 per month on first deed of trust and $16 per month on second deed of trust, where there was no evidence concerning such usual terms.

4. Specific performance ⇨8

The grant of specific performance is discretionary with trial court.

Action by Will G. Mills and another against J. E. Skaggs and another for specific performance of an agreement for purchase of real property, wherein defendants filed a cross-complaint seeking cancellation or reformation of the agreement. From an adverse judgment, the plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

Crist & Beene, of Palo Alto, for appellants Mills and Ingram.

Wm. Petros, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SPENCE, Justice.

Plaintiffs sought specific performance of an agreement for the purchase of real property, which agreement was evidenced by a "Deposit Receipt". Defendants filed an answer and cross-complaint seeking cancellation or reformation of said agreement. The trial court found that defendants had executed said deposit receipt but further found "that said deposit receipt is so indefinite and uncertain in its terms as to be impossible of specific performance * * *". Judgment was entered denying specific performance and from said judgment, plaintiffs appeal.

The deposit receipt was drawn by a real estate broker and the evidence offered by defendants showed that it was signed by the defendants, as sellers, without reading the same and in reliance upon the real estate broker's representation that it contained the terms upon which defendants had agreed to sell. The terms to which defendants had agreed called for a purchase price of $4,750, as provided in the deposit receipt, but also called for a down payment of at least $600 and a monthly payment of at least $30 upon a second deed of trust to be executed in their favor. The deposit agreement, however, called for a down payment of only $200 and for a total monthly payment of $40 to cover payments on both the first and second deeds of trust without any specification of the portion of the $40 to be applied upon either.

The pertinent portion of the deposit receipt read as follows: "The total purchase price is Four Thousand Seven Hundred Fifty ($4,750.00) Dollars and the balance of same is to be paid within 10 days from date hereof, as follows: $200.00 cash and 1st deed of trust to American Trust Co. for $2,750.00 and 2nd deed of trust to James E. Skaggs & wife for $1,800.00. Interest on notes to be 6% per annum; total monthly payment inc. interest to be $40.00."

It appears that there was an existing first deed of trust on the property, the balance upon which first deed of trust was approximately $400 less than the amount provided in the deposit receipt for the first deed of trust with the American Trust Company; and it further appears probable that the real estate broker believed that a deal might be consummated by raising the amount of the first deed of trust by $400 and adding that amount to the $200 in cash to make up a cash payment of $600. But the deposit receipt was silent as to whether the new first deed of trust was to be executed by plaintiffs or defendants; as to what was to be done with the money obtained by increasing the amount thereof; and as to the terms of said first deed of trust and particularly as to the portion of plaintiffs' total monthly payment of $40 to be applied upon said first deed of trust. The deposit receipt, as above indicated, was likewise silent as to the portion of plaintiffs' total monthly payment of $40 to be applied upon defendants' second deed of trust. It is of course obvious that the raising of the amount of the first deed of trust would have had the effect of diminishing the security afforded by the second deed of trust and that the terms of the transaction, as set forth in the deposit receipt, were not the same as the terms to which defendants had previously agreed. We will make no further reference to this difference, however, as the trial court made no findings or conclusions with respect to the allegations of the cross-complaint relating thereto. The failure of the trial court to make such findings or conclusions is not an issue on this appeal which is one taken by plaintiffs alone from the judgment denying specific performance.

[1,2] We find no error in the ruling of the trial court denying specific performance. Even if it be assumed that said agreement was valid in law and that an action for damages might have been predicated upon its breach, it is well settled that an agreement that is incomplete, uncertain or indefinite in its material terms will not be specifically enforced in equity and "that the degree of certainty required in an equity action is much greater than is required in an action at law." Janssen v. Davis, 219 Cal. 783, 787, 29 P.2d 196, 198; Pascoe v. Morrison, 219 Cal. 54, 25 P.2d 9; Long Beach Drug Co. v. United Drug Co., 13

Cal.2d 158, 88 P.2d 698, 89 P.2d 386. This general principle has been applied in denying specific enforcement of agreements which were incomplete, indefinite or uncertain with respect to the terms of payment of deferred balances or the terms of the incumbrances representing such deferred balances. Mariposa Commercial & Mining Co. v. Peters, 215 Cal. 134, 8 P.2d 849; Schellenbach v. Lagasse, 202 Cal. 665, 262 P. 304; Buckmaster v. Bertram, 186 Cal. 673, 200 P. 610; Klein v. Markarian, 175 Cal. 37, 165 P. 3; see also cases collected in note in 37 A.L.R. 365. In our opinion the trial court's denial of specific performance was justified by the uncertainty and indefiniteness of the agreement in the particulars to which reference has already been made.

Plaintiffs cite and rely upon Janssen v. Davis, 219 Cal. 783, 29 P.2d 196, but we believe that case is distinguishable. The plaintiff in that action was the seller who sought specific performance by the buyer of an oral agreement which had been fully performed on the part of the seller. Specific performance was granted by the trial court but the judgment was reversed upon grounds other than the alleged uncertainty or indefiniteness of the agreement. The situation presented in that case was so unusual as to cause the Supreme Court to express regret that a reversal was required as the case was one "clearly calling for the equitable relief granted." 219 Cal. at page 790, 29 P.2d at page 199. There the plaintiff, a building contractor, had agreed to construct and had constructed a $13,250 home for defendant, a real estate agent who had previously sold property for plaintiff and to whom plaintiff was indebted in the sum of approximately $2,500. While defendant had moved into the home upon its completion in 1923 and was still in possession at the time of the trial several years later, he had paid plaintiff nothing on account of the purchase price or on account of taxes or other expenses connected with the property and he had refused to carry out his agreement to sign a note in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $6,212.50 and a second mortgage to secure said note. There was a conflict in the evidence as to whether said note was to provide for monthly installments of $50, $55 or $100. The trial court made a finding that defendant had agreed to pay said note in monthly installments of $75 and it was held on appeal that this finding was unsupported by the evidence. On page 789 of 219 Cal., on page 199 of 29 P. 2d, the court states, "It is to be noted that the point here made is not that the amount of the installments was uncertain, but that the amount fixed by the trial court finds no support in the record. If the court had fixed $100, $50, or $55 as the amount of the monthly installments, such finding would have been amply sustained by the record."

The language of the decision upon which plaintiffs rely is found on page 788 of 219 Cal., on page 198 of 29 P.2d, and reads as follows: "There is no principle of equity requiring all the terms and conditions of the proposed agreement to be set forth in the contract. The usual and reasonable terms found in such contracts are, in contemplation of the parties, a part of such contract. * * * That rule has particular application to the facts of this case, where the evidence shows that defendant was engaged in the business of selling houses for the plaintiff, and that the agreement was that the debt due plaintiff should be evidenced by the type of agreement usual in such cases." It seems clear from a reading of the entire opinion that the quoted language was directed at claims of uncertainty other than the claim that the agreement was uncertain as to the amount of the monthly installment to be paid upon the note secured by the second mortgage.

[3] Relying particularly upon the statement that "The usual and reasonable terms found in such contracts are, in contemplation of the parties, a part of such contract", plaintiffs give in their brief their version of "the usual and customary terms of payments of real estate loans to lending institutions" and argue therefrom that the agreement here should be construed as providing for a monthly installment of $24 per month on the first deed of trust and of $16 per month on the second deed of trust. It is a sufficient answer to plaintiffs' argument to state there is no evidence in the record concerning any such "usual and customary terms of payment" and that even plaintiffs' version thereof shows that such terms are not fixed but are variable.

[4] A further distinction between the cited case and the present one is that in the cited case the trial court granted specific performance and in the present case the trial court denied specific performance. The authorities indicate that the trial court is vested with certain discretion in determining whether specific performance should or should not be granted under the facts of any particular case. As was said in Lind v. Baker, 48 Cal.App.2d 234, at page 245, 119 P.2d 806, at page 812, "The enforcement of a contract by a decree of specific performance rests in the sound discretion of the court, a judicial discretion to be exercised in accordance with established principles of equity with reference to the facts of the particular case. The contract may be valid in law and not subject to cancellation in equity and yet the terms thereof and the attendant circumstances may be such as to require the court to deny its specific performance." See also 23 Cal.Jur. 418; 58 Corp.Juris. 855 and cases cited. Janssen v. Davis, supra, was a case involving facts clearly calling for equitable relief by way of specific performance but we find no facts in the present case to indicate that the denial of equitable relief by way of specific performance constituted an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court.

The judgment is affirmed.

PETERSON v. PETERSON.

Civ. 7010.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

May 29, 1944.

I. Divorce ☞303(2)

Generally, request for modification of interlocutory divorce decree with respect to custody of parties' minor child will be refused, in absence of showing of some change in circumstances rendering such modification advisable from standpoint of child's welfare, but courts have jurisdiction to modify such custody orders without such showing. Civ.Code, § 138.

2. Divorce ☞303(2), 312

Where court order respecting custody of divorced spouses' minor child fails to permit one of spouses to see child, it is proper, under ordinary circumstances, to modify order so as to grant such permission, and question whether such aggravating circumstances and conditions exist as to warrant denial of such privilege is primarily for trial court, with whose determination appellate court should not interfere, unless abuse of trial court's discretion is shown. Civ.Code, § 138.

3. Divorce ⇨303(2)

A trial court, determining in its discretion that there is sufficient showing that welfare of divorced spouses' minor child will be adversely affected by subsequent events, is justified in modifying its previous order respecting such child's custody in interest of what it believes to be for child's welfare. Civ.Code, § 138.

4. Divorce ⇨303(3)

A superior court order, modifying interlocutory divorce decree awarding parties' minor daughter's custody to husband by giving sole custody to wife if and when husband should be inducted into armed forces, was proper, in view of court's finding that both parents were fit and proper persons to have child's custody. Civ.Code, § 138.

5. Parent and child ⇨2(3)

The status of all married, as well as unmarried, men within military age limits should be considered by courts in determining questions as to their minor children's custody. Civ.Code, § 138.

6. Parent and child ⇨2(3)

In case concerning minor child's custody, underlying paramount principle is child's welfare and best interest. Civ.Code, § 138.

7. Divorce ⇨303(3)

An application for modification of award of custody of divorced spouses' minor child is addressed to trial court's sound legal discretion, subject only to statutory qualifications. Civ.Code, § 138.

8. Divorce ⇨303(3)

An order modifying interlocutory divorce decree, awarding parties' minor daughter's custody to husband for three years, by awarding custody to wife if husband should be inducted into armed forces, providing for reasonable visitation by both spouses, and awarding wife child's custody for a month during summer and a week at Christmas time, was not abuse of discretion. Civ.Code, § 138.

Appeal from Superior Court, of Butte County; Harry Deirup, Judge.

Action for divorce by Iva Mae Peterson against S. R. Peterson. From an order granting plaintiff's application for modification of an interlocutory divorce decree with respect to the custody of the parties' minor daughter, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

J. Oscar Goldstein and Burton J. Goldstein, both of Chico, for appellant.

Ware & Ware, of Chico, for respondent.

PEEK, Justice.

The defendant herein appeals from an order granting plaintiff's application for a modification of an interlocutory decree of divorce with respect to the minor daughter of the parties.

The original order, pursuant to an agreement between the parties, awarded the care and custody of the child to the defendant for a period of three years, and upon the expiration of such period divided the custody equally between the parties.

Plaintiff's affidavit in support of her motion alleged that there was no hearing on the issue of custody nor was any evidence introduced by either party—the previously mentioned agreement being the sole basis for the order. She further alleged that notwithstanding the original agreement it was also the oral agreement of the parties that she was to have the actual custody, care and control of the child, and that in accordance with such oral agreement the child remained in her custody until shortly after the decree when, upon the pretense that he wished to have the child visit him, the defendant took the child to San Francisco, where she has remained ever since, despite plaintiff's requests that the child be returned to her. Plaintiff also alleges that the real purpose of the defendant in desiring the record custody, although under the oral arrangement plaintiff was to have the actual custody was to avoid service in the armed forces of the United States. Further allegations recite the difficulties encountered by plaintiff in endeavoring to see the child, the poisoning of the child's mind against her, and other facts relating to defendant's actions in regard to herself and the child.

An order to show cause issued, and at the conclusion of the hearing thereon, the court, in its order, impliedly found both parties to be fit and proper persons to have the care and custody of the child; that since the entry of the interlocutory decree the status of the parties had changed, particularly in relation to probable service in the armed forces by the defendant, making it impossible for him to have the care and custody of the child, and that it appeared to the court that in the event such contingency took place the best interests of the child would be served by awarding the care and custody to the mother. The interlocutory decree was modified accordingly. Further provision was made for reasonable visitation by both parents and the mother was awarded custody for a month during the summer and a week at Christmas time. In other respects the two orders remained essentially the same.

The defendant's attack upon the modification order is (1) that a change of circumstances subsequent to the entry of the original decree must be shown; (2) that in order for the trial court to modify its previous order there must be a showing that the defendant was not a fit and proper person to have the custody of the child, and (3) that as plaintiff failed to make such a showing upon either of the issues raised, the modification order was an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court.

[1] The rule of "changed circumstances" might well be termed a creature of judicial expediency. It is not statutory. It is a means to end the turmoil of litigation so often attendant with matters involving questions of custody and to make it impossible for a dissatisfied party to keep the courts continually occupied with his or her grievances concerning former orders. Accordingly the courts have generally held that in absence of a showing of some change in circumstances making it advisable from the standpoint of the welfare of the child that the former order be modified, a request for a modification will be refused.

However, that is not to say that the courts have no jurisdiction to modify previous orders in the absence of such a showing nor do the decisions wherein the rule is enunciated "deny the power of the court to make such modification of its orders relative to the custody of children." Bogardus v. Bogardus, 102 Cal.App. 503, 506, 283 P. 127, 128. It is not an iron-clad rule to which there can be "no possible exception." Foster v. Foster, 8 Cal.2d 719, 68 P.2d 719, 723.

[2] The portion of the modification order herein relating to the right of reasonable visitation by both plaintiff and defendant and the giving to the mother the custody of the child during certain designated vacation periods presents a situation comparable to that found in the case of Bogardus v. Bogardus supra, wherein this court stated:

"There can be no question that under ordinary circumstances, where the court has failed to permit one of the parents the right to see a minor child, that it is proper to modify the order so as to permit such parent to see the child. Only very aggravating circumstances and conditions would warrant a court in denying such privilege, and whether such conditions exist is primarily a question for the trial court to determine, and, unless it is shown that the trial court has abused its discretion in this particular appellate courts, we think, should not interfere."

The remaining phase of defendant's first contention relates to that portion of the order modifying the former decree by giving the sole custody to the mother if and when the defendant should be inducted into the armed forces. To accept defendant's argument in this regard and blindly follow the rule that changing circumstances must of necessity be shown, would be to limit the powers of the court to the correction of conditions which have already arisen and which have already worked harm to the child.

[3] It is not impossible to conceive of cases where, in the interest of the welfare of a child, a court would be amply justified in modifying a former order despite the fact that there had been no present change in the circumstances of the parties. Foster v. Foster, supra. To this might be added a further statement that if the trial court, in its discretion, determines that there is a sufficient showing indicating that the welfare of a child will be adversely affected by subsequent events the court likewise would be justified to intervene and modify its previous order in the interest of what it believes to be for the welfare of the child.

[4,5] The power of a court in such matters cannot be solely negative in character. In other words, it is not limited only to the correction of conditions which have already arisen. Such a construction would be to deny to the courts the power speci-cally granted under section 138 of the Civil Code to "at any time modify or vacate" orders of custody as may seem necessary and proper for the "best interest of the child in respect to its temporal and its mental and moral welfare." Under such section it cannot be denied that an order such as is herein attacked which seeks to prevent a happening of what the court in its discretion has found would not be for the best interest of the child, is not well founded in equity and in justice.

The status of all married, as well as unmarried, men within the military age limits is something which the courts properly should consider in present custody matters. The modification order herein in no way changes the present status of the defendant in his right of custody of the child. It is only qualified upon his actual entry into the armed services. If he is not inducted there will be no change in the custody. However, if such contingency should arise it is obvious that the defendant would be compelled to place the child with others. Under such circumstances the natural right of the mother to the care of a minor child, if a fit and proper person, would prevail as against strangers. Stever v. Stever, 6 Cal.2d 166, 56 P.2d 1229; Newby v. Newby, 55 Cal.App. 114, 202 P. 891. If the mother could not be denied her right at that time what valid reason can be advanced to deny her now what she legally could establish if and when such contingency should occur.

The question of fitness of either the father or mother is no more an issue herein than it would be at the conclusion of the three year period contained in the original decree, as the trial court found that both parents were fit and proper persons to have the custody of the child. Appellant's contention in this regard would appear to be without merit. Section 138 of the Civil Code provides that a court in awarding custody is to be guided (1) by what appears to be for the best interests of the child, and (2) as between parents adversely claiming the custody neither parent is entitled to it as of right, but other things being equal if the child is of tender years it should be given to its mother. Further amplification of the quoted portion of said section is found in the case of Washburn v. Washburn, 49 Cal.App.2d 581, 122 P.2d 96, 100, wherein it is stated that the mother is the natural custodian of her young, and that the code exacts that she shall have custody of her child, everything else being equal, and that "in the case of girls it is obvious that they are particularly in need of the sympathy, affection, consideration and tender care which only a mother can give—and so normally they should be in her custody." The contention of defendant is therefore in direct opposition to the statutory law of this state and the decided cases in relation thereto.

The defendant's final contention relates to the question of whether in view of the record before us, the trial court abused its discretion by the modification of the original decree.

[6,7] In custody cases the underlying principle, paramount to all others, is the welfare and best interest of the child. Washburn v. Washburn, supra. Therefore an application for a modification of an award of custody must be addressed to the sound legal discretion of the trial court (Fay v. Fay, 12 Cal.2d 279, 83 P.2d 716; Foster v. Foster, supra), subject only to the qualifications contained in section 138 of the Civil Code.

The Supreme Court in Taber v. Taber, 209 Cal. 755, 290 P. 36, 37, quoting with approval from the opinion by the court in Simmons v. Simmons, 22 Cal.App. 448, 451, 134 P. 791, stated: "It is manifest that the Legislature * * * intended to confide to trial courts, in the disposition of the minor children of the parties to divorce actions, a very extensive discretion, with a view to the conservation of the highest and best interests of such minors, and the conclusion arrived at by such courts in such cases will not be set aside unless the record discloses a clear abuse of that discretion." See Prouty v. Prouty, 16 Cal.2d 190, 105 P.2d 295.

[8] The defendant herein having failed to show a clear abuse of such discretion, the order is affirmed.

MORETTI et al. v. ABBOT et al.
Civ. 14343.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

June 1, 1944.

Rehearing Denied June 21, 1944.

Hearing Denied July 27, 1944.

1. Joint tenancy ☞3

Substantial evidence supported finding that sisters intended to place their properties in joint tenancy for benefit of survivor, as against contention of heirs of one sister that joint tenancy was created for security reasons alone and that sisters intended their properties to be kept separate.

2. Appeal and error ☞1010(1)

Finding of trial court on issue of fact supported by evidence may not be disturbed on appeal.

3. Executors and administrators ☞29(5)

The mere appointment, without more, of an administrator for estate of deceased joint tenant to assert a claim against surviving joint tenant as to joint tenancy property was not res judicata in subsequent quiet title suit on issue as to whether joint tenancy was created for security purposes only with intent that properties be kept separate as between the joint tenants.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter S. Gates, Judge.

Action by Louis R. Moretti against Frank Abbot and others to quiet title to certain realty, wherein defendants cross-complained against plaintiff and Bank of America National Trust & Savings Association and others. From a judgment for plaintiff on the complaint and against defendants on their cross-complaint, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Ray Howard and W. W. Comstock, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Spray, Davis & Gould, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

Edmund Nelson and William C. Day, both of Los Angeles, for Bank of America.

W. J. WOOD, Justice.

The plaintiff obtained a judgment by which his title was quieted in a parcel of real estate and by which relief was denied to defendants on their cross-complaint. From this judgment defendants have appealed.

Prior to January 30, 1935, Mercedes Madden was the owner of a parcel of real estate located on Spring Street in Los Angeles of the value of $7,500, according to the appraisal of the bank which held a lien thereon, to secure the payment of a note on which there was due the sum of $9,438.15. At the same time Kate Carmen Abbot, a sister of Mercedes Madden, was the owner of a parcel of real estate located on Main Street in Los Angeles of the value of $19,000, according to the appraisal of the bank which held a lien thereon, to secure the payment of a note on which there was due the sum of $6,565.25. Mrs. Madden was in danger of foreclosure because of delinquency. There was also a delinquency in the payment of three years taxes on Miss Abbot's property. On the date above mentioned Mrs. Madden and Miss Abbot deeded their respective properties by grant deed to Grace Stoermer, an officer of the bank, who in turn executed a deed in favor of Mrs. Madden and Miss Abbot, by which the record title to both properties was conveyed to them as joint tenants. Simultaneously a deed of trust was executed by the two sisters covering both parcels of property to secure a single promissory note in the sum of $17,000, the total indebtedness then due on the properties. All of these instruments were placed in escrow and were filed for record on February 18, 1935. Miss Abbot died on March 7, 1937, and on April 16, 1938, Mrs. Madden recorded in the office of the recorder of Los Angeles County an affidavit setting forth the death of Miss Abbot and the description of the property in question for the purpose of vesting legal title in herself. Mercedes Madden died on May 14, 1940. Her estate was probated and distributed to her son, plaintiff herein.

The defendants are the successors in interest of three-fourths of the estate of Miss Abbot. They contend that the joint tenancy deed was executed to the two sisters because of the insistence of the bank; that the arrangement by which the two properties were deeded to Grace Stoermer and thereafter to the sisters in joint tenancy was made for security purposes only and that it was the intention of the two sisters that their properties should be kept separate. In their cross-complaint, they ask that it be decreed that they have the right to redeem the property which was deeded to Grace Stoermer by Miss Abbot upon the payment of the amount due to the bank and that there be an accounting between the parties covering the collection of rentals received from the two parties.

The trial court made findings favorable to plaintiff on the issues involved, but it is argued by defendants that no findings could properly be made on the evidence except in conformity with their contentions. They refer to the evidence by which it is shown that the Madden property was in great danger of being lost whereas the Abbot property was comparatively safe; to the actions of the bank officials in arranging the joint tenancy deed; to statements made by witnesses to the effect that Miss Abbot had stated that the arrangement was only temporary; and to efforts made by Miss Abbot shortly before her death to have the properties refinanced and separated.

Evidence was presented by plaintiff in conflict with the evidence of defendants' witnesses. From the testimony of plaintiff's witnesses it appears that each of the sisters was entirely informed concerning the effect of the joint tenancy deed and that each expressed a desire to have the deed executed in joint tenancy and after the transaction was completed Miss Abbot expressed her satisfaction with what she had done. Julia Hislop testified that Miss Abbot had told her that she wanted to create the joint tenancy because there were "just the two of them and then who ever lived could get it", and that she had created the joint tenancy to make living easier for both of them. She also testified that Miss Abbot had told her that "Frank (one of the defendants) wanted to see her and tried to coerce her into changing it and she didn't want to"; that "she would not worry about where it was going to go and what was going to happen if she died". Another witness, Anna Bernardini, testified that she had had a conversation with Miss Abbot in 1934 in which Miss Abbot had stated that "she wanted to put it in joint tenancy in favor if she died her sister would get it, but if her sister died she would get it". M. A. Bernardini testified that in the latter part of 1935 he had a conversation with

Mrs. Madden and Miss Abbot in which "both said they were happy they have joint tenancy, said now they don't need to worry any more. Q. Did they say anything about what would happen to the property in case one died? A. They said the tenancy they were making with the bank, she said, 'If I die my property goes to Mercedes, and if Mercedes dies the property go to me.'"

[1,2] The trial court found that: "It was the intention of said Kate Carmen Abbot and Mercedes Madden that upon said loan being paid to the Bank of America National Trust & Savings Association that said property should be reconveyed to the grantors, their heirs or assigns as would be entitled thereto under the law without in any manner whatsoever affecting said joint tenancy hereinabove created." The evidence above mentioned gives substantial support to this finding. It was the duty of the trial court to determine the intention of the sisters when they created the joint tenancy. The finding of the trial court on this issue being favorable to plaintiff and being supported by the evidence, it may not be disturbed on appeal. Smith v. Lombard, 201 Cal. 518, 525, 258 P. 55.

[3] Upon the death of Miss Abbot applications were made by Mercedes Madden and Frank Abbot for letters of administration and the petition of Frank Abbot was granted. There is no merit in the contention of defendants that this constituted an adjudication of the issue now before the court. In his application Frank Abbot alleged that the estate of Miss Abbot had a claim against Mrs. Madden as to the property in question and asked that he be appointed so that he could assert that claim. However, an examination of the files of the probate of the Abbot estate reveals that no action was commenced to assert the alleged claim.

The motion of defendants, now pending in this court, to take additional evidence on the subject of the rents collected from the two properties is denied. The judgment is affirmed.

WHITTEMORE et al. v. LOCKHEED AIRCRAFT CORPORATION.*

Civ. 14185.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 3, California.

May 25, 1944.

Rehearing Granted June 21, 1944.

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 1066

In action against airplane owner for death of deceased who was killed in crash, giving of an instruction that deceased was in law a "passenger" to whom defendant owed the duty of ordinary care, was reversible error where there was evidence that deceased was a noncompensating guest. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 151, $\S$ 11½.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Passenger".

2. Negligence $\S$ 121(1)

In action against airplane owner for death of deceased in crash, burden was upon plaintiff to prove that deceased was not a "guest" within Air Navigation Act relieving owner from liability for death or injury of a noncompensating guest. Gen. Laws 1937, Act 151, $\S$ 11½.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Guest".

3. Trial $\S$ 142

Where a party is unable to introduce evidence directly bearing upon the existence of a fact he is attempting to prove and the evidence available may serve only to establish the existence of certain primary facts that are logically connected with the material fact, and the jury can reasonably infer from the primary facts that the material fact exists, the party has introduced sufficient evidence to entitle him to have the jury decide the issue.

4. Trial $\S$ 142

Whether a particular inference can be drawn from certain evidence is a question of law, but whether the inference shall be drawn, in any given case, is a question of fact for the jury.

5. Negligence $\S$ 138(1)

In action against airplane owner for death resulting from crash, giving an instruction that at time of accident deceased was in law a "passenger" was error, in that wording of instruction confused jury in attempting to differentiate between passenger and "guest" as respects the Air Navigation Act which relieves owner of aircraft from liability for death or injury to a non-compensating guest. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 151, $\S$ 11½.

6. Negligence $\S$ 132(1)

In action against airplane owner for death of deceased in a crash of a dual control airplane, proffered evidence that preceding the take off the owner's pilot first seated himself in the cockpit on the left side but gave up his seat to decedent, an experienced pilot, and that it was the general custom for the pilot who was to do the flying of a dual control plane to take the seat on the left-hand side, was improperly rejected, since it had a bearing on question who was operating plane and question of contributory negligence.

7. Negligence $\S$ 132(4)

In action against airplane owner for death resulting from crash of a dual control airplane, evidence that on four previous occasions the deceased, an experienced flyer, had taken the controls and operated the plane on similar trips was incompetent to show that on the trip in question, deceased was operating the plane.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Kurtz Kauffman, Judge.

Action by Margaret C. Whittemore and another against Lockheed Aircraft Corporation to recover for the death of plaintiff's intestate who was killed in an airplane crash. The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff and from the judgment entered, defendant appeals.

Reversed.

Joe Crider, Jr. and Frank B. Belcher, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Kenneth E. Grant and J. Edward Haley, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

BISHOP, Justice pro tem.

At 1:40 p. m. on the 16th day of May, 1938, an airplane, which had just been completed by the defendant, Lockheed Aircraft Corporation, tested and found wanting in no detail, took off from the Union Air Terminal at Burbank on a flight to Las Vegas, Nevada, where it was to be delivered to the Northwest Air Lines, Inc. In the seats provided for the pilot and copilot in this dual control ship, sat Fred W. Whittemore, a licensed pilot with more than ten thousand hours of flying experience and the operations manager of the plane's purchaser, and Sid Willey, one of the defendant's skilled pilots. As passengers, the plane carried Mr. Salsbury, who had been serving as the Northwest Air Lines' resident engineer during the construction of the plane, six other persons, and their one hundred fifty pounds of baggage; not a capacity load. Twenty-five minutes after its take-off the plane, shrouded in fog, circled and then crashed into a mountain side, taking the lives of all on board.

[1] This action was brought by the widow of Mr. Whittemore to recover from the defendant company the damages she suffered by reason of the death of her husband. The theory of her complaint was that her husband's death had been caused by the negligence of the defendant; she did not and does not contend that any one was intoxicated or guilty of wilful misconduct. If Mr. Whittemore was a noncompensating guest, therefore, the plaintiff has no cause of action against the defendant. (Sec. 11½, California Air Navigation Act, Gen.Laws 1937, Act 151.) Upon the first trial of this action the trial court, convinced that as a matter of law Mr. Whittemore was a noncompensating guest, granted a nonsuit. This judgment was reversed on appeal by this court (Whittemore v. Lockheed Aircraft Corp., 1942, 51 Cal.App.2d 605, 125 P.2d 531), and the action was retried, resulting in a verdict and judgment for $25,000. Defendant's appeal from this judgment is based, in part, upon the giving of an instruction which represents a complete swing of the pendulum from the trial court's position on the first trial, an instruction given at plaintiff's request, which declared "on the flight of defendant's plane from Burbank, California, to Las Vegas, Nevada, the decedent Fred W. Whittemore was in law a passenger, and the defendant therefore owed him the duty of ordinary care and diligence for his safe carriage." It was error, we have concluded, to give this instruction, and for this error, and others, this judgment also is to be reversed.

It was error to give the quoted instruction for two reasons. In the first place, the question was one that should have been left to the jury as one of fact. We do not go so far as to agree with the defendant's contention that the conclusion expressed in the preceding sentence was established as the law of the case on the former appeal. This court, in its first review of this case, held that the evidence warranted the jury in concluding that Whittemore was a passenger, "meaning one," care was taken to state, "who is not a nonpaying guest and who is not engaged in a joint enterprise." It was not necessary to the decision, and it was not declared, that there was or was not evidence which would have supported the contrary conclusion, that is, that Whittemore was a noncompensating guest. On this appeal we find that there was such evidence.

[2-4] The evidence, in all its paucity, was set out on the former appeal and need not again be detailed by us. It should be borne in mind, as we now consider that evidence in reviewing, not a nonsuit, but an instruction advising the jury that Whittemore "was in law a passenger," that the burden was upon the plaintiff to prove that Whittemore was not a "guest riding in [the] aircraft without giving compensation for such ride or * * * while engaged in a joint enterprise with the airman flying the same," (quoting from section 11½, California Air Navigation Act, which appears in full in our previous opinion). This was stated to be the rule on the former appeal (page 609 of 51 Cal.App.2d and page 533 of 125 P.2d), and is in harmony with the cases announcing the rule under the like provisions of the automobile guest statute. Kruzie v. Sanders, 1943, 23 Cal.2d 237, 143 P.2d 704, 705; Jenkins v. National Paint & Varnish Co., 1936, 17 Cal. App.2d 161, 163, 164, 61 P.2d 780, 781. The entire absence of any evidence revealing the reason which brought Mr. Whittemore to Burbank and the failure of the witnesses to report one word, written or spoken, which would explain how Whittemore arranged to board the plane at Burbank, might well have caused the jury to feel that there were too many stones lacking in the foundation to give them a basis for determining that the defendant was in some way being compensated for furnishing Whittemore a plane ride from Burbank to Las Vegas. In support of the thesis of the former opinion the possibility of several reasonable inferences was developed. These inferences, however, as we examine them from the viewpoint of this appeal, are not ineluctable; they do not lead inescapably to the conclusion that the defendant received a benefit of a tangible nature as a consideration for accepting Whittemore as a guest. Not to recognize this as true is to take the untenable position that one may not give a ride to one, with whom he has and hopes to do business, except as a paying passenger. In this connection we find these words from Blank v. Coffin, 1942, 20 Cal.2d 457, 460, 461, 126 P.2d 868, 870, most appropriate: "It is not always possible for a party to a lawsuit to introduce evidence directly bearing upon the existence of a fact that he is attempting to prove. The evidence available to him may serve only to establish the existence of certain primary facts that are logically connected with the material fact. If a jury can reasonably infer from these primary facts that the material fact exists, the party has introduced sufficient evidence to entitle him to have the jury decide the issue. The jury is not compelled to draw the inference, however, even in the absence of contrary evidence and may refuse to do so. Whether a particular inference can be drawn from certain evidence is a question of law, but whether the inference shall be drawn, in any given case, is a question of fact for the jury."

[5] Not only was it error to instruct the jury that "Fred W. Whittemore was in law a passenger" for the reason that the issue involved was one of fact, not law, but for the second reason that the wording of the instruction naturally would and actually did confuse the jury. In legal literature the words "guest" and "passenger" have acquired connotations of which jurors, almost without exception laymen, are quite unconscious. The statute itself does not differentiate between "passengers" and "guests" but refers to a "guest" who rides "without giving compensation for such ride." It does not appear that the jurors in this case were aware that there was any question as to whether Whittemore was a "passenger" as distinguished from a "guest." Nothing occurred during the course of the trial that would bring such an issue to focus, and in view of the fact that the court advised counsel before argument that he was going to take the question from the jury it is not to be presumed that it was discussed in argument. But it does clearly appear that one of the important questions of the case was whether Whittemore was a "passenger" as distinguished from the "pilot" flying the plane. Much of the evidence was addressed to this question, and pointing to it were many objections, followed by huddles at the bench and the consequent rulings. That it was regarded by at least one juror as an important issue is evidenced by a question asked upon the occasion of their first return to the court room after their deliberations had progressed to a point, or points, of confusion. The foreman had requested further light on "negligence" and "contributory negligence," and then another juror inquired of the court: "In your instructions did you state Mr. Whittemore was a passenger or a passenger pilot?" By way of reply the instruction we have been considering was reread to the jurors. Then followed a lengthy discussion in chambers, in turn followed by a return to the court room and a rereading of an instruction which outlined to the jury the order in which they should consider the problems of the defendant's negligence, its proximate effect, Whittemore's negligence, its contributory effect, and the question of damages. Then this colloquy took place between the juror who had previously inquired concerning the subject, the trial judge, and counsel:

"Juror Number 6: Your Honor please, was his status established? That seems to be our worry.

"Mr. Crider: That depends upon what he means by 'established.'

"The Court: I don't understand what you mean by 'established.'

"The Juror: In your instructions at first you said he was a passenger. You have affirmed and denied that since then. Does he still remain a passenger?

"The Court: Yes.

"Mr. Crider: That doesn't determine the question, even though he was a passenger, as to who was driving the plane.

"Mr. Grant: I object to the argument of counsel.

"The Court: Objection sustained. I don't think you should have any argument. It is for the jury to determine, it is their exclusive province to determine the facts in the case, consider and weigh the evidence for that purpose. Of course, it is the duty of the court to instruct you on the law. Any other question? All right, the jury may retire for further deliberation."

Some hours later the jury again appeared in the court room, announced that they had stood seven to five on every ballot, and, upon invitation, an unidentified juror stated: "Your Honor, there still was controversy on the point of what was considered contributory negligence and negligence. That is still being thrashed out. Also a passenger in the plane." Another discussion between court and counsel occurred in chambers, during which defendant's instruction No. X and then plaintiff's instruction XX, were written out in longhand. Once again in the courtroom the trial judge reread some instructions defining negligence and contributory negligence; again, as plaintiff's counsel had repeatedly requested him to do during the conference, he read the instruction which we have quoted, with its statement "Mr. Whittemore was in law a passenger"; and he then concluded with these two new instructions, the first one being defendant's instruction No. X: "You are instructed that it is a question of fact for you to determine who was actually piloting and flying the plane at the time of the accident and at the time the plane left the ground at Burbank"; the second, plaintiff's instruction No. XX: "If you find from the evidence that the decedent Fred W. Whittemore was actually operating the plane at the time of the crash you are instructed that he was not by reason thereof guilty of contributory negligence unless you further find that some negligence on his part in such operation of the plane as distinguished from the general management, direction and control thereof proximately contributed to the accident and to his death."

Even if the evidence permitted of but one conclusion, and that was that Whittemore was a paying guest, it would have been unnecessary and improper to advise the jury that he was a passenger, for all that they need be advised would be that the measure of defendant's duty was that of ordinary care. The repeated giving of the instruction was confusing, and the giving of defendant's instruction No. X, it is our opinion, did not serve to cure the confusion.

The extent of the prejudice which the defendant suffered by the failure of the trial court to clear up the uncertainty created, by its use of the word "passenger," in the minds of the jurors struggling with the questions "Was Whittemore piloting the plane?" and "If so, was he guilty of contributory negligence?" becomes more apparent when we consider the added harm erroneously done to defendant's cause by plaintiff's instruction No. XX. We find the genesis of an important portion of the instruction in plaintiff's amendment to her amended complaint, where she alleged that the defendant "so carelessly and negligently constructed, maintained, cared for, directed, managed and controlled its said transport airplane that * * * while defendant was flying it to its destination at Las Vegas, Nevada, said airplane crashed to the earth * * *." The evidence utterly fails to substantiate the averments that the defendant was in any way wise negligent in the construction, maintenance or care of the plane, and this the plaintiff now admits. The only negligence of which the jury could have found the defendant guilty was that generally described as having to do with the direction, management and control of its plane, and specifically described, in further averments in the amendment to the amended complaint, as having the plane take off on a combat flight and continue on such flight to the point of the crash, in the face of information that weather conditions did not permit of contact flying.

There was no occasion to touch on this phase of the case, upon the former appeal, and it will be better understood if a background is sketched of the facts which the jury may well have drawn from the evidence which was, in the main, without conflict. The defendant company had originally assigned pilot Downes to fly the plane from Burbank to Las Vegas. Somewhere between 7:30 and 8 a. m. on the day of the fatal flight, Downes inquired about the weather at the United States Weather Bureau, located in the Union Air Terminal at Burbank, and was told that contact flying through the Mint Canyon section to Las Vegas was not possible, at the time, and probably would not be possible during the day. (Contact flying, the jury was informed, is flying in which the pilot is enabled to keep to his course by keeping the earth's surface in view.) Around 11 or 11:30, of the same morning, for personal reasons Downes was relieved of his assignment and Willey was substituted as defendant's pilot in charge of the delivery flight. Willey, incidentally, was licensed to do instrument flying and the plane was equipped for it. At 1:20 Willey telephoned his flight plan to the manager of the airport traffic control tower. In it he stated his destination, identified his plane and furnished other required data, and added: "Flying contact to Palmdale." Whittemore, it was stipulated, was familiar with this flight plan. He and Willey were in a group near the plane, just before or just after the flight plan had been given, and was heard to say to Willey: "Let us go up and check the weather." Thereupon the two went up to the building where the weather bureau was located, returned shortly, and got into the plane. Willey first occupied the left-hand seat in the cockpit, but relinquished it to Whittemore after the latter arrived and spoke to him. Whittemore then slid the window open, signalled with his arm and received an answering signal indicating that all was clear so that the engines might be started. He then started the engines, let them idle a minute or so, put his head out of the window, looked forward and back, signalled to a member of the ground crew, and finally, a return signal having been given, the plane taxied to the runway, and took off.

[6, 7] From this evidence the jury could have concluded with confidence that Whittemore was at the controls when the plane took off on its fatal flight and was still flying the plane when it crashed, less than a half hour later. Willey, to be sure, was the defendant's agent, in charge of the plane and of the flight, so far as the defendant was concerned, but that fact did not preclude the jury from concluding that Whittemore was flying the plane, of his own will. The defendant may have been negligent because Willey, with weather information much later than that received by Downes early in the morning, did not act as an ordinarily prudent person would have acted, in permitting the plane to take off and continue on a contact flight in the face of the known low to vanishing visibility. Such negligence, of course, falls within plaintiff's accusation that the defendant carelessly directed, managed and controlled its plane. Can it be argued that Willey was negligent in this particular, but that Whittemore, if possessed of equal knowledge of conditions and greater air experience than Willey, was not negligent? Answering our rhetorical question, we admit that such an argument could be made, but believe that it must have fallen on deaf ears. In any event, and this is the extent of our holding, the jury could have concluded that Whittemore was negligent for the same reasons and to the same extent that Willey was.

How reconcile this statement with the jury's verdict? A possible answer is found in the last instruction given them before that verdict was returned. By it they were advised, in effect, that Whittemore, if himself operating the plane, was not to be held guilty of contributory negligence unless he operated it negligently as distinguished from the general management, direction and control thereof. In other words, any negligence arising from his taking off and continuing on a contact flight, under conditions known to him to be risky for that type of flying, was eliminated from the jury's consideration with respect to Whittemore's contributory negligence; he was to be found contributorily negligent only if in the operation itself there was fault to be found. The defendant criticizes the giving of this instruction "for the reason that it is confusing, meaningless, and inapplicable to the facts of the case." This criticism would be just if the instruction were not susceptible of the interpretation we have ascribed to it, but so understood, it is not meaningless, just erroneous.

It has become obvious that in support of defendant's charge that Whittemore's negligence was a contributing factor in the accident, any competent evidence tending to prove that Whittemore was flying the plane should have been received. Such evidence was offered, by the defendant, but rejected. It will be recalled that Willey first seated himself in the cockpit on the left side, but gave up his seat to Whittemore. By questions, to which objections were sustained, and by offers of proof, which proved futile, the defendant endeavored to show the significance of this maneuver. It tried to prove that it was the general custom among flyers, "an absolutely universal unwritten custom and unwritten law among pilots," for the pilot who was going to do the flying, in a dual control plane, to take the seat on the left-hand side of the cockpit. The defendant also tried to introduce evidence that on each of the four previous trips on which Whittemore had accompanied newly completed planes on the delivery trips to Las Vegas, he had taken the left-hand seat and flown the ship all the way. (The defendant had made and delivered ten or twelve planes to Whittemore's company.) Objections were properly sustained to the questions whose object was to prove that Whittemore had on four occasions done one thing, in the expectation that the jury would infer therefrom that he had done the same thing the fifth time. An inference is not authorized upon so unsubstantial a basis. With respect to the significance of Whittemore's taking Willey's seat quite a different situation is presented. A jury would be fully justified in concluding that the person, who was seated on the left-hand side of the front seat of an ordinary looking automobile moving along Highway 101, was doing the driving. Unless our memory is faulty, a jury could with reason have inferred, in the gay nineties, that the person sitting on the right side of a "dual control," one-horsepowered, buggy, was the driver. Had the defendant been allowed and able to introduce the testimony it announced itself prepared to introduce, the jury could with reason have inferred that Whittemore, because he took the left-hand seat with Willey's acquiescence, was the pilot who was to control the flight of the plane on its take-off and until such time as a reason arose for a change over to the co-pilot.

In the event of a retrial it is unlikely that the plaintiff will repeat her question about insurance, in the jury's presence, so we shall not dwell upon that incident. Nor do we find it necessary to consider other matters that have been brought to our attention. For the reasons already given, the judgment is reversed.

Civ.Code, §§ 1573, 1577, 1580.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Jess E. Stephens, Judge.

Action by Abe Abroms, and Abe Abroms as administrator of the estate of Rose Abroms, also known as Rose Abrams, deceased, against the New York Life Insurance Company to reform an annuity certificate issued by defendant so as to cause it to provide for a refund annuity with Abe Abroms, individually, as beneficiary instead of a life annuity certificate issued by defendant. From a judgment for defendant, the plaintiffs appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

John Preston, of San Francisco, and A. Joseph Shapiro, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Meserve, Mumber & Hughes, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WHITE, Justice.

Plaintiff Abe Abroms individually and as administrator of the estate of Rose Abroms, his deceased wife, brought this action against defendant New York Life Insurance Company for reformation of an annuity certificate issued by the defendant, so as to cause the same to provide for a refund annuity with plaintiff Abe Abroms, individually, as beneficiary, instead of the life annuity certificate actually issued by defendant.

Trial before the court sitting without a jury resulted in a judgment in favor of defendant insurance company. From such judgment plaintiffs prosecute this appeal.

Prior to the trial of the instant case, defendant interposed a demurrer, both general and special, to the original complaint. The demurrer was sustained without leave to amend. Plaintiffs' request for leave to file a first amended complaint was denied, following which denial judgments of dismissal in favor of defendant were entered pursuant to the order sustaining the latter's demurrer. An appeal taken from said judgments resulted in a reversal thereof by this court with directions to the trial court to overrule defendant's demurrer and to permit the filing of the proffered first amended complaint should plaintiffs be so advised. Abroms v. New York Life Ins. Co., 53 Cal.App.2d 764, 128 P.2d 391.

Upon the going down of the remittitur, plaintiffs filed their first amended complaint. By its answer, defendant admitted the issuance of the original annuity policy, the surrender thereof when the life annuity certificate was issued on July 1, 1939, and conceded that the certificate actually issued provided for a life annuity. As affirmative defenses, the answer alleged laches and estoppel; and further set forth that Rose Abroms had consented in writing to the issuance of a life annuity certificate.

The factual background surrounding this litigation may be thus epitomized:

Plaintiff Abe Abroms was born in Lithuania in 1875 and his wife in 1879. They were married in England in 1905, coming to the United States in 1914. After Abe Abroms had worked as a cabinet maker in the State of New York for about five years, he and his wife settled in Akron, Ohio, where, in 1919, they commenced the operation of a small neighborhood grocery store. Through their industry and thrift they accumulated a total sum of $18,000 by 1932. Due to the condition of their health and upon the advice of their doctor, Mr. and Mrs. Abroms liquidated their business and decided to remove their residence to California with the intention not to again engage in any active business or other work. Being desirous of investing a portion of their savings to provide security in their old age, they determined upon an investment of $10,000 of their competence with the view of receiving an income therefrom in the later years of their lives, retaining the balance of $8,000 to meet their necessities and requirements during the years intervening until the invested $10,000 should commence to return them an income. Accordingly, they consulted an agent of the defendant insurance company, unfolded to him their aims, hopes and plans. Acting upon the advice and counsel of defendant's agent, plaintiff Abe Abroms and his wife purchased from the defendant on June 20, 1932, a single premium policy. This policy provided for the payment to Mrs. Rose Abroms of a life annuity of $79.10 per month "commencing on the anniversary of this Policy upon which the Annuitant's age at nearest birthday is 60 years; but, at any time prior to the commencement of such Annuity payments, the Annuitant may, provided the policy is then in force, elect in writing to receive in lieu thereof either:

"(1) A Life Annuity, as shown in Schedule I hereof, or

"(2) A Refund Annuity as shown in Schedule II hereof.

"The Company further agrees to pay to Abraham Abroms, husband of the Annuitant, Beneficiary, in the event of the receipt of due proof of the death of the Annuitant, a Death Benefit as shown in Schedule III hereof, if such death shall occur prior to the due date of the first Annuity payment hereunder; or, if a Refund Annuity has been elected and such death shall occur on or after the due date of the first Annuity payment, the Company agrees to pay to said Beneficiary the Annuity payments, if any, becoming due after the death of Annuitant, as set forth in the provision hereof entitled 'Annuity Payments'.

"The Company, upon surrender of this Policy on the anniversary elected for commencement of Annuity payments hereunder, will issue a Certificate in lieu thereof setting forth the rights and benefits as stated herein.

"This contract is made in consideration of the application therefor and of the payment in advance of the single premium of $10,000.00 representing Ten Premium-Units of $1,000 each. * * * This Policy takes effect as of the First day of July Nineteen Hundred and Thirty-two. * * *

In the year 1939, when the annuitant, Mrs. Rose Abroms, was approaching the stipulated age of 60 years, she and her husband visited the Los Angeles office of the defendant insurance company with a view of exercising the option provided for in "Schedule I" or "Schedule II" of the above named policy of 1932.

For the purpose of clarity, it might here be explained that the annuitant had the choice of one of two forms of continued annuity insurance when she reached the age of 60 years.

The form of certificate contemplated by "Schedule I" was called a "life annuity". This certificate provided for the payment to the annuitant Rose Abroms of the sum of $80.62 per month commencing with the first day of July, 1939, and continuing thereafter during the lifetime of said annuitant. However, all annuity payments under this form of certificate terminated with the death of the annuitant, Mrs. Rose Abroms.

The form of annuity certificate under "Schedule II", and which is called a "refund annuity", would be evidenced by a certificate which would provide for the payment of annuity payments in monthly instalments to the annuitant, Rose Abroms, until her death in the sum of $71.72, and upon her death there would be payable to the surviving husband, plaintiff Abe Abroms, as beneficiary, the annuity payments becoming due after the death of Rose Abroms.

By the amended complaint it is alleged that when plaintiff Abe Abroms and his wife called upon defendant insurance company at its Los Angeles office in 1939, they then and there informed defendant and its agents and employees that they were desirous of surrendering the 1932 policy according to the terms thereof for a certificate providing for a "refund annuity" which insured to the benefit of said husband, should the latter survive his wife, but that the defendant company issued to plaintiff Abe Abroms and his wife a certificate under "Schedule I" providing for a "life annuity" and that under the provisions of such certificate the annuity payments were to and did cease upon the death of said wife.

As heretofore noted, the life annuity certificate was issued as of July 1, 1939, and Mrs. Abroms died May 16, 1941, whereupon the defendant company refused to pay any further sums as annuities to the surviving husband, the plaintiff herein Abe Abroms.

On November 10, 1941, plaintiff in his individual, as well as in his representative capacity, commenced this action to reform the issued certificate so as to cause the same to provide for a "refund annuity" instead of a "life annuity".

Plaintiffs by their amended complaint specifically charged that on or about July 1, 1939, pursuant to the option or election plan provided for in the annuity policy of July 1, 1932, Abe Abroms and his wife, Rose Abroms, the annuitant named in said policy, went to the office of the defendant "for the purpose of notifying defendant that they were electing the refund annuity provided for in said policy and as shown in 'Schedule II' thereof, whereunder the annuity payments would be payable to Rose Abroms as the annuitant until her death commencing at her age sixty, and upon her death there would be payable to Abe Abroms, in his individual capacity and in his own right, as the designated beneficiary, the annuity payments becoming due after the death of Rose Abroms as set forth in the provisions of said policy entitled 'Annuity Payments'; and that plaintiff and his wife "then and there informed the defendant * * * that they desired to surrender the aforementioned policy for a certificate which would provide for a refund annuity"; that plaintiff and his wife "then and there ordered a certificate of such kind and type", but that defendant issued a different type of certificate, to-wit, one providing for a life annuity; and "falsely and fraudulently represented" that said certificate "provided for the refund annuity ordered by said plaintiff and his wife; that neither the plaintiff nor his wife examined the certificate and were ignorant of the fact that they were defrauded prior to the time when said wife died, because of their reliance upon the representations and statements so made by the defendant". On the issues of fraud thus made by the pleadings, the court found in favor of defendant. It was found that Rose Abroms had not asked for a "refund annuity" but for a "life annuity", and that she had received from the defendant the exact kind of an annuity certificate she ordered.

At the trial plaintiff Abe Abroms testified that neither he nor his wife could read English; that they did not read the original policy after it was issued to them in 1932, nor did they have any one read it to or for them; neither did they read or have read for them the "life annuity" certificate issued to them in 1939. That they relied solely upon the representations made to them by defendant and that at no time did defendant or its agents explain to plaintiff Abe Abroms or his wife the nature and ultimate effect of the annuity certificate issued to them.

A reading of the record in this case at once establishes the fact that plaintiffs' case depends for its virility and strength, in the main, upon the testimony of plaintiff Abe Abroms. That the court did not believe the testimony of said plaintiff is immediately apparent when reference is had to the "memorandum of opinion" rendered by the trial court at the conclusion of the trial, and wherein we find the following: "There are two phases of his testimony which are so incredible that the Court would not be justified in making any finding based wholly upon his testimony. He testified that he and his wife came to this country in 1914 and after he had worked for several years as a cabinet maker they opened a grocery store in Akron, Ohio, in 1919 which they operated until 1934, doing a business which they built up to a gross income of $350 to $400 per week; but that they never learned to read English and always read Jewish papers; and that the only thing that he could decipher so far as English is concerned was figures. I wrote upon a piece of blank paper the figures 1,000 preceded by a dollar sign ($), all written largely and clearly. This I handed to him and asked him what it said. After seeming great difficulty, frowning, holding the paper in various positions and taking an appreciable time, he said he could make out the figures 1,000. I asked him if there was nothing else he could make out upon the paper. He looked at it and said 'no'. I then pointed to the dollar sign and asked him if he knew what that was. He again looked at it carefully and said 'no'. The only thing he could understand there was the figures 1,000. The idea that this man could be in this country from 1914, could conduct a sizable retail grocery business in connection with which he would naturally deal with many wholesalers as well as retailers and build up of a profit of $18,000, $14,000 of which was in the bank, and still at this late date be wholly unable to recognize the dollar mark is so utterly incredible as to be beyond belief. The other circumstance to which I refer and which is almost if not equally preposterous is his testimony that in the talks which he and his wife had with the agent in negotiating for an annuity contract in which they were to deposit $10,000 in cash with the New York Life Insurance Company neither of them at any time ever asked the agent how much monthly payment they were to receive for it and neither of them had any idea or made any inquiry as to this important feature. Upon his attention being directed to this by the Court he again reiterated that neither of them had ever asked any question along this line but that he and his wife privately had thought that maybe they might receive $100 a month. The idea that two people who were sufficiently shrewd and capable to go to a strange country, establish a business and amass a profit of some $18,000 would be so naive as to turn a major portion of this over to a company with whom they had never had any prior dealings and never make any inquiry as to what they were to receive for it is wholly out of line with human experience."

As the first ground of appeal it is urged that the trial court erred in failing to follow the law of the case as established by the decision of this court in the former appeal herein Abroms v. New Life Insurance Company, supra.

In that connection appellants urge that the trial court was bound to follow as the law of the case the following principle enunciated by this court in the former appeal, wherein we said [53 Cal.App.2d 764, 128 P.2d 394]:

"If respondent's agents issued the Annuity Certificate here in question without an explanation to appellant and his wife of its ultimate effect, that act in itself would bring the parties within the provisions of section 3399 of the Civil Code."

[1] However, in giving consideration to the decision on the prior appeal to determine the extent to which the law of the case therein announced is applicable in determining the instant controversy it must be borne in mind that the former appeal was from a judgment based upon an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint without leave to amend. In that proceeding, being upon demurrer, it was required that the truth of the allegations contained in the complaint be assumed. Acting upon that assumption, this court held on the former appeal that the complaint stated a cause of action, ordered that the demurrer be overruled and that the proffered amended complaint be filed. But, unless the evidence adduced at the trial proved the allegations of the complaint which was considered upon the former appeal, the doctrine of the law of the case does not apply. In other words, if the trial court was justified, as we are persuaded it was, in holding that appellants' evidence failed to substantiate the allegations of the complaint and the amended complaint, then the decision of this court in passing upon the demurrer interposed to the original complaint was not binding upon the trial court as the law of the case, nor is it binding upon this court on this appeal, in passing upon the sufficiency of the evidence to support the allegations of the pleadings. Allen v. California Mutual Building Loan Associa- tion, 22 Cal.2d 474, 481, 482, 139 P.2d 321; Archer v. City of Los Angeles, 19 Cal.2d 19, 29, 119 P.2d 1.

There can be no doubt as urged by appellants that the original contract of insurance issued in 1932, providing for an annuity to Mrs. Abroms at age 60, was taken out by the insured upon the advice and counsel of defendant's agent, whose testimony shows that at the request of a friend he called upon them, and Mrs. Abroms explained to him "that they had worked hard for many years in this grocery store and they had been very thrifty, that they had not had a chance to spend any money because the hours were long and that it had taken a lot out of them; and as near as I can recall, Mr. Abroms was sick at the time; that they had bought the building and sold it and had accumulated about $18,000 in cash, and that they wanted to put some of it in a safe place with the idea that they did not want to lose any of their money and then be poverty stricken, so I recommended this particular contract at age sixty." However, no claim can successfully be made that both Mr. and Mrs. Abroms did not understand the nature of the policy originally issued to them in 1932, or were not satisfied that its terms met their desires and requirements. They both understood that when Mrs. Abroms attained the age of 60 years an annuity would be paid under the terms of this policy. That they so understood and were aware of the option or election afforded them to choose a particular type of annuity certificate is demonstrated by the very allegations of plaintiffs' complaint, wherein it is averred that they went to the Los Angeles office of the defendant insurance company "for the purpose of notifying defendant that they were electing the refund annuity."

With reference to appellants' testimony that neither he nor his wife could read English, it is significant that at the time they contracted for the policy in 1932 they made no such suggestion to the defendant's agent, Mr. Krakover, and the testimony of Elizabeth O. Busch, the defendant's Los Angeles Office employee with whom Mr. and Mrs. Abroms conferred in 1939, when exercising their election, was that neither of them at the time documents were presented for their signature suggested their inability to read English, nor did either of them request Miss Busch to read the documents to them.

Coming now to a consideration of the circumstances immediately preceding, and at the time of the issuance of the life annuity certificate to Mrs. Abroms, we find the evidence highly conflicting. There was, it is true, testimony that Mrs. Abroms was in serious ill health; that she was suffering from a severe heart malady, complicated by other ailments. As her physician testified, "she was warned by me that she had a bad heart and that her condition was not good". The death certificate executed by the doctor gave as the immediate cause of Mrs. Abroms' death, which occurred less than two years after issuance of the life annuity certificate, "cerebral hemorrhage, duration, sudden, due to hypertension and chronic myocarditis, duration, several years". Appellants argue that it is inherently improbable in view of the state of Mrs. Abroms' health, that either she or her husband would understandingly accept a life annuity upon her life when they could have obtained a refund annuity which would have inured to the benefit of Mr. Abroms in the event of the death of his wife. In this regard, however, we must bear in mind that the record is equally clear that Mr. Abroms himself was far from being in good health, and in fact was in rather bad health. As far back as 1914 he was sick in Rochester, New York, and unable to work, about 1930 he underwent an operation for appendicitis which developed into a peritonitis condition and was told by the attending physician that "he had only one chance in a thousand to live". Subsequently in California, and within less than two years prior to the time when Mrs. Abroms was required to make her election under the policy, Mr. Abroms suffered a severe fainting spell which rendered him unconscious and as a result, as stated by the trial court "was advised by the doctor that he should take it easy, that he had trouble with his heart, that he must give up smoking and must even refrain from taking an occasional drink of whiskey to which he had been accustomed for the purpose of giving himself strength". Occurrences at the trial, while Mr. Abroms was upon the witness stand, also indicated that he was in failing health. Furthermore, he was several years older than his wife and testified at the trial "I had it in my mind maybe I will go first".

As we view the record we are impressed that the trial court was justified in concluding that the motive actuating Mrs. Abroms in selecting the life annuity certificate instead of the refund annuity certificate was because "she wanted the most money she could get out of it", as Miss Busch, one of defendant's employees, testified Mrs. Abroms stated to her. And Miss Busch further testified: "I told her if she took a refund annuity she would obtain—if she took a refund annuity, the amount would be smaller and if she took a non-refund it would be greater". This same witness testified unequivocally as follows:

"Q. Did you at any time ever explain to Mrs. Abroms that if a life annuity certificate were taken, that the company would make no further payments even though she died three days after having taken that type of certificate? A. I explained that there would be no refund of any kind. She emphatically insisted that she wanted the most money she could get out of that policy during her lifetime, and I had no right to sway her opinion, her selection. I did tell her under one option she would get less and under the other one she would get more."

A reading of the record in this case furnishes convincing evidence that Mrs. Abroms was at all times the dominating figure in transactions with the defendant insurance company; that she conducted all of the negotiations. In fact, plaintiff Abe Abroms himself testified in the trial court that his wife did all the talking, that he stood alongside, taking no part in the discussion, while in his deposition he said in answer to a question, "I didn't say nothing, the lady was talking to the Mrs. because it was in her name."

[2] While appellants direct our attention to certain testimony given by representatives of the defendant company from which it is argued there is established inferentially at least, fraud, mutual mistake or mistake of one party which the other at the time knew or suspected, we must nevertheless, for the purposes of this appeal, wherein all intendments are in favor of the findings made and the judgment rendered, accept that portion of the testimony favorable to respondent. With that rule in mind, we find in the record further testimony given by Miss Busch, defendant's employee with whom the Abroms dealt at the time they applied for and obtained the annuity certificate, and wherein Miss Busch testified as follows:

"Q. Did you explain to Mr. and Mrs. Abroms on that occasion what a refund type of annuity policy was? A. Yes.

"Q. And what did you tell them in that regard? A. Well, as I said, she wanted the greatest amount that she could possibly get out of that annuity, and I told her that if she wanted that, she would have to leave her dividends, not draw it in cash, and she would have to take what is known as a non-refund annuity, that she would not get anything back in case of her death.

"Q. Did you explain to either of them or both of them, the difference between a refund annuity and a life annuity, or did you just assume that she knew what that was? A. Yes, I explained it to her. I didn't assume she knew what it was, but I didn't get far in my explanation because she was very—when I said anything at all—she would go back and tell me she wanted the most money she could get out of that while she was alive, and I didn't have a chance to make much of an explanation at any time to her.

"Q. Do I understand you to mean by your answer, Miss Busch, when you started your explanation she would interrupt you? A. She would.

"Q. In what form were her interruptions? A. She would put her hand down on the counter and she would say, 'I want all the money I can get out of this policy while I am alive every month'.

"Q. Now, what did you tell her, did you say anything to her about a non-refund annuity, what it was? A. Yes, I went into that quite thoroughly with her."

[3] We have searched the record in vain for any testimony that would contradict the assumption by the court that in all their dealings with defendant insurance company both Mr. and Mrs. Abroms accepted documents tendered them, apparently examined them, and signed them without at any time asking that the contents of such documents be read or explained to them by the representative of the insurance company or by any one else. That such would be the conduct of two illiterate people who had $10,000 invested is not borne out by human experience with the propensities and habits of people, nor by either the course of business or the course of nature. There isn't a scintilla of evidence that either Mr. or Mrs. Abroms were tricked into signing any documents by agents or employees of defendant insurance company, and there is a total lack of any showing that they were prevented by defendant's agents from reading such documents, while there is positive testimony that neither Mr. nor Mrs. Abrams at any time made any request to have the documents read to them or that they asked permission to take such documents to any other person for the purpose of having the contents thereof read or explained to them. The finding of the trial court that there was no fraud, either actual or constructive, practiced by the defendant upon plaintiffs finds ample support in the evidence as well as in the inferences fairly and reasonably deducible therefrom.

As heretofore pointed out, because appellants' evidence fails to prove the allegations of the amended complaint or to sustain the issues made by such pleading or raised by the evidence, the doctrine of the law of the case enunciated on the former appeal, wherein the sufficiency of the allegations of the original complaint to state a cause of action was considered, does not apply.

The evidence in this cause fails to establish a case which merits the application of the extraordinary remedy of revising a written contract of the parties herein. Sec. 3399, C.C. The evidence does not establish constructive fraud as that term is defined by section 1573 of the Civil Code; nor a mutual mistake or a mistake as set forth in section 1577 of the Civil Code. Neither does the evidence, taken as a whole, together with the inferences to be reasonably drawn therefrom, establish the fact that there was no meeting of the minds or mutuality of consent between all of the parties concerned. Sec. 1580, C.C. On the other hand, there is substantial evidence in the record to support the conclusion arrived at by the trial court that the "life annuity" certificate expressed the intention of the parties; was what the annuitant desired and gave to her "the most money" of the two alternative certificates available to her under the policy of 1932, which was what she said she wanted and in which her husband, at least by his silence, if not by any spoken word, acquiesced.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

6. Physicians and surgeons ¶6(2)

The Dental Practice Act, as it pertains to relationship between licensed dentists and dental laboratories operated by unlicensed persons, does not indicate legislative intent to permit dental laboratories or laboratory technicians to engage in practices denied to dentists or to compete with dentists. 7. Physicians and surgeons ¶10

The right given to laymen to manufacture dental plates under Dental Practice Act does not include right to advertise such products to the public under general rule that right to manufacture implies right to sell and advertise, since act deals with a profession pertaining to public health and is not governed by standards of conduct traditional in competition of the market place. St.1937, pp. 1241-1254, §§ 1600-1752.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Emmet H. Wilson, Judge.

Suit by the Board of Dental Examiners of California against E. K. Jameson, individually, and doing business under the firm name and style of E. K. Jameson Dental Laboratories, to enjoin defendant from carrying on or conducting the practice of dentistry. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Booth B. Goodman, of Oakland, for appellant.

H. E. Lindersmith, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WHITE, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment permanently enjoining and restraining defendant from carrying on or conducting the practice of dentistry, as that profession is defined and regulated by Chapter 4, Secs. 1600-1752, of the Business and Professions Code, Stats. 1937, Ch. 399, pp. 1229, 1241-1254, and which chapter is commonly known and cited as the "Dental Practice Act". Except as otherwise indicated, section numbers herein referred to are sections of said code. Authority for the commencement and prosecution of this litigation is contained in section 1705.

The cause was submitted to the trial court upon an agreed statement of facts which, in so far as pertinent to the disposition of this appeal, recited that the defendant never has been, and is not now, licensed to practice dentistry in the State of California; that he "caused a certain advertisement to be printed, published and circulated to the public" in the Los Angeles telephone directory on or about September 1, 1941, and again in the issue of June, 1942, reading as follows:

"Perfect

"Dental Plates

"are Not expensive

"If You Arrange to Deal with

"Manufacturing Dental Laboratory

"This is not a dental office, but a laboratory. Our entire facilities are devoted to the building of fine plates which you may arrange to purchase at our low laboratory rates.

"Plates Repaired and Rebuilt

"E. K. Jameson Dental Laboratories

"4157 W. 5th St. at Western

Phone Expstn 1000"

The agreed statement of facts also narrated that defendant is an individual doing business in the City of Los Angeles in his own name and under the firm name and style of Jameson Dental Laboratories; that his business consists of the construction, making, alteration and repairing of bridges and dentures, when the casts or impressions for the work have been made or taken by a licensed dentist and a written authorization signed by a licensed dentist accompanies each order given to appellant for such work; that in some instances appellant does such work at the instance and request of some licensed dentist, delivering the completed work to him; that in instances when a layman approaches with the view of buying the bridges and dentures from him, defendant "refers the layman to dentists, submitting a list of three names together with a statement that he is not a dentist and that he has no authority or authorization by law to supply them with their wants but that the same must be made through a dentist and that the dental fees must be arranged with the dentists; that, however, he does the laboratory work and supplies the material therefor and that the same may be paid by the layman directly to" defendant "for the said laboratory fees, which said fees are wholly removed from the dental fees which the said layman pays directly to the dentist"; that defendant "has on display in his laboratory various samples of dentures manufactured by him"; and that he shows them "to any and all persons who inquire relative to the same and quotes his price for each sample irrespective of whether the inquiry comes from dentists or from laymen or members of the public, and that the prices for his said dentures are fixed according to the value of each piece of merchandise"; and that "in the case of the layman or member of the public making such inquiry", defendant "advises that the price quoted is a fixed price only for the laboratory work and denture and does not include the fees charged by the dentist".

Based upon such agreed statement of facts, the court found "that it is true that said E. K. Jameson" (an unlicensed person) "at all times mentioned in said complaint has been, and is now, engaged in carrying on and conducting the practice of dentistry, as defined in the Dental Practice Act, in the State of California, in that he did, by causing said printed advertisement * * * to be printed, published and circulated as aforesaid, indicate and now continues to indicate by said printed advertisement that he will construct, alter, repair, and sell dentures and artificial dental plates." (Emphasis added.)

The sole issue presented upon this appeal is whether, because of the publication and circulation of the aforesaid advertisement, defendant is engaged in the practice of dentistry as such practice is defined in section 1625 of the Act, which provides:

"A person practices dentistry within the meaning of this chapter who * * * (c) * * * in any way indicates that he will construct, alter, repair or sell any bridge, crown, denture or other prosthetic appliance or orthodontic appliance."

The industry of counsel has not produced any authorities upon the precise question with which we are here confronted, nor have our efforts in that regard been rewarded with the discovery of an applicable authority. The case is concededly one of first impression.

[1,2] We must, therefore, have recourse to the cardinal rule that in the construction of statutes the legislative intent must govern. In attempting to arrive at the legislative intent, the entire act must be considered, as well as other enactments upon the same subject, including the legislative history of the legislation upon the subject matter in question; all for the purpose of enabling the court to give the statute the force and effect which the legislature intended, and so as to obviate the evil sought to be remedied.

Applying the rule just announced to the statute here under consideration, in an effort to determine whether the conduct of defendant amounted to the practice of dentistry, we find that in the year 1885 dentistry was, for the first time, regulated in California (Stats.1885, Ch. CXXVII, p. 110). A new act was adopted in 1915, Stats.1915, Ch. 426, p. 698. The original act of 1885 required only that those who were then engaged in the practice of dentistry should, within six months after the effective date of the act, register with the Board of Dental Examiners. Without specifying any educational qualifications, it was also provided that, after the act became effective, all persons other than those then engaged in the practice of the profession should be required, as a prerequisite to entering upon such practice, to submit to an examination by the Board as to their qualifications. By the act of 1915 it was required that all persons desiring to take an examination must be possessed of a high school education, as well as a diploma from a reputable college of dentistry. Subsequently, other amendments were made to the act, and in 1937 the Dental Practice Act was made a part of the Business and Professions Code.

It is interesting and helpful to note that section 11 of the 1915 act provided that:

"Any person shall be understood to be practicing dentistry within the meaning of this act who shall * * * (3) in any way indicate that he will perform by himself or his agents or servants any operation upon the human teeth or jaws, or (4) make an examination of, with intent to perform or cause to be performed any operation on the human teeth or jaws * * * but nothing in this act contained shall prohibit * * * an unlicensed person from performing merely mechanical work upon inert matter in a dental laboratory."

Manifestly, there was not included in the definition of the practice of dentistry just quoted, mechanical operations consisting of the construction, making, altering, or repairing of bridges and dentures such as characterized the dental laboratory business conducted by defendant herein. Undoubtedly, a dental technician could have contracted and dealt directly with a customer who sought such service. But, in 1933, the legislature further extended the definition of those who "should be understood to be practicing dentistry within the meaning of this act" so as to directly affect the activities of unlicensed persons who were engaged in doing dental work of a mechanical nature, by adding to the foregoing subdivision (3) of section 11 of the 1915 act the following: "or in any way indicates that he will construct, alter, repair, or sell any bridge, crown, denture, or other prosthetic appliance or orthodontic appliance" (Stats. 1933, ch. 84, p. 526). By the same act, the language of section 11 of the 1915 statute relating to what an unlicensed person might do was deleted, and in its place was substituted the language now appearing in subdivision (e) of section 1626 of the Business and Professions Code, reading:

"The following practices, acts and operations, however, are exempt from the operation of this chapter * * * (e) The construction, making, alteration or repairing of bridges, crowns, dentures, or other prosthetic appliances or orthodontic appliances when the casts or impressions for this work have been made or taken by a licensed dentist, but a written authorization signed by a licensed dentist shall accompany the order for the work or it shall be performed in the office of a licensed dentist under his supervision."

[3] It seems clear from a reading of the foregoing legislative changes in the Dental Practice Act that the lawmaking body sought thereby to raise the standards of the profession, and in so doing that they extended the definition of what constituted the practice of dentistry beyond simply the actual performance of operative work or treatments on the gums, jaws or teeth. To that end, it is to be noted that in defining what constitutes the practice of dentistry, section 1625 not only includes one who "performs, or offers to perform, an operation or diagnosis of any kind * * * upon the human teeth, alveolar process, gums or jaws", but, by subdivision (c) of this section provides that any person who "in any way indicates that he will perform * * * any operation upon the human teeth * * * or in any way indicates that he will construct, alter, repair or sell any bridge, crown, denture * * *" will thereby be practicing dentistry.

[4, 5] An examination of the stipulation of facts herein discloses that appellant, who possessed no license to practice dentistry, was advertising that "our entire facilities are devoted to the building of fine plates which you may arrange to purchase at our low laboratory rates". Manifestly, appellant was thereby indicating to the public that he would "construct and sell" plates and dentures. Subdivision (c) of section 1625 unequivocally declares that such conduct constitutes the practice of dentistry.

Appellant, however, contends that subdivision (e) of section 1626 specifically exempts his business from the operation of the Act by expressly permitting an unlicensed person to engage in the mechanical work done by appellant under the conditions described in said subdivision (e) of section 1626, all of which conditions concededly were met by appellant in the conduct of his business. Without doubt, appellant has the right to engage in the construction, alteration, or repairing of plates and bridges under the conditions which, according to the agreed statement of facts, characterized his operations, without impinging upon the provisions of section 1625, which defines what amounts to the practice of dentistry, but, when he advertises to the public that he will do these things, then he is practicing dentistry. The main objective of the legislation prohibiting certain forms of advertising is to protect the public from deception. If appellant be permitted to advertise as he did then he would be indicating that he will do, or offers to do, that which only a licensed dentist can do, because, under the provisions of subdivision (e) of section 1626, an unlicensed person can only engage in the mechanical work done by appellant "when the casts or impressions for this work have been made or taken by a licensed dentist"; and then only when "a written authorization signed by a licensed dentist shall accompany the order for the work or it shall be performed in the office of a licensed dentist under his supervision".

of advertising by licensed dentists contained in section 1680, which, among other things, prohibits a licensed practitioner from asserting professional superiority, or advertising a guarantee of his dental service, and for the doing of which he may be disciplined for unprofessional conduct (Barron v. Board of Dental Examiners, 44 Cal.App.2d 790, 113 P.2d 247; Webster v. Board of Dental Examiners, 17 Cal. 2d 534, 110 P.2d 992), it is manifest that appellant's advertisement of "perfect dental plates" would not be allowed to a licensed dentist. We do not regard it as at all reasonable to assume that the legislature intended that dental laboratories, or laboratory technicians, should be allowed to engage in practices denied to licensed practitioners. Neither do we believe that it was ever intended by the legislature that dental laboratories and technicians should be permitted to compete with licensed dentists. The legislative intent in this regard is clearly indicated by the language of section 1625, which declares that any person who "by card, circular, pamphlet, newspaper or in any other way advertises himself or represents himself to be a dentist", or who "offers to perform, an operation or diagnosis of any kind" is practicing dentistry. Whether a dental technician or manufacturer may legitimately, by advertising or otherwise, bring to the attention of licensed dentists the business in which such technician or manufacturer is engaged and the service he is prepared to render, is not before the court in the instant proceeding and need not be determined. True, in the instant case appellant's advertisement states therein that "this is not a dental office, but a laboratory". However, taken as a whole, the advertisement is not directed to practicing dentists whose laboratory work appellant is seeking and which work is to be done under the prescription or direction of such licensed practitioner, but the advertisement is an invitation to the public to "arrange to deal with manufacturing dental laboratory". And for what purpose? Manifestly, to secure professional services of the kind and type which, according to subdivision (c) of section 1625, is reserved only to those licensed to practice dentistry, unless it is done by an unlicensed person in conformity with the conditions and restrictions imposed by subdivision (e) of section 1626.

[7] Appellant urges that the right given to manufacture dental plates implies not only the right to sell them, but also the right to advertise such products. Ordinarily this might be true, but in connection with the manufacture and fitting of dentures or plates in the human mouth, "the legislature was not dealing with traders in commodities, but with the vital interest of public health, and with a profession treating bodily ills and demanding different standards of conduct from those which are traditional in the competition of the market place". Semler v. Oregon State Board of Dental Examiners, 294 U.S. 608, 612, 55 S.Ct. 570, 572, 79 L.Ed. 1086; Webster v. Board of Dental Examiners, supra.

For the reasons herein stated, the judgment from which this appeal was taken is affirmed.

CAMPAGNA v. MARKET STREET RY. CO.
S. F. No. 16985.

Supreme Court of California.
May 25, 1944.

Rehearing Denied June 22, 1944.

1. Negligence ⇨117

Plea of contributory negligence is not sufficient to raise defense of imputed negligence.

2. Pleading ⇨240

Generally, an order granting leave to amend is not an amendment, and in the absence of a written statement of facts concerning the issue, it is not properly pleaded.

3. Appeal and error ⇨195

Where a motion to amend pleading is granted during the trial, and the case is tried as if the amendment had been made, a party may not later complain that no formal amendment was filed.

4. Pleading ⇨236(5)

Trial court has large discretionary power to allow amendment to be made to conform to proof.

5. Appeal and error ⇨1041(3)

Where counsel for plaintiff declared in his opening statement that any negligence on part of driver of truck of which plaintiff was riding was not imputable to plaintiff, and defendant had been given leave to amend answer to raise issue of imputed negligence but failed to file amendment, plaintiff had not been prejudiced and could not complain of defendant's failure to file amended answer.

6. Negligence ⇨93(1)

Where two occupants of an automobile are engaged in a joint venture or enterprise with respect to its operation, the negligence of the driver is imputable to companion, but to constitute such relationship the parties must have community of interest in a joint or common undertaking, each exercising or having the right to exercise equal or joint control.

7. Negligence ⇨93(1)

The relationship of "joint venturers" in the operation of an automobile, so as to make applicable the doctrine of imputed negligence, is that of mutual agency, akin to a limited partnership.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Joint Venturer".

8. Joint adventures ⇨1

The relationship of joint venturers is founded on contract, and the acts of the parties over a period of time may be sufficient to raise an implied agreement of joint enterprise.

9. Joint adventures ⇨1

Although a joint venture generally contemplates an equal sharing of the profits and losses in the prosecution of the common purpose, the division may be left to the agreement of the parties.

10. Negligence ⇨93(1)

The doctrine of "imputed negligence" is not to be loosely applied, and where there is nothing in common between the passenger and driver of automobile except a common destination and a common purpose in going there, the negligence of the driver is not to be imputed to the passenger.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Imputed Negligence".

11. Negligence ⇨93(1)

To invoke doctrine of "imputed negligence" against passenger of automobile the passenger must do more than indicate the route to be traveled, a certain plan in common is not sufficient to establish relationship of joint venturers, and neither family relationship nor association together in business is determinative of the question.

12. Negligence ⇨122(1)

The imputation of contributory negligence is an affirmative defense upon which defendant has the burden of proof.

13. Appeal and error ⇨1066

In action against street car company for injuries sustained by an incompetent in a collision between street car and truck in which incompetent was riding and which was operated by incompetent's father, where the incompetent had been assisting his father in the business of selling fruits and vegetables from the truck, but there was no showing that the incompetent had any voice as to the manner in which the business was conducted or as to the route to be taken, giving an instruction on imputed negligence was prejudicial.

14. Street railroads ⇐118(14)

In action against street car company for injuries sustained by an incompetent in a collision between street car and truck in which incompetent was riding and which was operated by incompetent's father, where there was no showing that incompetent had any authority as to directing operation of the truck, giving an instruction on contributory negligence was improper.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank T. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Salvadore Campagna, Jr., an incompetent, by Angellina Sartinni, his guardian ad litem, against Market Street Railway Company for personal injuries. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

Prior opinion, 143 P.2d 43.

Fitz-Gerald Ames, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Cyril Appel, Linforth, Cannon & Miller, and Jesse H. Miller, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

EDMONDS, Justice.

Salvadore Campagna, Jr., was riding on a vegetable truck, driven by his father, when it struck a streetcar. As a result of the collision, the son sustained personal injuries. In the trial of his action for damages the jury returned a verdict in favor of the railroad company and his appeal from the judgment principally concerns an instruction relating to the doctrine of imputed negligence.

For some years prior to the accident, the elder Campagna had been in the produce business, selling fruit and vegetables from door to door. The son, a young man 25 years old, described in the testimony as being mentally deficient, customarily accompanied him. According to one defense relied upon by the railroad company they were joint venturers engaged in a common enterprise.

At the time of the accident, which occurred at about 5:30 in the morning, father and son were on their way to the market. Although the testimony as to the collision is conflicting, there is substantial evidence, the appellant admits, tending to prove that his father, in operating the truck, was guilty of negligence. But the conduct of the father would only absolve the railroad from liability if his negligence may be imputed to the son.

There is no dispute regarding the facts as to the business relations of the father and son. Campagna, Sr., testified that for approximately ten years the boy had been his companion every day. "He helps me lots," the father told the jury. "In going to the market he help to load the truck, and after, on the route, he deliver the stuff, fruit, vegetables, and anything for my customers. * * *" Also, the father continued, the boy would "collect the money sometimes, when he has the right change." When they came home after a day's work, the son would help "clean up the truck; take all the boxes out of the truck. * * *"

The young man lived with his parents, and as a member of the household he did chores such as cutting wood and carrying it upstairs, starting the fire and cleaning. Regarding the earnings from the truck, the father was asked on cross-examination: "Whatever you earned together went into the family pool, didn't it?" Answering affirmatively, the witness added: "Well, the boy is work more voluntary." He paid his son no salary, the father told the jury, although once in a while, when he could spare the money, he gave him a few dollars.

Regarding the son's mental capacity, although a physician testified that the boy is an imbecile, it appears that he can bathe and dress himself and go on errands to the store. "He was okay, that boy," said the father. But Salvadore is not like his other children, the father admitted, and the boy has had no schooling except for a few months when he was about six years of age.

Upon this and other evidence, the trial judge instructed the jury upon the doctrine of imputed negligence. The appellant concedes that the instructions upon this subject correctly state the law but he asserts that the defense to which they relate was not pleaded at such time as to give the railroad company the right to rely upon it. Assuming, however, that the defense was properly pleaded, says the appellant, there is no evidence justifying the court's charges to the jury concerning it. He also challenges other instructions stating principles of law to be applied by the jury in determining whether the motorman negligently operated the streetcar at the time of the accident. In support of the judgment, the railroad company asserts that the instruction as to imputed negligence was fully justified by pleading and proof and that the court did not err in other rulings.

[1] Concerning the question of pleading, the answer, as filed, did not include the defense of imputed negligence but, in general terms, it was alleged that the appellant was guilty of contributory negligence. Such a plea is not sufficient for one who seeks to charge a person with the negligence of another in the operation of an automobile; a defendant must assert that the injured person controlled, or had the right to control, the vehicle in which he was riding. Bennett v. Chanslor & Lyon Co., 204 Cal. 101, 266 P. 803; Dover v. Archambeault, 57 Cal.App. 659, 208 P. 178. But after the railroad company had concluded the presentation of evidence, its counsel asked permission to amend the answer "by adding the specific defense of imputable negligence, upon the ground that at the time of the happening of the accident the plaintiff and his father were engaged in a joint enterprise * * * and that the negligence of the father, the driver of the automobile, is therefore legally imputed to the boy." Over objection the motion was granted upon the ground that the defense of contributory negligence was pleaded and "you may amend by setting up the facts constituting it." No amendment was filed.

[2-5] As a general rule, an order granting leave to amend is not an amendment, and in the absence of a written statement of facts concerning the issue, it is not properly pleaded. Central Cal. Creditors' Ass'n v. Seeley, 91 Cal.App. 327, 267 P. 138. But when such a motion is granted during the trial, and the case is tried as if the amendment had been made, a party may not later complain that no formal amendment was filed. Greenwood v. Greenwood, 112 Cal.App. 691, 297 P. 589; Yule v. Mil- ler, 80 Cal.App. 609, 252 P. 733; Morris v. Standard Oil Co., 188 Cal. 468, 205 P. 1073; Parmenter v. McDougall, 172 Cal. 306, 156 P. 460. Trial courts have large discretionary power to allow amendments to be made to conform to proof and in the present case, as counsel for the appellant, in his opening statement, declared that "in the event the defendant should endeavor to establish any negligence on the part of the father, it is our contention that such negligence is not imputable to the son," the appellant has not been prejudiced and may not complain of the respondent's failure to file an amended answer.

[6-9] When two occupants of a vehicle are engaged in a joint venture or enterprise with respect to its operation, the negligence of the driver is imputable to his companion. But to constitute such a relationship, the parties must have a community of interest in a joint or common undertaking, each exercising or having the right to exercise equal or joint control and direction. Bryant v. Pacific Elec. R. Co., 174 Cal. 737, 164 P. 385; Pope v. Halpern, 193 Cal. 168, 223 P. 470. The relationship of joint venturers is that of a mutual agency, akin to a limited partnership. Butler v. Union Trust Co., 178 Cal. 195, 172 P. 601; Westcott v. Gilman, 170 Cal. 562, 150 P. 777, Ann.Cas.1916E, 437; Arnold v. Humphreys, 138 Cal.App. 637, 33 P.2d 67; Keyes v. Nims, 43 Cal.App. 1, 184 P. 695. It is founded on contract; and the acts of the parties over a period of time may be sufficient to raise an implied agreement of joint enterprise. Universal Sales Corp. v. California Press Mfg. Co., 20 Cal.2d 751, 128 P.2d 665. Although a joint venture generally contemplates an equal sharing of the profits and losses in the prosecution of the common purpose (2 Rowley's Modern Law of Partnership, § 975; 33 C.J. 841, § 2), the division may be left to the agreement of the parties. Hamer v. MacClatchie, 220 Cal. 720, 32 P.2d 620.

[10-12] The doctrine of imputed negligence is not to be loosely applied, and "where there is nothing in common between the passenger and driver of the vehicle except a common destination and a common purpose in going there the negligence of the driver is not to be imputed to the passenger." Wessling v. Southern Pac. Co.,

116 Cal.App. 455, 458, 3 P.2d 25, 26. The passenger must do more than to indicate the route to be traveled, and a certain plan in common is not sufficient to establish the relationship. Pope v. Halpern, supra. Neither family relationship between the parties, nor association together in business, is determinative of the question. Bryant v. Pacific Elec. Ry. Co., supra; Moore v. Franchetti, 22 Cal.App.2d 75, 70 P.2d 492. And as the imputation of contributory negligence is an affirmative defense, the defendant has the burden of proof upon that issue. Bennett v. Chanslor & Lyon Co., supra; Huber v. Scott, 122 Cal.App. 334, 10 P.2d 150.

[13, 14] In the present case there is no evidence relating to the relations of Campagna and his son except the testimony of the father as to the manner in which he operated his produce peddling business and there is nothing to show that the boy had any interest in the business. In the words of the father, the appellant's services were "voluntary" and although the boy was supported by the father's earnings on the truck, there is nothing to show that at the time of the accident the young man controlled or had the right to control the truck Campagna was driving. He had nothing to say as to where the vegetables were to be purchased, or the amounts to be paid for them; what the route should be, what prices were to be charged customers, or how the business should be carried on. Nor did he have the right to share in the profits of the peddling business. According to the undisputed evidence, he merely accompanied his father on the truck and did his bidding. Under these circumstances, the boy's connection with the enterprise was that of an employee working for his living expenses, and it was prejudicial error for the trial court to instruct the jury concerning the principles relating to the doctrine of imputed negligence. Wessling v. Southern Pac. Co., supra. The instruction upon the subject of contributory negligence was also unsupported by evidence and should not have been given.

This conclusion makes it unnecessary to consider the other points presented by the appellant.

The judgment is reversed.

PAUL v. WILLIAMS.

Civ. 3144.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

June 2, 1944.

Rehearing Denied June 30, 1944.

1. Sales ⇨272

Where canning company was acting as agent for growers who had agreed to raise tomatoes for sale to it, in entering into contract under which defendant agreed to raise tomato plants to be sold to growers, and it appeared that growers were undisclosed principals at time the contract was entered into but became disclosed before any deliveries were made thereunder, there was an implied warranty that plants should be reasonably fit for purpose of raising tomatoes for market, which was breached by delivery of mongrel plants which did not produce tomatoes of a merchantable quality. Civ.Code, § 1735.

2. Sales ⇨442(11)

The amount of plaintiff's loss on his tomato crop plus rental value of his land was not a proper measure of damages caused by breach of implied warranty that tomato plants sold to him should be reasonably fit for purpose of raising tomatoes for market, but the proper measure was an amount equaling difference between the amount plaintiff would have received for his tomato crop had there been no breach of warranty and the amount he did receive. Civ.Code, §§ 3300, 3358.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1178(6)

Where there appeared no reason why judgment insofar as it fixed liability on defendant for breaches of implied warranty should be set aside, but record contained nothing on which any fairly accurate estimate of plaintiff's damages could be based, District Court of Appeal would reverse the judgment and remand the cause for new trial solely on issue of damages.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Ernest Klette, Judge.

Action by Paul Paul against Irving Williams for breach of an implied warranty in selling tomato plants which were unfit for the production of commercial fruit. From a judgment for plaintiff, the defendant appeals.

Judgment reversed with directions.

Clyde E. Cate and Ralph Robinson, both of Fresno, for appellant.

Chester R. Andrews, of Fresno, for respondent.

MARKS, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment awarding plaintiff damages in the sum of $2054.50 for breach of an implied warranty in selling tomato plants which were unfit for the production of commercial fruit.

Plaintiff is a farmer who, during 1942, planted forty acres of tomatoes. Defendant, under the name of Irving Williams Company, for several years had been engaged in the business of raising tomato plants for sale to farmers who raised tomatoes for commercial purposes.

The Riverbank Canning Company is a corporation engaged in the business of canning tomatoes and making tomato paste. We will hereafter refer to this company as Riverbank.

During the year 1942, Riverbank entered into numerous contracts with farmers who agreed to raise tomatoes for sale to it. Plaintiff agreed to raise forty acres of San Marzanos and Pearsons for Riverbank. The San Marzanos, a pear shaped tomato, was contracted for at $19.50 per ton and the Pearsons, a round tomato, at $17.50 per ton.

Riverbank entered into a contract with defendant, evidenced by several letters, under which defendant agreed to raise 3,000,000 tomato plants for $2.75 a thousand. The negotiations on the part of Riverbank were initiated by a Mr. Brockway. The first letter is from Riverbank to defendant, dated February 10, 1942, and after stating the number of plants to be grown and the price to be paid, adds: "We understand that the plants are to be guaranteed at the time they are pulled and ready for growers." Defendant replied under date of February 11, 1942, in which he confirmed the agreement with Mr. Brockway, and added: "Every effort will be made to produce the desired number of plants but we do not guarantee to supply this quantity if conditions beyond our control interfere, such as frost, insect damage, etc." Riverbank replied to this letter under date of February 12, 1942, and stated that it believed the letter of Williams represented the understanding with Brockway but expressed the intention of submitting it to him for checking. The next day Riverbank wrote defendant that the contents of the letters, with an exception not material here, had been approved. The writings are none too definite in defining the terms of the contract. There is no specification of the varieties of tomato plants to be raised, and just what was meant by the statement in the first letter concerning the guarantee is not made clear.

Riverbank caused fifty pounds of seeds to be shipped to defendant which was used in planting the seed beds. Riverbank's agents inspected the seed beds during their preparation for planting. They were told that tomato plants and commercial tomatoes had been raised on some of the ground occupied by the seed beds. They also inspected the beds during the growing period and again when the plants were ready to dig and noticed some off variety plants growing among the true types. Williams testified that they told him to have some workmen precede the plant diggers and pull and remove the off variety plants so they would not be mixed with the true types; that he did this before digging the plants for delivery to the various growers.

The deposition of Williams had been taken and was used at the trial. In it he testified as follows:

"Mr. Andrews: And in general the terms of the agreement were what? * * * A. They supplied the seed, and charged me their cost for the seed, and I planted the seed under their direction shortly after the agreement was made.

"Q. And by 'their direction' what do you mean? A. Their field men inspected the land during the preparation of the seed beds and supervised the planting for the first few days.

"Q. Did they have anything to do with the choice of where the—what field you used? A. No. I took the field man to the ranch and showed him what land we had available at that time, and it was acceptable to them. * * *

"Q. I see. And when this contract was made, you contemplated that it was to be for the purpose of furnishing plants to these growers which Riverbank signed up, who were going to grow for Riverbank, is that right? A. That is correct."

We find the following in Williams testimony when called as a witness:

"Q. Did you ever know who Paul Paul was until—or, I will withdraw that. When did you first know anything of Paul Paul? A. The Riverbank Canning Company, at the time we entered into an agreement to grow tomato plants, informed me that they would advise me of the various growers—

"Q. Talk to the Court. A. Pardon me. Who would call for the tomato plants, and in due course of time we were advised that Mr. Paul Paul, or someone, would call for plants, and to keep a record of these growers, to facilitate them billing the growers for the plants.

"Q. Those instructions that you just referred to were received just prior to the delivery of these plants? A. That is correct."

Williams testified that prior to his delivery of the plants to a grower, a representative of Riverbank would call him by telephone and inform him of the deliveries to be made with the name of the grower receiving the plants. He would then dig the plants and make the deliveries at the seed beds. He was paid for the plants by Riverbank.

Three invoices are in the record showing deliveries to plaintiff. We quote the earliest in point of time:

showed the delivery and sale to plaintiff on May 8, 1942, of 24,000 San Marzanos, 1000 Pearsons, and 4000 unnamed tomato plants. A receipt attached to the third invoice shows that 22,000 of the plants went to H. H. Bagdasarian, and that the 4000 tomato plants unnamed in the invoice were Pearsons. This left a total of 83,000 plants delivered to plaintiff.

Plaintiff testified that he planted the 83,000 plants he received from defendant; that they were planted and cared for by Japanese experienced in tomato culture; that they were properly planted and cared for; that he had the vines dusted successfully for mites with the exception of one-half an acre of Pearsons which was deliberately dusted with too heavy a dust which killed the plants in order to kill a bad infestation; that he thought he planted 25 acres of the Pearson variety and 15 acres of the San Marzano variety; that neither variety received from defendant in boxes marked "Pearson" and "San Marzano" were true to type but were a mixture of both varieties; that there were many mongrel plants of no particular variety mixed in with the other plants; that these mongrels did not produce merchantable fruit; that from 15% to 20% of the plants in the

A second invoice in the same form showed the delivery and sale to plaintiff on May 6, 1942, of 12,000 Pearson and 26,000 San Marzano plants. A third invoice

San Marzano 15 acres were of this mongrel type and Pearsons and that from 50% to 60% of the vines in the Pearson 25 acres were mongrels that did not produce.

Plaintiff testified that he gave his promissory note to Riverbank for the cost of the plants which was paid when he delivered the tomatoes.

There is evidence that it was bad practice to plant a seed bed on ground that had been used to raise tomatoes for market or for seed beds for tomato plants; that unpicked tomatoes would fall to the ground and deposit their seeds in it; that these seeds would germinate and grow with the good seeds planted in the beds; that the mongrel plants in plaintiff's fields probably came from such volunteer plants growing in the seed beds; that it is difficult to tell the various varieties of tomato plants when they are ready for planting in the fields.

In addition of the loss of crop from the mongrel vines, their presence in the field added to the cost of picking as they were scattered through all the rows and the pickers had to pass by those vines. The price for picking ordinary fields of tomatoes ranged from fifteen to twenty-two cents a box, while plaintiff was compelled to pay pickers from fifteen to thirty cents a box, and even at the higher price could not get the last of his crop picked. The record does not disclose the added picking expense caused by the presence of the mongrel vines nor the value of the tomatoes left on the vines.

It seems clear from the evidence that plaintiff suffered a material loss in the returns from his crop by reason of the mongrel type plants delivered to him by defendant which failed to produce tomatoes, or merchantable tomatoes, and that his picking costs were increased by reason of the presence of the mongrel plants in his field.

Defendant maintains that his only liability is under subdivisions one and two of section 1735 of the Civil Code. He argues that Riverbank and not plaintiff was the purchaser of the tomato plants; that plaintiff was unknown to him at the time of his contract to grow the plants; that there was no privity of contract between himself and plaintiff; that there must be privity of contract between the purchaser and the seller before the warranties implied in the two subdivisions of the section come into play. In support of his arguments defendant cites such cases as Sutter v. Associated Seed Growers, 31 Cal.App.2d 543, 88 P.2d 144; Asamen v. Thompson, 55 Cal.App.2d 661, 131 P.2d 841; Rachlin v. Libby-Owens-Ford Glass Co., 2 Cir., 96

F.2d 597; and Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. Marhenke, 9 Cir., 121 F.2d 598.

He also argues that subdivision one of the section cannot apply to the facts here because Riverbank, and not plaintiff, was the buyer, and that plaintiff, not knowing defendant, could not have relied on his skill and judgment in raising the plants; that subdivision two of the section cannot apply here because plaintiff, not being the purchaser, did not buy the plants by description.

We believe that in making this argument counsel does not give due consideration to the testimony of defendant. It is true that the letters evidencing the written agreement were signed by defendant on the one hand and by Riverbank on the other and not by plaintiff. It is equally true that defendant knew that Riverbank was not purchasing the plants for itself but for tomato growers who would contract to grow tomatoes. While the names of those growers were not known to either party when the letters were written they were known and disclosed to defendant before the plants were delivered. The invoices clearly showed that in the instant case 83,000 plants were sold and delivered to plaintiff which were represented to be San Marzanos and Pearsons. This representation was not true as there were many mongrel plants among them. It is true that Riverbank paid defendant for the plants but in doing this it was merely advancing money for the accounts of the growers.

[1] The conclusion follows that Riverbank was acting as agent for the growers who were undisclosed principals at the time the letters were written but became disclosed and were known to defendant before any deliveries were made. Defendant knew that the plants were to be used by the growers for the particular purpose of raising tomatoes for the market and should have known that the tomatoes were to be grown to be sold to Riverbank for use in its cannery, so, under the provisions of subdivision one of section 1735 of the Civil Code there was "an implied warranty that the goods shall be reasonably fit for such purpose." There was a breach of warranty to the extent of the delivery of the mongrel plants. The plants were sold under the name of "Pearson" and "San Marzano" which are descriptions of two particular varieties of tomatoes so there was "an implied warranty that the goods shall be of merchantable quality." This warranty was breached by the delivery of the mongrel plants. It follows that defendant should respond in damages to plaintiff to the extent he was injured by these breaches of the warranties.

[2] Defendant argues that there is no proper proof of plaintiff's damages to support the judgment. In reply plaintiff points to his own evidence to the effect that he expended $3414.31 in raising and picking the crop, receiving $1717.81 for it, making a net cash loss to him of $1696.50, and his further evidence that the rental value of his land was $1200. He adds these two sums together and maintains that the result supports the judgment of $2054.50 in his favor.

The amount of plaintiff's loss on his crop plus the rental value of his land is not a proper measure of his damages caused by the breaches of warranty by defendant. Section 3300 of the Civil Code provides that the measure of damages for breach of contract shall be "the amount which will compensate the party aggrieved for all the detriment proximately caused thereby, or which, in the ordinary course of things, would be likely to result therefrom."

Section 3358 of the Civil Code provides that "notwithstanding the provisions of this chapter, no person can recover a greater amount in damages for the breach of an obligation than he could have gained by the full performance thereof on both sides," except in certain instances not important here.

Under the usual rule applied in cases of this kind, plaintiff should be entitled to damages in an amount equalling the difference between the amount he would have received for his crop, had there been no breach of warranty, and the amount he did receive. Staub v. Muller, 7 Cal.2d 221, 60 P.2d 283. This amount should reflect the higher picking costs caused by the presence of the mongrel vines as well as the shortage in the amount of crop produced, and should make allowances for the price of $2. per ton he received on Pearsons over the price originally fixed for that variety in his contract with Riverbank which was modified during the picking season.

[3] We have searched the record and have found nothing on which we might base any fairly accurate estimate of the loss suffered by plaintiff by reason of the breach of warranties by defendant. While this is true, no good reason appears why we should set aside the judgment in so far as it fixes liability on defendant for his breaches of warranty. We can reverse the judgment and remand the cause for new trial solely on the issue of the amount of damages. Pretzer v. California Transit Co., 211 Cal. 202, 294 P. 382.

The judgment is reversed and the cause is remanded for a new trial solely upon the issue of the amount of damages, with directions to the trial court to make findings on liability in accordance with the views herein expressed and the evidence already taken, and on the amount of damages in accordance with the evidence to be taken, and enter judgment for plaintiff in that amount.

DEAN v. DYER.

Civ. 2889.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

May 31, 1944.

Hearing Denied July 27, 1944.

1. Physicians and surgeons ⇨18(8)

While expert evidence is usually essential in malpractice cases, it is not necessary where it is common knowledge that thing which happens is of a kind which does not ordinarily occur in absence of negligence on part of physician.

2. Physicians and surgeons ⇨18(8)

Where patient's eye following removal of cataract was in good condition before physician placed in eye a substance which immediately caused a sudden change including loss of sight of the eye, and physician's own testimony showed that atropine allegedly used, or even an infection or iritis would not have had such immediate effect, it was unnecessary to identify the substance used as basis of recovery.

3. Physicians and surgeons ⇨18(8)

Evidence that eye was in good condition following removal of cataract and that immediately after physician put a substance in eye, there was a sudden change including loss of sight in the eye, and that atropine allegedly used, or even an infection or iritis would not have had such effect, made out prima facie case of negligence.

4. Physicians and surgeons ⇨18(8)

In action against physician for malpractice in putting a caustic substance into eye when it was in good condition following cataract removal, causing loss of sight in the eye, evidence that atropine allegedly used, or even an infection or iritis would not have caused such immediate effect, and physician's drastic change of method of treatment sustained jury's finding of negligence.

5. Trial ⇨260(1)

A requested instruction, substance of which was covered by instructions given, was properly refused.

6. Trial ⇨250

General instructions as to direct and indirect evidence and as to inferences and presumptions which were correct statements of the law were not erroneous as inapplicable to the issues.

7. Trial ⇨235(7)

An applicable instruction relative to expert witnesses was not improper because expert testimony came from a party to the action.

8. Physicians and surgeons ⇨18(7)

In malpractice action against physician, testimony of plaintiff's wife that physician told her not to get another doctor and not to take plaintiff to a hospital was properly admitted as relevant and material where testimony was brought out in showing physician's actions and statements immediately after the act with which he was charged.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Gordon Thompson, Judge.

Action by Lewis W. Dean against Louis Q. Dyer for malpractice in treatment of plaintiff's eye. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Monroe & McInnis, of San Diego, for appellant.

Gray, Cary, Ames & Driscoll and Burton D. Wood, all of San Diego, for respondent.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

This is a malpractice action. The defendant practiced medicine in San Diego, specializing in the treatment of the eye. On April 15, 1941, he removed a cataract from the plaintiff's right eye. The operation was apparently successful and on April 20 the plaintiff was discharged from a hospital in San Diego and taken to his home near Escondido, some 40 miles away. The defendant testified that at that time the plaintiff's eye "was all healed, as far as I could see" and that on that date the plaintiff "could see very good" and "quite clearly." The plaintiff returned to the defendant's office for inspection on April 22 and on April 24. This action involves only what happened on the latter occasion.

The action was brought and tried upon the theory that on April 24 the defendant negligently put a caustic or corrosive substance into the plaintiff's eye, with the result that the sight thereof was destroyed. As a defense, the defendant contended that on April 24 he discovered a deep infection in plaintiff's eye which had caused "iritis", that he put nothing in the eye other than atropine, and that the loss of sight was caused by this infection. A jury brought in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff and the defendant has appealed from the judgment.

Appellant's main contention is that the evidence is insufficient to establish any negligence on his part. It is argued that there is no evidence to show that the respondent's eye was not infected when he came to appellant's office on April 24; that the appellant's testimony that the only thing he put into respondent's eye on this occasion was a solution of atropine stands uncontradicted; that there is no evidence justifying an inference that some acid or corrosive substance must have been used; that these were all matters which called for expert testimony; and that the evidence is not sufficient to overcome the explanation made by the appellant.

It cannot be said that the appellant's testimony, to the effect that the condition which developed in the respondent's eye was caused by an infection therein and that nothing but atropine was used on the occasion in question, stands uncontradicted. While he testified that the conditions he found in this eye on April 24 would not be observable to a layman and that he then used nothing but an atropine solution, there is evidence, including statements and conduct on his part, which justified contrary inferences and which raised a substantial conflict in the evidence.

The respondent testified that the doctor inspected his eye on April 22 and said it "was doing fine, healing good and clearing up"; that he could then count the fingers the doctor held up and could see the letters on his chart; that he then had no trouble with this eye, there were no secretions and the bandage remained perfectly dry; that on April 24, when his wife changed the bandage, he could see everything in the kitchen; that on the afternoon of April 24 he went to appellant's office; that the appellant removed the bandage, commented on how well he was doing and remarked that he "believed it was doing as good or better than any eye he had ever operated on"; that he could see things in the office and saw the appellant take up an eyedropper and take something out of a bottle and put in the eye; that it "burned terribly" and he has never been able to see anything with that eye since; that the appellant told him it would quit burning in a few minutes; that the appellant then told him to come back on the 26th and said: "I don't think you will have to come back any more until I can fit you with glasses."

He then testified that on his way home his eye kept burning; that something kept running out of his eye and down on his face; that he kept wiping it off from under his mask; that this substance stung and smarted on his face; that this condition of pain existed all the way home and for a long time afterward; that he arrived home about 4 o'clock and laid down; that it pained pretty bad so he got up and walked the floor; that it was not long before his wife came home and wanted to know what was the matter with him; that he told her "the doctor put some medicine in my eye that burned like fire", and asked her to wash it out; that before she had time to do this someone knocked on the door; that his wife opened the door and the appellant was there; that she asked him "What in the world brings you here?" and the appellant replied: "Something terrible has happened"; that the appellant rushed in, jerked off his coat and threw it on the floor and got out two syringes, telling Mrs. Dean to boil them; that after he had washed his hands the appellant took the bandage off the eye and smelled it; that the bandage was wringing wet; that he told the doctor his eye was blind; that the appellant began working on his eye with a little stick he took from his medicine case; that he then worked something off the eye with the stick and with cotton; that he put the stick, cotton and the bandage in a little paper and put them in his medicine case; that the appellant then washed out his eye with boric acid, using a bulb syringe; that every time he would wash it he would smell it; that after it had been washed three or four times he told the appellant he could stand it no longer; that the appellant told him to let him wash it two or three times and he "would have that stuff all washed out"; that the appellant then gave him a "shot"; that he then suggested to the appellant that perhaps they should have another doctor and that he should go to a hospital; that to each of these suggestions the appellant replied "absolutely no"; that before he left the appellant told him that if he should get worse during the night not to call another doctor but to call him and he would come right out; that before he left the appellant said he would return the next night; that he returned the next morning, however, and also the next night; and that on each of these occasions he attempted to treat this eye.

Mrs. Dean testified that about 12:30 on the 24th she changed the bandage on this eye; that the eye then appeared clear with no cloudiness or redness; that her husband did not then complain of any pain or discomfort in his eye; that when she returned home from her work about 4:30 she found her husband walking the floor and looking pale; that shortly thereafter the appellant appeared at the door; that in response to her inquiry as to what brought him he stated "Oh, something terrible has happened"; that he asked for hot water and sterilized some syringes; that he removed the bandage, which was dripping wet; that this eye had a film over it, looked white and "just looked cooked"; that there were three or four big red streaks on his cheek which had not been there before and which lasted three or four days; and that the white of the eye had bloodshot threads through it. Her testimony as to what the appellant then did is about the same as that given by her husband. She further testified that while the appellant was forcing boric acid water into the eye she told him he was opening the incision, and that he replied: "That is the way I want it"; that the appellant stated he had inquired his way to the Dean house at the drug store; that when he was preparing to give her husband a "shot" she heard the appellant swearing and asked him what it was about and he replied: "I am so sorry this happened"; that when the appellant returned the next morning he brought "lots of medicine", including seven bottles and a box of pills; that the eye then looked "white, just cooked, and the incision was wide open"; that the appellant returned again about 4:30 that day; and that the appellant directed that Mr. Dean be kept in a dark room where he remained for 65 days.

A neighbor who had taken respondent to the appellant's office on April 24, testified that on the trip there the respondent was in good spirits, laughed and talked and complained of no pain or discomfort; that on the trip home he had little to say, appeared to be in agony and kept wiping under his eyes; and that she was present at the Dean home when the appellant came on the evening of the 25th. When asked how the eye looked at that time she replied: "Well, where the white is it was all red and the blue part was like—oh, the best I could describe it, like a poached egg that has that scum over it."

In his deposition, the appellant testified that when the respondent came to his office on April 24, he found the bandage "pretty dirty" and the eye "pretty red and inflamed". When examined at the trial he did not mention any dirty bandage but said he found evidences of an infection which would not be visible to a layman, that he was then "alarmed", and that he then "envisioned the possibility of the loss of the eye." This is contradicted by the casual manner in which he told the respondent to come to the office for a final inspection two days later, if the respondent's evidence is to be believed. The fact that the appellant made a sudden trip to the respondent's home 40 miles away, where he had not previously been, arriving approximately half an hour after the respondent reached there, is significant. The appellant's explanation of this was that he had given the respondent instructions as to treatment for the eye but that he was not sure that he had given complete instructions. In view of the other evidence, this explanation is not entirely satisfactory. The appellant also testified that while inspecting the eye on April 24 he found an infection which constituted "iritis". He outlined the treatment for "iritis" and stated that "an eye with iritis must be handled rather gently." He also testified that he had never seen a case of iritis where a person lost his vision instantaneously. The treatment he outlined did not include the drastic washing out which was done immediately after his arrival at the Dean home on the 24th, as testified to by the other witnesses and confirmed by the appellant himself. There were a number of other inconsistencies and contradictions in the appellant's testimony which need not be enumerated, but which contributed to the existing conflict in the evidence. There was also some conflict with respect to the shape and appearance of some of the bottles which were on the appellant's tray when he inspected respondent's eye on April 24th. The appellant further testified that the solution of atropine, which he said he used on this occasion, would not cause the result which seems to have immediately followed.

[1-4] It would serve no useful purpose to review the many cases cited. While expert evidence is usually essential in malpractice cases it is well settled that this is not necessary where it is common knowledge that the thing which happens is of a kind which does not ordinarily occur in the absence of negligence upon the part of the actor. In such cases, the question of negligence may be decided upon the general circumstances as shown by the evidence and in the light of common experience. Barham v. Widing, 210 Cal. 206, 291 P. 173; Ales v. Ryan, 8 Cal.2d 82, 64 P.2d 409. Under the circumstances appearing here it was unnecessary to identify the substance which was put in the respondent's eye on April 24th. Ley v. Bishopp, 88 Cal.App. 313, 263 P. 369; Gunning v. Cooley, 281 U.S. 90, 50 S.Ct. 231, 74 L.Ed. 720. No expert evidence was needed to demonstrate that something unusual happened. It was fully shown that the respondent's eye was in good condition before this substance was placed in it and that immediately afterward a sudden change took place, including the loss of sight in the eye. The appellant's own evidence is to the effect that atropine, which he said he used, would not have had that effect and that even an infection or iritis would not have had that immediate effect. The evidence justifies an inference that some caustic substance was used and this is emphasized by the appellant's actions in very shortly thereafter hurrying to the respondent's home and in making unusual efforts to wash something out of the eye, and by what he there said. This, and the other evidence, would fully justify the inference that a mistake was made and that some harmful substance was put in this eye, and was sufficient to make out a prima facie case of negligence. The doctor's explanation was unsatisfactory in many ways and did not reasonably explain the sudden change which had taken place in this eye, the drastic change in his method of treatment or his greatly increased efforts to meet what could reasonably be interpreted as an entirely different situation which had arisen. The questions of fact presented were for the jury and the evidence is sufficient to sustain its finding.

What we have already said answers the appellant's second contention that since there was no competent evidence of negligence the court erred in permitting the verdict to stand.

[5-7] It is next contended that the court erred in refusing to give an instruction to the general effect that the question of the character and suitability of the substance used by the appellant on the occasion in question must be determined upon the testimony of expert witnesses. Nothing further need be said in this connection. Also, that the court erred in refusing to give a requested instruction upon the burden of proof. The substance thereof was fully covered in other instructions. It is further argued that the court erred in giving certain general instructions as to direct and indirect evidence and as to inferences and presumptions. While it is conceded that these were correct statements of the law it is claimed that they were not applicable to the issues and that by giving them the court permitted the jury to infer that the appellant had been guilty of malpractice, basing such inference upon speculation and conjecture and with no competent testimony to support any such conclusion. This contention is without merit. It is also urged that the court erred in giving an instruction relative to expert witnesses. While it is admitted that the instruction was correct in itself it is argued that it was inapplicable here because, while the appellant gave his expert opinion on certain matters, there was no conflict in the expert evidence, and because the effect of the instruction was to single out testimony of the appellant and apply the rules of law to only one witness. There was some expert testimony and the fact that it came from a party to the action could not make an applicable instruction improper, and no possible prejudice appears.

[8,9] It is next contended that the court erred in permitting the respondent's wife to testify that the appellant told them not to get another doctor and not to take the respondent to a hospital, and that it also erred in requiring the appellant to testify as an expert witness when called under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure. With respect to the first two of these matters the only argument is that they were not within the issues. This testimony was brought out in showing the actions and statements of the appellant immediately after the act with which he was charged, and was properly admitted as being both relevant and material. The contention that the appellant could not be required to testify as an expert when called under section 2055 has now been decided to the contrary. Lawless v. Calaway, 24 Cal.2d 81, 147 P.2d 604.

[10] The final contention is that the amount of the judgment is excessive. The jury returned a verdict for $17,360. In connection with a motion for a new trial, and with the consent of the respondent, this amount was reduced to $8500. It is argued that this amount is excessive because, while the operation to remove the cataract was apparently successful, it does not necessarily appear that the respondent would have enjoyed the sight of this eye regardless of what happened on April 24, and because it does not necessarily appear that the respondent has permanently lost the sight in this eye since he brought in no expert witness to testify to this effect.

The evidence justifies the inference that the operation had been successful and that the respondent would have had a reasonable use of this eye if the event of April 24 had not occurred. It appears that the respondent has been totally blind in that eye since that occurrence and there is evidence that on June 20, 1941, the appellant expressed the opinion that this eye was "dead" and that he would never see out of it again. The appellant did not dispute this at the trial but then stated that he could not be certain that sight could not be restored without performing a surgical operation for the purpose of ascertaining the exact condition of the eye. The respondent was 55 years old at the time of the injury, he suffered pain for weeks, was kept in a dark room for 65 days and he has lost the sight of the eye. There is some evidence justifying the inference that this loss will be permanent and from the record before us it cannot be held that the amount of the judgment is such as to indicate that it was the result of passion or prejudice.

The judgment is affirmed.

In business invitee's action for injuries sustained from fall on sloping and slippery sidewalk at entrance to premises occupied by defendant, evidence supported findings that the sidewalk was in a slippery and unfit condition for use.

4. Negligence ⇐135

In business invitee's action for injuries sustained from fall on sloping slippery sidewalk as invitee emerged from entrance to premises occupied by defendant, invitee's testimony that, as she approached door to leave the premises, she was looking at her automobile and had the business in mind she had been talking to defendant's secretary-treasurer about, was not sufficient to warrant a finding of contributory negligence.

5. Appeal and error ⇐1170(10)

In action for injuries sustained from fall on sloping and slippery sidewalk, where finding upon issue of contributory negligence of necessity under the evidence would have been adverse to defendant-appellant, court's omission to make a finding did not result in a miscarriage of justice. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carl A. Stutsman, Judge.

Action by Jennie Massing against Claire Delano Babcock and Los Angeles National Farm Loan Association for personal injuries. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, second-named defendant appeals.

Judgment affirmed and order dismissed.

Floyd E. Pendell, of El Monte, for appellant.

Lyons & Lyons, Harry Lyons, and David Lyons, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, Presiding Justice.

This is an appeal by defendant Los Angeles Farm Loan Association from a judgment awarding damages to plaintiff on account of personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by her when she fell on the sidewalk as she emerged from the entrance to premises occupied by said defendant. An appeal is also taken from "the ruling of the court upon the motion for a new trial made upon October 29, 1943, which motion was decided in favor of the plaintiff on said date."

The premises in front of which respondent fell are located at 2319 Huntington Drive, San Marino, California, and consist of a one story building. In front of said building is a five foot cement sidewalk which was laid before the building was constructed. The north edge of this sidewalk is parallel with and thirty inches equidistant from the front line of the building. When the building was constructed said thirty inch strip, which runs along the entire front of the building, was laid with cement and converted into an additional sidewalk. However, the floor level of the building being approximately four inches higher than the level of the five foot cement sidewalk, the thirty inch strip has a gradual slope upward from said sidewalk to the building. Ten days before the accident occurred, drill holes or marks had been made by an officer of the association with a Star drill in the cement ramp or incline, "from the top of the incline to the bottom of the incline."

On August 26, 1942, respondent Jennie Massing, accompanied by her son, Louis Massing, went to the office of appellant to obtain information respecting a parcel of real estate for the purchase of which said respondent was negotiating and against which appellant held an incumbrance. Because respondent's son, Louis Massing, was employed, the Massings were unable to call at appellant's office during business hours, and by previous telephonic arrangement, they arrived there at about six o'clock in the afternoon of the day mentioned, for a conference with Mr. Mann, Secretary-Treasurer of appellant association. The Massings waited for about forty-five minutes for Mr. Mann, who lived near by, and upon the latter's arrival he opened the office door from the inside and the Massings entered the office. After half or three-quarters of an hour the Massings prepared to leave: Mr. Massing opened the door for his mother, who proceeded him through the doorway. She took a step and then took a second step when she slipped and fell on the slope or incline. Mr. Massing called to Mr. Mann for help and, according to Mr. Massing's testimony, Mr. Mann came out "stood there a second, and he took one look at her and he said, 'My God, I was afraid something like this would happen'. And between the two of us, we carried her back to the office and sat her in a chair." Mr. Mann called a doctor at the request of Mr. Massing, and the doctor took respondent to his office. Upon examination it was found that respondent had sustained a bimalleolar fracture of the right ankle with outward and lateral displacement of the ankle joint.

Appellant contends that the "judgment is based primarily upon two findings of fact as follows: (1) '* * * that it is true that immediately adjacent to said doorway defendant Los Angeles National Farm Loan Association maintained an extraordinarily slippery decline immediately to the south of said doorway * * ' (2) ' * * The Court further finds that the defendant Los Angeles National Farm Loan Association permitted said entrance way to remain and exist in a dangerous, improper and unfit state and condition, to be used, traversed and walked upon, * * * and that as a result thereof a nuisance was created and maintained by said defendant.' " And it is urged that since the evidence upon which said findings are based is inherently improbable, weak and unsatisfactory as a matter of law, it is insufficient to support them. In this connection, appellant argues that the only evidence which might support said findings is that of Louis Massing, son of respondent, who testified that he ran his hand over the cement and the walk and that it was definitely slippery; and that other uncontradicted evidence not only disproves this testimony but brands it as inherently improbable, if not physically impossible.

The witness Walker, an architect of thirty years' experience, after testifying that he examined the property in question for the first time on July 22, 1943, nearly a year after the accident occurred, was asked: "And Mr. Walker, at the time you examined the building what was the condition of what I term the threshold, being that portion of the entrance to the building between the sidewalk and the level, or near the level, cement entrance, to the door—what was the condition of that?" After objection to the question was overruled by the trial court because the witness "can give me as an expert, some knowledge", the witness Walker replied:

"I would have to say it was slippery. However, it was interrupted with abrasions apparently made with a diamond drill, that should have made it reasonably safe. If I may amplify a bit: It was a steel trowel cement job, which always leaves a slippery surface unless an abrasive is used—the surface is slippery, but if it had perforations in it, it (they) should have been adequate to make it non-slippery. * * *

"By the Court: Mr. Walker, occasionally contractors sometimes use a dust or something that will give a concrete sidewalk a different shade or color, do they not? A. That is correct. * * *

"Q. Was that done as you saw this property? A. No, apparently it was not. It was apparently merely a steel trowel job, which means it has a very even, very smooth surface.

"Q. It could have been done so as to leave the surface rough? A. Yes, they use a wood trowel on the concrete to leave a rough surface.

"Q. They didn't do that in this case? A. They didn't but substituted, apparently, in lieu, the transverse marks which were made apparently with a diamond drill."

Mr. Mann testified that he had placed 200 holes in the cement approach to the building with a Star drill sometime prior to the date of respondent's fall and that subsequent thereto additional abrasions were made on that particular piece of cement. Also that no one had complained to him prior to August 26, 1942, of the improper condition of the entrance to said building. In his deposition taken prior to trial, the witness Mann testified that he examined the incline "within a day or two afterwards. I put this rubber mat outside."

[1-3] It is well settled that the relative weight to be given to the opinion testimony and factual evidence, hereinbefore recited, is for the trial court. Universal Sales Corp. v. Cal., Etc., Mfg. Co., 20 Cal.2d 751, 766, 128 P.2d 665; Neel v. Mannings, Inc., 19 Cal.2d 647, 654, 122 P.2d 576; Shaw v. Owl Drug Co., 4 Cal. App.2d 191, 196, 40 P.2d 588. From such testimony, together with the inferences that could have been drawn therefrom respecting the smooth or slippery condition of the incline, it became a question of fact for the trial court to determine whether or not said incline was slippery at the time of respondent's fall. And the fact that the first of the findings complained of used the words "extraordinarily slippery" in describing the incline or ramp, while the evidence described it as "very, very smooth" and "definitely slippery", is probably due to the fact that appellant's counsel in questioning the witness Walker used the word "extraordinarily" at least twice. At any rate, the record reveals evidence sufficiently substantial in character to support the findings of fact referred to.

Appellant also urges as a ground for reversal of the judgment the trial court's failure to make a finding of fact on the issue of contributory negligence of respondent which was raised by the answer. It is contended that the following testimony of respondent is sufficient to sustain such issue, to-wit:

"Q. As you approached the door, did you have occasion to look in front of you? Well, I will change that. Where were you looking as you approached that door? A. I was looking at my car—the car was parked in front of the door, and I still had the business in mind that I was talking to Mr. Mann about."

[4] The evidence pointed out by appellant is not sufficient to sustain a finding of contributory negligence on the part of respondent, because she did not fall as she approached the door, but after she had walked through it, her testimony being to the effect that as she looked out toward her car she observed the appearance of the sidewalk and the ramp which "looked level" and that she walked out, took two steps and fell.

[5] In the circumstances, a finding upon the issue of contributory negligence of necessity would have been adverse to appellant, consequently the omission to make such finding may be disregarded since such omission did not result in a miscarriage of justice. Const. Art. VI, sec. 4½. See, also, Niles v. Louis H. Rapoport & Sons, 53 Cal.App.2d 644, 651, 128 P.2d 50, and authorities there cited.

For the reasons stated, the judgment is affirmed. The appeal from the order denying motion for new trial is dismissed.

BECKHAM et al. v. STATE et al.
Civ. 6894; Sac. 5565.District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

May 24, 1944.

Hearing Denied July 20, 1944.

1. Highways §86Municipal corporations §665

The owner of property fronting on a street or highway has, as appurtenant thereto, certain private easements in street in front of or adjacent to property as distinguished from right of passing to and fro which he enjoys in common with the public.

2. Eminent domain §105, 106Municipal corporations §665, 669

Property which an abutting owner has in street in front of his land is right of access and of light and air, and for an infringement of such right he is entitled to compensation.

3. Eminent domain §106

The word "cul-de-sac", within meaning of rule that owner of property fronting on street which has become a cul-de-sac by reason of a street improvement is entitled to compensation as an invasion of right of access, is a passage or place with only one outlet, or a way, street, or alley open only at one end, a blind alley.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Cul-de-sac".

4. Municipal corporations §669

The right of access of an owner of property fronting on a street extends in both directions to next intersecting street, and any inconveniences which may be suffered or hazards encountered thereafter do not affect his easement.

5. Eminent domain §300

Evidence, as to manner in which subway to effect railroad grade preparation was constructed on street intersecting street on which plaintiffs' properties front, indicated that plaintiffs suffered an inconvenience, but did not warrant finding that street on which plaintiffs' properties front became practically a cul-de-sac and did not authorize recovery for any alleged injury to plaintiffs' property.

6. Eminent domain §102

The necessity for circuitry of travel by reason of construction of improvement on street intersecting street on which plaintiffs' properties front, in absence of anything barring access to intersecting street, does not furnish a basis for recovery of damages.

7. Municipal corporations §665

The property rights of owner of land fronting on street do not embrace a right to protection from hazards of traffic and owner must share such hazards with general public.

8. Eminent domain §295

Where street improvement was designed and constructed according to best engineering thought of time and to lessen traffic hazards, court could not assume that such hazards were increased in absence of testimony to that effect.

9. Eminent domain §100(1)

An award of damages cannot be recovered for every depreciation in value of property by reason of a public street improvement.

10. Eminent domain §100(1)

A property owner, to recover damages by reason of a street improvement, must show infringement of his right of reasonable use of street fronting property in either direction to next intersection.

11. Eminent domain §91

Inconvenience and hazards, which property owners may encounter by reason of street improvements after leaving street on which their properties front, constitute damage of same kind as that shared by general public and furnish no basis for recovery of compensation.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; M. G. Woodward, Judge.

Action by Noble N. Beckham and others against the State of California, Department of Public Works, and the City of Stockton for damages allegedly sustained by plaintiffs' properties as the result of a construction of an improvement on a street intersecting a street on which plaintiffs' properties front. From a judgment for plaintiffs, the State appeals.

Reversed.

C. C. Carleton, Frank B. Durkee, C. R. Montgomery and Robert E. Reed, all of Sacramento, for appellant.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., and Everett W. Mattoon and Chas. W. Johnson, Deputy Attys. Gen., amici curiae.

Charles H. Vance and James C. Nichols, both of Stockton, for respondent.

Joseph C. Tope, of Stockton, for defendant City of Stockton.

ADAMS, Presiding Justice.

This is an action brought by five owners of property abutting on East Worth Street in Stockton, to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by them as the result of the construction of an improvement in Wilson Way, a street which intersects East Worth Street at one end of the block in which plaintiffs' properties are situated.

As appears from the map made a part of this opinion, Wilson Way runs approximately north and south. East Worth Street runs at right angles thereto, and the block in which plaintiffs' property is situated is bounded by Wilson Way on the west, Eugenia Street on the east, and Milton Way on the south. Eugenia Street is a short street extending two blocks, from East Worth Street to East Anderson Street, and the latter street intersects Wilson Way at a point just south of the point of commencement of the improvement thereon. The next street parallel to East Worth Street on the north is Taylor Street upon which are situated the tracks of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Company. The next street parallel to Wilson Way on the west is Sierra Nevada Street which is intersected by Taylor, East Worth and East Anderson Streets, all of which extend across Wilson Way. The next street beyond Sierra Nevada Street is Ophir (or Pilgrim) Street, referred to in the testimony but not shown on the map.

In the year 1937 the State of California, acting through its Department of Public Works, and under the authority of the Railroad Commission, constructed a subway in Wilson Way for the purpose of eliminating the grade crossing of the railroad tracks on Taylor Street. The depressed portion of this underpass begins at a point between East Worth Street and Milton Way, but a concrete curb along the center of the subway begins just north of the intersection of East Anderson Street and Wilson Way.

As a part of this street improvement defendants widened Wilson Way between East Anderson Street on the south and East Hazelton Street on the north beyond the railroad tracks, as appears on the map. The former width of Wilson Way (48 feet) is indicated by its present width south of East Anderson Street, and north of East Hazelton Avenue. No changes were made in East Worth Street, which now, as formerly, intersects Wilson Way at grade; but after the construction of the underpass, crossing of the railroad tracks at grade northward on Wilson Way was cut off by the erection of a parapet as shown on the map. East Worth, Milton and East Anderson Streets are all 24 feet in width between curbs, Eugenia Street has a width of 30 feet, the portion of Wilson Way on either side of the subway between Taylor and Milton Streets is 30.3 feet to the sidewalk, and the portion of the street that crosses the subway is 39 feet in width. All of these streets are paved and have sidewalks. East Worth extends easterly beyond Eugenia Street to "B" Street, but its distance therefrom is 1750 feet. As appears upon the map, "B" Street extends north and south from Worth Street, and crosses the tracks of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Company, but said street is improved only to a secondary extent. A portion, only 15 feet, of Taylor Street is paved where it extends west from Wilson Way across Sierra Nevada Street to Ophir Street. Its grade is the same as the portion of Wilson Way over the subway with which it connects.

The properties of all defendants abut only upon East Worth Street. The triangular shape of the lot which separates the Beckham property from Wilson Way is due to the taking by the state of a portion of a lot which previously occupied the corner, for the purpose of widening Wilson Way as a part of the improvement thereof. The tract in which plaintiffs' homes are located is zoned for residential purposes only.

Plaintiffs, in their amended complaint allege that Wilson Way is the main traffic artery in the easterly part of Stockton connecting the area within which their property is located with the business district, and forms a part of U. S. Highway No. 99; "that there is no ingress or egress from Plaintiffs' said property to any highway or public street in the City of Stockton except over Wilson Way"; that by reason of its access from Worth Street to Wilson Way plaintiffs' property was valuable and suitable for residence purposes prior to the acts of defendants; that in constructing the underpass defendants built the side walls of same "across the intersection of Wilson Way with Worth Street in such a manner as to cut off Plaintiffs' said real property from access to Wilson Way;" that plaintiffs, since said construction, "have been forced to reach their said property over a narrow, unsafe, and impracticable detour leading from Wilson Way over the top and sides of said underpass to Worth Street, and have thereby been cut off from safe or reasonable access to the public streets of Stockton." The value of plaintiffs' properties is alleged to have been depreciated "solely by reason of the construction of said underpass, and the cutting off of said access to Wilson Way and the public system of streets."

The case was tried by the court sitting without a jury and resulted in a judgment for plaintiffs. The court filed a written opinion and in its findings of fact found that Wilson Way is the main traffic artery in the portion of Stockton in which plaintiffs' properties are located and constitutes the main trunk artery of traffic connecting said portion of the city with the business district and with public travel over state highway No. 4, and Highway 99, of which it forms a part; that at the time plaintiffs purchased their property East Worth Street intersected the main traveled portion of Wilson Way at grade, and that plaintiffs had a ready, free and safe access from Worth Street to the general system of streets of the city and the highway system, and that by reason of local conditions existing in said area Wilson Way "constituted the only reasonably safe, adequate, reasonable and adequate access to the general system of streets." Also, that the State constructed said underpass "so that the sidewalls thereof shut off East Worth Street from Wilson Way; and that after the construction thereof the plaintiffs' real property was and is cut off from access to Wilson Way and to the general system of streets of the City of Stockton, except by a narrow, unsafe, personally hazardous, tortuous, and inadequate detour or bypass leading from Worth Street and plaintiffs' said real property to the top of said underpass above Wilson Way, and thence by a narrow unsafe and personally hazardous detour into Wilson Way. That it is also possible for plaintiffs to reach their real property (but not to emerge from it) by continuing along Wilson Way through said underpass until the same returns to the original grade of Wilson Way at a point several hundred feet south of plaintiffs' said real property, and there making a left turn against traffic to the east on to a side street which connects with East Worth Street. That Wilson Way is a heavily travelled trunk highway and traffic is very fast, and that said left turn can only be made at great personal hazard to any person making the same, and said left turn has been at all times and now is prohibited by local law.* That by reason of said conditions the plaintiffs' real property has sustained a damage other than and differing from that sustained by the general public, and that the same is not a mere inconvenience, but a damage peculiar to said real property and to said plaintiffs and differing in kind from that sustained by the general public. That the said real property has been cut off from reasonable access to the public streets of Stockton and the State of California, and that the remaining access is not reasonable, nor safe, but is unreasonable and hazardous to the life and limb of any person residing on said property, who attempts to travel the streets of Stockton, and that plaintiffs' easement of access to Worth Street has thereby been unreasonably and peculiarly impaired by the construction of said underpass; and that as a result thereof the plaintiffs' said real property has been depreciated in market value, and rendered practically unsalable, because the same has been left in what is, from the standpoint of reasonable access, a virtual cul-de-sac."

Defendant State of California has appealed, contending that no injury to any property right of plaintiffs has been shown, and that the findings with respect to the alleged damage and the judgment based thereon are without support in the evidence.

The case was argued before this court prior to the decision of the Supreme Court in Bacich v. Board of Control, 144 P.2d 818, and our decision was deferred pending a determination of that case. After its determination we heard further argument, at which time respondents asserted that they rely on the proposition that the construction of the subway on Wilson Way has made a cul-de-sac of Worth Street and that, therefore, on the authority of the Bacich case alone, it follows that the judgment in their favor must be affirmed.

From the findings above set forth and from the opinion filed by the trial court it appears that that court concluded that Worth Street has not been entirely closed by the subway but that it has, in effect, become a cul-de-sac because plaintiffs must now follow a more circuitous route than formerly in going to and from their homes, and, in pursuing such course they encounter certain so-called hazards which it says are "peculiar to plaintiffs because they are exposed more frequently thereto than the

* There is no evidence that this left-hand turn has been or is prohibited by local law. As appears from the map, there is, in the center of the highway in front of the intersection of Wilson Way and East Anderson Street, a sign reading "Keep to the right," but said sign does not prohibit a left-hand turn into East Anderson Street by persons going south on Wilson Way, but only applies to northbound traffic.

general public," and that, therefore, plaintiffs' easement of access in Worth Street has been damaged to an extent justifying the recovery of damages.

Appellant contends that such conclusion of the trial court is not sound as matter of law and that factually it is not sustained by the evidence.

[1,2] Preliminarily, then, the nature and extent of the property rights of plaintiffs as abutting owners on Worth Street must be defined and delimited. In Rose v. State of California, 19 Cal.2d 713, 123 P.2d 505, it was held that the property right which an abutting owner has in the street in front of his land is the right of access and of light and air; that it is an easement which such abutting owner has to the use of the street fronting upon his lot for the purpose of ingress and egress, which right attaches to the lot itself, and which is peculiar and individual to the abutting owner, differing from the right of passing to and fro which he enjoys in common with the general public. In the Bacich case, supra, the extent of that easement was under consideration, and it was there held that such abutting owner's easement is more extensive than the mere opportunity to go onto the street immediately in front of his property, and that "the right of access extends in both directions to the next intersecting street." [144 P.2d 825.] And because in that case access to Sterling Street upon which Bacich's property abutted was cut off at one end of the block by the lowering of Harrison Street, the next intersecting street in one direction, and plaintiffs' property was thus left in a cul-de-sac, it was held that his easement of access to his property on Sterling Street had been impaired.

As above stated, plaintiffs in the case before us rely upon the decision in the Bacich case, contending that because the improvement on Wilson Way prevents their immediate access to the subway portion of Wilson Way from Worth Street, and, in order to gain access to such subway portion, or otherwise to reach the general system of streets of the city, plaintiffs must pursue a circuitous course which course presents certain hazards, Worth Street has, in effect, become a cul-de-sac, and the easement of access which attaches to plaintiffs' lots on Worth Street has been damaged.

[3] A cul-de-sac is defined to be "a passage or place with only one outlet, as a blind alley . * * ." (Webster's New International Dictionary); "A way, street or alley open only at one end" Ballantine's Law Dictionary; 10 Words and Phrases, Perm.Ed., 633; 25 C.J.S., Cul De Sac, p. 20.

[4] Obviously the improvement on Wilson Way does not close the end of Worth Street since that street intersects at grade the outer portion of Wilson Way, which portion is 30.3 feet in width. May it then be held that despite this fact plaintiffs' easement in Worth Street has been impaired? To so hold would, we believe, necessitate a definite extension of the abutting owner's right of access as defined in the Bacich case; for what the court there held was only that such abutting owner's right extends in both directions to the next intersecting street. The language there used by the court and the authorities cited suggest that such easement does not embrace more than the right to pass into such next intersecting street, and that any inconveniences which may be suffered or hazards encountered thereafter do not affect the easement of such property owner. See 4 McQuillan, Municipal Corporations, 2nd Ed., sec. 1527; Lewis on Eminent Domain, 3rd Ed., sec. 191, cited in Bacich case, 144 P.2d at page 824. This construction of the language of the court is consistent with its language in City of San Mateo v. Railroad Commission, 9 Cal.2d 1, 11, 68 P.2d 713, 718, where it is said: "We therefore assume that property other than that of the railroad company does not directly abut upon any of the area directed to be closed, and that the private property in question is contiguous to either the county or the state highways which are connected by such public crossings. If such be the case, no obstruction to the ingress and egress from those highways has been created by the order of the commission." While the foregoing may have been dictum it is, nevertheless, persuasive in construing subsequent language of the court. In the Bacich case in the District Court of Appeal, 128 P.2d 191, 197, Mr. Justice Peters said that: "The right of the property owner is limited to access and use of the street upon which his property fronts to the next intersection in either direction. Property owners beyond that point have suffered no damage different from that suffered by the general public." Also in that case one of the alleged grounds for recovery was that in approaching plaintiff's property from

Bryant Street, the next intersecting street at the opposite end of the block, it was necessary to pass under one of the approaches to the bridge; but the Supreme Court said (page 826 of 144 P.2d) that "it does not appear that the elevated road between plaintiff's property and Bryant Street in any way interferes with his access to the latter street or impairs any easement, if one exists, to light, air or view."

In Rose v. State of California, supra, the improvement in the street upon which plaintiff's property abutted was similar to that upon Wilson Way. As we read that opinion the impairment of plaintiff's easement of ingress or egress was based upon the fact that the portion of the highway left available for plaintiff's use immediately in front of his property (said property being zoned for commercial purposes) was but 14 feet in width and too narrow for two vehicles to pass each other; and there is no suggestion that had such lane been 30.3 feet in width, as are the portions of Wilson Way on either side of the subway, a finding of impairment of plaintiff's easement would have found support in the evidence. And there is certainly nothing in that case suggesting that had the improvement there under consideration been on one of the streets intersecting Jackson Street, any property right of plaintiff would have been invaded. Also, the court there said (page 731 of 19 Cal.2d., page 516 of 123 P.2d) that: "Since every property owner for a great distance therefrom is somewhat inconvenienced by the closing of street, the question of where to stop awarding damages is not only difficult to ascertain, but the payment of damages in every case of this character would place a great burden upon the public whenever such closings are ordered."

In view of the foregoing this court is not disposed to extend the easement of access of an abutting owner beyond the limits defined in the Bacich case, or to hold that the easement of access which an abutting owner on Worth Street has in that street extends beyond the intersection of same with the streets at either end of the block.

[5] Nor do we think that the evidence sustains the finding of the trial court that the construction of the improvement on Wilson Way has resulted in other than inconvenience to plaintiffs, or that any damage they may have sustained differs from that sustained by the general public, or that their means of access have been thereby rendered unreasonable or hazardous. In support of their complaints plaintiffs called Roy S. Akers, an employee of the State Department of Public Works, under whose direction the map herewith (Plaintiffs' Ex. No. 1) was prepared, and who explained same. This witness was asked by plaintiffs' counsel to state how he would now go from plaintiffs' property to the Court House, and stated that one way would be to go from East Worth Street into Wilson Way, thence north on Wilson Way, crossing over the top of the subway, follow Taylor Street west for two blocks (to Ophir Street), then turn north across the railroad tracks and onto Main Street, then westerly to the Court House; and that in returning (he might go south on 'Wilson Way through the subway, then turn east onto the surface area near East Anderson Street, and thence north on the outer portion of Wilson Way to Worth Street. Also that one going to the Court House from Worth Street could turn north on Wilson Way, cross the subway to the west side of Wilson Way, turn thence south to Anderson Street, and there join the northbound traffic through the subway. Also, leaving the property on Worth Street he could go east to Eugenia south to East Anderson, and thence west to Wilson Way and onto the northbound traffic. To go south on Wilson Way he could go around on Wilson Way over the subway, then south on the west side of Wilson Way, thus fitting into the traffic going south. The only other witnesses called by plaintiffs who testified in regard to the effect of the improvement were Mr. Chadek, called as a valuation witness, and plaintiff Zakel. The former testified that plaintiffs' properties had been decreased in value by reason of the construction of the subway, because it is less convenient to get to it, that the difference is that "you could not go or come directly from your property—that you have to go around." Plaintiff Zakel said that he drove a car and that before the subway was built he used to go out on Worth Street to Wilson Way, and when he came back would cross the traffic on Wilson Way and enter Worth Street; that since the construction he has to make ten extra blocks each day; that now he usually goes east on Worth Street, south on Eugenia, and, if going down town, goes over Milton Street to the entrance of the subway; that coming home he comes through the west side of the subway to East Anderson, crosses the traffic there and travels on Anderson Street and then Eugenia Street to Worth Street. Also that there is another way (to go north) and that is to go up Wilson Way, cross the subway and follow Taylor to Ophir and cross the railroad tracks on Ophir; but that Taylor is a "fierce" street, narrow and full of chuck holes; also that if he should go from Worth Street to "B" Street and thence north "there is not the proper outlet" because of poor condition of the streets and the fact that freight trains are sometimes left on the tracks for hours. He admitted that before the subway was built he had to make a left-hand turn across traffic if he was going south, and when going north over Wilson Way had to cross the railroad tracks at grade, and that there were frequent train movements there and "quite frequently" he was held up by trains; also that assuming he went through the subway that would be "a safer traffic then before." When asked: "Well, the only reason why your property has decreased as you claim, in your opinion, is that it is more inconvenient to get to your property now than it was before?" he answered, "Yes, sir; the subway is no asset to me."

No witness testified to any hazards or that the routes to be followed after leaving Worth Street were dangerous. On the contrary, J. W. Vickery, safety engineer for the Division of Highways of the State, called by defendant, testified that the surface roadway of Wilson Way and the depressed portion of the subway are adequate and safe for existing traffic, that the improvement was constructed in conformity with the latest engineering thought on such subways, that the portion of the roadway crossing the depressed portion of the subway serves the purpose of getting traffic from one side of Wilson Way to the other and to permit north and south traffic to avoid crossing the railroad tracks at grade. On cross-examination by plaintiffs' counsel he testified to various methods by which residents on East Worth Street can get into the subway, stating they can go around by Eugenia and Milton or East Anderson Streets, or they can make the U turn over the subway if they desire to go south and thence feed directly into the traffic—that they can now avoid crossing the traffic lanes; that the situation is no more hazardous than it was before; that formerly a driver who wanted to go south from Worth Street had to cross the tracks and then make a U turn over a narrow way.

The testimony of these witnesses and an inspection of the map (Plaintiffs' Ex. 1) show that if plaintiffs desire to go northward from their places of residence they may (1) go west on East Worth Street to Wilson Way, turn north thereon over the level portion thereon (30.3 feet in width) to the portion thereof crossing the subway, there turn west across the portion over subway (39 feet wide) and thence either (a) west over Taylor Street to Ophir (Pilgrim) Street and thence north to the main part of the city, or (b) turn south on the level portion of Wilson Way west of the subway and southward to the intersection of East Anderson Street and Wilson Way where they can cross the southbound traffic and join the northbound traffic through the subway; or (2) they can travel eastward on East Worth Street to Eugenia Street (30 feet wide), thence south to East Anderson (or Milton), thence west to Wilson Way where they can join the northbound traffic through the subway. If they desire to go southward from their places of residence they may (1) follow the latter way and cross the northbound traffic on Wilson Way to the west lane and thence south, or (2) they may go west on East Worth, turn north making the U turn over the portion of Wilson Way over the subway, and join directly the southbound traffic on Wilson Way. By pursuing the latter course they now avoid crossing the traffic, while formerly if they desired to go southward after arriving at the intersection of Wilson Way and East Worth Street it was necessary, by reason of a traffic sign, to go north on Wilson Way over the railroad tracks and make a U turn across traffic at Scotts Avenue or East Hazelton and Wilson Way. Returning from the northern part of the city, plaintiffs may drive south through the west lane of the subway to the intersection of Wilson Way and East Anderson Street, cross the traffic there and proceed to Worth Street either along the easterly portion of Wilson Way or via East Anderson and Eugenia Streets. To be sure this necessitates crossing the northbound traffic on Wilson Way, but it is obvious that this was also necessary prior to the construction of the subway.

[6] Thus analyzed, plaintiffs' situation resolves itself into one of mere circuitry and inconvenience of travel after reaching Wilson Way. Such mere inconvenience and circuitry of travel are held to constitute no grounds for recovery of damages, and we believe that plaintiffs' easement in Worth Street cannot be held to extend to embrace a right, after leaving Worth Street, to pursue the most convenient course from that street to such destinations as they may seek to reach. Where a cul-de-sac is created, access in one direction is lost. Here it is not lost but after reaching one of the next intersecting streets the route to be pursued is merely rendered less convenient. But circuitry of travel beyond an intersecting street does not furnish a basis for recovery of damages. People v. Ricciardi, Cal.Sup., 144 P.2d 799 at page 805; Rose v. State of California, supra, 19 Cal.2d at page 737, 123 P.2d 505; 49 A.L.R. 333; 93 A.L.R. 639; Hitch v. Scholle, 180 Cal. 467, 470, 181 P. 657.

[7,8] Nor do plaintiffs' property rights embrace a right to protection from hazards of traffic. These they share with the general public, and where, as here, the improvement was designed and constructed according to the best engineering thought of the time, and to lessen traffic hazards, it cannot be assumed that such hazards have been increased, especially in the absence of testimony to that effect, and where the safety engineer of the State Highway Division testified that the surface roadway of Wilson Way is adequate and safe, and that the situation is no more hazardous than it was before. We are not unmindful of the fact that the trial judge inspected the premises and that his findings allege that "plaintiffs' property is cut off from access to Wilson Way and to the general system of streets * * * except by a narrow, unsafe, personally hazardous, tortuous and inadequate detour or by-pass leading from Worth Street * * * to the top of the underpass over Wilson Way, and thence by a narrow, unsafe and personally hazardous detour into Wilson Way"; but we can find no support in the testimony for such a finding and it is inconsistent with the situation shown by plaintiffs' map. None of plaintiffs' witnesses gave evidence of the existence of any hazards, except that Zakel said that Taylor Street is a "fierce" street, narrow and full of chuck holes, and that to go from Worth Street to "B" Street, and thence over the railroad tracks north was not a proper outlet because of poor condition of the streets, and the fact that the railroad company left cars standing on the tracks crossing "B" Street. From the opinion of the court we deduce that the hazards he finds are due to what he calls narrow streets, a no-left-turn traffic sign where Worth Street enters Wilson Way (which he states has always existed), and a service station on the corner of Wilson

Way and Milton Street (or East Anderson Street) which interferes with the view of traffic from the south when approaching Wilson Way. But all of these streets are as wide as Worth Street, and some of them are wider, the existence of the traffic sign and the gas station are not attributable to the new construction, and all of these hazards, if such they be, are encountered after leaving Worth Street, are shared by the general public, are not peculiar to plaintiffs, and furnish no basis for compensation. Simpson v. City of Los Angeles, 4 Cal.2d 60, 47 P.2d 474. Property owners on Eugenia Street are in an equally unfavorable situation as far as inconvenience and so-called hazards are concerned, yet it could hardly be contended that their easements of access to the street upon which their property abuts have been impaired.

[9] Not every depreciation in the value of property by reason of a public improvement can be made the basis of an award of damages. Wolff v. City of Los Angeles, 49 Cal.App. 400, 402, 193 P. 862; Eachus v. Los Angeles, etc., Ry. Co., 103 Cal. 614, 617, 37 P. 750, 42 Am.St.Rep. 149; People v. Ricciardi, supra, 144 P.2d at page 802. For instance, diversion of traffic is not a proper element to be considered in computing damages. Rose v. State of California, supra, 19 Cal.2d at pages 737, 740, 123 P.2d 505; City of Stockton v. Marengo, 137 Cal.App. 760, 764, 31 P.2d 467; People v. Ricciardi, supra, 144 P.2d at pages 802, 804. Regulations such as the prescribing of one-way traffic or the prohibiting of left-hand turns may interfere to some extent with right of access without furnishing a basis for recovery of damages even by an abutting owner. See note, 100 A.L.R. 487, 491-493. In Eachus v. Los Angeles, etc., Ry. Co., supra [103 Cal. 614, 37 P. 751, 42 Am.St.Rep. 149] the court said: "The damage for which compensation is to be made is a damage to the property itself, and does not include a mere infringement of the owner's personal pleasure or enjoyment. Merely rendering private property less desirable for certain purposes, or even causing personal annoyance or discomfort in its use, will not constitute the damage contemplated by the constitution; * * *."

[10,11] We think that the trial court, in rendering its decision, lost sight of the legal principle upon which plaintiffs must rely for a recovery, to wit, the infringement of some right which the owner of land possesses in connection with his property

(Rose v. State of California, supra, 19 Cal. 2d at page 739, 123 P.2d 505); and such property right is that of reasonable use of the street fronting the property in either direction to the next intersection which plaintiffs still have, and inconvenience or even hazards which they may encounter after leaving Worth Street cannot be said to impair their easements, but constitute damage not different in kind (though possibly in degree) from those shared by the general public, and furnish no basis for the recovery of compensation.

We conclude that plaintiffs have failed to show any impairment of their easement of access or any injury from the improvement on Wilson Way justifying the recovery of damages. This conclusion renders it unnecessary to consider other errors urged by appellant.

The judgment is reversed.

June 2, 1944.

1. Taxation ☞634

Employer, who failed to raise defense of statute of limitations before Employment Commission in proceedings to determine amount of delinquent unemployment contributions, waived his right to that defense; hence it was too late to raise defense for first time on motion to set aside summary judgment lien, which was entered on order of commission. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

A summary judgment creating a lien for payment of due unemployment contributions was entered by the County Clerk on an order of California Employment Commission, formerly the Unemployment Reserves Commission, against John MacGregor, individually and doing business as Capitol Laundry, pursuant to Gen.Laws

Supp.1939, art. 8780d, § 45.9. From an order dismissing defendant's motion to set aside the judgment, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Joseph Lewis, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Robt. W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., and C. A. Linn, Paul M. Joseph, and Doris H. Maier, Deputy Attys. Gen., for respondent.

THOMPSON, Justice.

The defendant John MacGregor, doing business as "Capitol Laundry", has appealed from an order of the Superior Court of Sacramento County, denying his motion to set aside a judgment creating a lien for payment of unemployment contributions in the sum of $532.41, due as required by law, from November 1, 1937, to October 12, 1938. The judgment was entered by the Clerk on summary proceedings after a hearing by the Commission pursuant to Section 45.9 of the Unemployment Insurance Act of California. Stats. 1935, p. 1226, as amended in 1939, p. 2056, Deering's Supp. 1939, p. 1697, Act 8780d. The appellant contends that the judgment lien is void because the liability was barred by the provisions of Section 338, Subdivision 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure. The statute of limitations was not raised until the motion to set aside the judgment lien was made.

A summary judgment lien was entered against the appellant July 24, 1942, by the County Clerk of Sacramento County, for unpaid unemployment contributions from November 1, 1937, to October 12, 1938, in the aggregate sum of $532.41, pursuant to the provisions of Section 45.9 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, supra. That summary judgment is based on the prior findings and order of the Commission upon hearing which occurred April 30, 1942, as provided by the fourth paragraph of the section previously referred to. From the affidavit which was filed in opposition to appellant's motion to set aside the judgment it appears that due notice of the hearing before the Commission was given; that the appellant was personally present and failed to plead the statute of limitations; that the only defense which he then made to the liability for payment of delinquent contributions was that he had sold his laundry business on October 12, 1938. It will be observed that the judgment lien does not include delinquent contributions after that date. The validity of the order of the Commission fixing the amount of delinquent contributions was not subsequently challenged in any proceeding.

[1,2] Having failed to raise the defense of the statute of limitations at the hearing before the Commission, the appellant waived his right to that personal defense. The statute of limitations is a personal privilege which must be asserted at the proper time and in the proper manner or it is deemed to have been waived. 16 Cal.Jur. 603, sec. 199. It is too late to raise the defense of the statute of limitations for the first time on a motion to set aside a summary judgment lien which is entered pursuant to law.

[3] Neither the findings nor the order of the Commission fixing the liability of this appellant for delinquent contributions under the Unemployment Insurance Act are before this court. Its jurisdiction to render the order upon which the summary judgment involved in this appeal is founded has not been challenged. Appellant's affidavit which was filed in support of his motion to set aside the summary judgment does not question the jurisdiction of the Commission or the validity of its order at that hearing. Indeed the only ground assigned for setting aside the judgment was that the defendant had no previous knowledge of the entry of the summary judgment and therefore no opportunity to plead the statute of limitations to the claim represented thereby. It was incumbent upon the defendant to at least make a prima facie showing on his motion to set aside the judgment that it was not founded on a valid order of the Commission, or that the summary judgment was not rendered pursuant to Section 45.9, supra. The appellant was accorded a full hearing before the Commission on the merits of his liability, and in the absence of either the findings or order of the Commission we are bound to assume they are adequately supported by the evidence. Sipper v. Urban, 22 Cal.2d 138, 137 P.2d 425.

[4] On the motion to set aside the summary judgment the appellant may neither complain of a lack of notice of the entry of that judgment nor that he was thereby deprived of due process. People v. Skinner, 18 Cal.2d 349, 115 P.2d 488. In the case last cited, in which an attack upon Section 26 of the Retail Sales Tax Act, Stats. 1933, p. 2599. and amendments,

Deering's Gen. Laws of 1937, p. 3892, Act 8493, at page 3900, which is similar to Section 45.9 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, was involved, the court said at pages 354 and 360 of 18 Cal.2d, 115 P.2d at page 491:

"The defendant and the trial court have misapprehended the requirements of due process involved in proceedings for assessment, levy, and collection of taxes, and the significance of the procedure prescribed by section 26 in relation to the constitutional provisions invoked by the defendant.

"Obviously if an action in a court or other judicial tribunal be necessary for a judgment for the collection of taxes, the State is bound by the provisions applicable to the conduct of such action, and by the general law governing jurisdiction of parties and subject matter. But as long standing as the common law itself is the rule that a more summary method may be provided for the collection of taxes due to the sovereign than is provided for the recovery of judgment for debts between private citizens. This power of government received early recognition in this country. (Citing authorities.) * * *

"From all the authorities, it is evident that the state has the power to assess taxes and fix methods for the collection thereof, and it does not matter if these remedies be summary in their nature, so long as the taxpayer is in some way, at some stage of the proceedings, given an opportunity to be heard and to have his rights determined before some competent tribunal." * * *

"Such a [summary] 'judgment', not being ordered by a judicial tribunal, is not governed by provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure in like matters, such as the requirement for notice of entry of judgment, with the right to resort to an appellate tribunal."

The foregoing language is applicable to Section 45.9 of the Unemployment Insurance Act with relation to the summary proceedings to establish the lien and collect the taxes which are involved on this appeal. It determines the issue contended for by the appellant in this case against him.

[5] The principle declaring that summary proceedings for the collection of taxes are controlling where the statute specifically provides for that remedy is concisely stated in 61 Corpus Juris, page 1044, section 1359, as follows:

"While, in the absence of any other remedy, a suit at law must be used to enforce payment of taxes, it is within the power of the legislature to provide special remedies for the collection of taxes. Summary proceedings are commonly authorized by law and resorted to for the collection of taxes, and they are not governed by the rules applicable to ordinary judicial proceedings, but only by such as the statute prescribes." (Italics added)

Assuming, without so deciding, that, notwithstanding the interest which the Federal Government has in the payment of unemployment contributions (Sec. 2, Unemployment Insurance Act), the statute of limitations may be available as a defense in a proceeding to collect the same, that defense must be invoked at the proper time and in the proper manner or it is deemed to have been waived. Section 45.10 of the act provides that no "legal or equitable process shall issue in any suit, action or proceeding, in any court against the State or against any officer thereof to prevent or enjoin under this act the collection of any contribution sought to be collected." It further provides that the only remedy against the collection of contributions, claimed to have been illegally imposed, is for the employer to pay the contributions under protest, and then to commence an action against the Unemployment Reserves Commission to recover the funds. That section also declares that the demand to recover contributions thus paid under protest is deemed to have been waived unless the action referred to as the exclusive remedy is commenced within sixty days from the time of payment.

In the present case the contributions were not paid under protest, or at all. No action was commenced as provided by Section 45.10. The statute of limitations was not invoked at the hearing before the Commission when that opportunity might have been afforded. If the judgment were vacated there is no action or proceeding pending in which the defense of the alleged bar of the statute could be invoked.

[6] Clearly the contributions in question constitute an obligation in the nature of excise taxes. The Supreme Court has definitely decided that contributions paid by an employer under the Unemployment Insurance Act constitute excise taxes. Gillum v. Johnson, 7 Cal.2d 744, 763, 62 P.2d 1037, 63 P.2d 810, 108 A.L.R. 595.

Since the contributions, found by the Commission to be due and payable under the Unemployment Insurance Act, consist of taxes due to an agency of the State, and the summary judgment was entered in the precise manner provided by the act, and since the appellant previously had a full hearing on the merits of his obligation before the Commission, he was not entitled to notice of the entry of the judgment, and the motion to set that judgment aside was therefore properly denied.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; Maxwell McNutt, Judge.

Suit by the City of San Mateo, a municipal corporation, against Harry J. Hardy for an injunction to restrain defendants from violating a municipal zoning ordinance and to require him to remove certain alterations in a building which were made in violation of the ordinance. From a judgment denying an injunction, plaintiff appeals.

J. W. Coleberd, of South San Francisco, and F. E. Hoffmann, of San Mateo, for respondent.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

The plaintiff appeals from a judgment denying an injunction to restrain defendant from violation of a municipal zoning ordinance and requiring him to remove certain alterations in a building which were made in violation of the ordinance.

On June 7, 1937, the City of San Mateo adopted a comprehensive zoning ordinance (Ordinance No. 446) which was a revision and re-enactment of various prior ordinances relating to the zoning of the city for business and residential purposes. By its terms the city was divided into several districts for the regulation of the construction and maintenance of buildings. Section 4 relating to "First Residential District Regulations (Single Family)" specified as particular uses permitted therein: "a. Dwellings. b. Public Buildings". Section 1 of the Ordinance defined "dwelling" as "a residence building containing but one kitchen, designed and/or used to house not more than one family. * * * and not more at anytime than two paying guests of such family". Section 12 provides that any use forbidden by the ordinance but lawfully existing at the effective date may be continued. Section 13 permits an owner to apply for a reclassification of his property and permits the city council to relieve the owner from any inequitable burden resulting from the general classification.

[1] In 1942 defendant purchased a two-story family home in the first residential district and, without applying for a reclassification, and in disregard of the orders and warnings of the city authorities, made alterations in the building by which the upper story of the residence was converted into a separate apartment consisting of a living room, kitchen, bedrooms and bath. This separate apartment was rented by defendant to a separate family at a substantial monthly rental. On the trial these facts were conceded. In defense there was an abortive attempt to prove that the former owner had violated the ordinance by permitting her grandchildren and other members of her family to live in the home while she occupied it and while she was on vacation. This evidence related to conditions existing in the years 1938 and 1939. The ordinance became effective July 7, 1937, hence the evidence did not pretend to prove a lawfully existing use at the time of the adoption of the ordinance.

The single issue of fact presented for determination is pleaded in paragraph X of the complaint:

"Sometime in said month of November, 1942, the exact date of which is unknown to plaintiff but known to defendant, defendant so altered, repaired and reconstructed said building that said building became, ever since has been, and now is no longer a dwelling as defined by said ordinance, in these respects: that ever since said time, it was, has been and now is designed and used to house more than one family, including all necessary servants and employees of such family; and that ever since said time it did and now does contain more than one kitchen."

"All of said alterations, repairs and reconstructions were made by defendant with full knowledge of the terms of said ordinance and without a building or any permit therefor."

Though all the evidence, as well as the admissions of the respondent on the trial, proved these allegations beyond controversy, the trial court refused to make a finding upon the issue. If such finding had been made in accord with the undisputed evidence appellant would have been entitled to judgment as a matter of law.

[2-4] On the issue of pre-existing use raised in the answer the trial court made no finding in harmony with the pleading and proof. The answer pleaded that the property "was and for many years prior hereto has been used as said property is presently used by this defendant". The trial court found that for many years prior to the adoption of the ordinance the premises were "occupied and used as a dwelling-house by two families". This was not an issue. Furthermore it is directly contrary to all the evidence, which was that the former owner had had members of her family and guests visit her and occupy rooms as guests, and that all were served from a single kitchen. The issue here was whether the premises following the alterations made by respondent came within the ordinance definition of "dwelling"—having but "one kitchen" and "designed" to house not more than one "family". Such were the regulations enacted by the city council upon the advice of the city planning commission. It may be that a judicial review would suggest some modifications under certain circumstances but our system has not conferred upon the court the power to exercise these administrative functions.

gations of paragraph X of the complaint are true. For the same reason finding number 5 is stricken out. It is so ordered and the findings are amended in those respects.

The judgment is reversed with directions to enter judgment for plaintiff as prayed in the complaint upon the findings as herein amended.

The only evidence on the subject related to premises outside the zoned district. The conclusion of law is contrary to all the authorities. *Miller v. [6-8] The right of the city to seek enforcement of the ordinance by this proceeding is not open to argument. City of Stockton v. Frisbie & Latta, 93 Cal.App. 277, 289, 270 P. 270. The provisions of the ordinance permitting the property owner to apply for an exception or variance from the restrictions imposed are sustained by Rubin v. Board of Directors, supra; Metcalf v. County of Los Angeles, 24 Cal.2d 267, 148 P.2d 645, and similar cases. The failure to pursue such an administrative remedy was there held to bar application by the property owner for equitable relief. We have found no case holding that such an administrative remedy is a bar to the defense in an action by the city to enforce the ordinance. But, when the ordinance has afforded such a remedy, it is a complete answer to all that is said by respondent relating to the denial of due process.

[9] In reversing the judgment, it is not necessary to direct a new trial. The undisputed evidence, and the admissions of the parties, require a finding that the allecine for producing miscarriages, trial court's findings against board on conflicting testimony in record on question whether women involved were pregnant at the time were conclusive and could not be disturbed by appellate court.

6. Mandamus ☞187(9)

In mandamus proceeding to review order of State Board of Medical Examiners revoking license to practice medicine, trial court's finding, made after consideration of evidence, that offense of disturbing peace of which physician was convicted by justice of peace, was not an offense involving "moral turpitude" and, therefore, did not authorize revocation of his license to practice, was conclusive on reviewing court. Pen.Code, § 415; St.1937, p. 1377, § 2383.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Francisco County; Edward P. Murphy, Judge.

Proceeding by Thomas Daniel Wyatt against Alvin Cerf and others, as members of the Board of Medical Examiners of the State of California, for a writ of mandamus directing defendants to cancel an order made by defendants canceling and revoking petitioner's license to practice medicine. From a judgment for petitioner, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., Allen L. Martin, and Carl W. Wynkoop, Deputies Atty. Gen., for appellants.

Bradford M. Melvin and Chas. J. Wiseman, both of San Francisco, and Oliver J. Carter, of Redding, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, Justice.

The defendants, as and constituting the Board of Medical Examiners of the State of California, made an order cancelling and revoking the license authorizing the petitioner to practice medicine. He applied for a writ of mandamus directing the defendants to cancel said order. The trial court granted his application and made findings in his favor. From the judgment of the trial court based on said findings the defendants have appealed.

The controversy arises out of the following facts. On the 18th day of December, 1930, the defendant Board of Medical Examiners issued to the petitioner a license authorizing him to practice medicine. Thereafter charges were filed against the petitioner but the record before us does not show the nature thereof. However, on the 23d day of October, 1940, the defendant Board of Medical Examiners purported to make an order placing the petitioner on probation for a period of five years from and after that date.

On the 29th day of May, 1942, Joseph W. Williams, an investigator for the Board of Medical Examiners, filed with the defendant Board a charge which among other things alleged as follows: "That on or about the 5th day of March, 1942, the said Thomas Daniel Wyatt, did, * * * provide, supply, administer, use or employ an instrument or substances or other means upon the person of one, Matilda Hope, a woman, with the * * * intent * * * to procure a miscarriage * * * said use or employment of said instruments or substances, or other means to procure said miscarriage * * * not then and there being necessary to preserve the life of the said Matilda Hope."

In another count said charge did specify as follows: "That on or about the 24th day of March, 1942, the said Thomas Daniel Wyatt, did * * * provide, supply, administer, use or employ an instrument or substances or other means upon the person of one, Mary Gribble, a woman, with the * * * intent * * * to procure a miscarriage * * * said use or employment of said instruments or substances, or other means to procure said miscarriage * * * not then and there being necessary to preserve the life of the said Mary Gribble."

On the same date another charge was filed against the petitioner which alleged among other things the following: "(c)

That he has since said order of probation violated section 2383 of the Business and Professions Code of the State of California, said violation being a misdemeanor, more particularly in that on or about the 17th day of November, 1941, said Thomas Daniel Wyatt was adjudged guilty of the offense of maliciously and wilfully disturbing the public peace and quiet by the use of profane and indecent language and challenging to fight and interfering with an officer of the law in the performance of his duties, by a judgment of the Justice of the Peace of Big Valley Township of the County of Lassen, State of California, upon a verdict of guilty of such charge in a proceeding in said Justice's court entitled 'The People of the State of California, Plaintiff vs. Thomas D. Wyatt, Defendant.'"

Based on said charges, on the 29th day of May, 1942, an order to show cause was issued directing the petitioner to appear and show cause, if any he had, why his license should not be revoked. The petitioner appeared and filed an answer denying the material allegations of said charges and a trial was had on the issues as framed before the Board of Medical Examiners. At said hearing evidence both oral and documentary was presented to said Board by both parties and the proceedings before the said Board were taken down in shorthand. Thereafter, on July 1, 1942, the defendant Board rendered and caused to be entered its judgment and determination revoking said license theretofore issued to this petitioner. On the 4th day of February, 1943, the petitioner commenced this proceeding in the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco. In due time the appellants made a return and filed an answer to said petition for a writ of mandamus. Later a hearing was had on February 16, 1943, and thereafter the trial court being fully advised of the law and the facts made findings in favor of the petitioner and against the appellants. Thereupon the trial court directed that a peremptory writ of mandamus be issued directing appellants to cease and desist from any act tending to prevent petitioner from practicing medicine and surgery within this state; and directing them to forthwith make an order restoring petitioner's certificate theretofore issued authorizing him to practice as a physician and surgeon; and also ordering that said petitioner recover his costs and disbursements. From that judgment the appellants have taken this appeal.

The controversy presented to this court involves few questions of fact and they will be specifically set forth as we proceed. However the controversy is a serious dispute as to the procedure in a mandamus case when the subject under attack is a determination of a board having statewide jurisdiction. Laisne v. California State Bd. of Optometry, 19 Cal.2d 831, 123 P.2d 457; Dare v. Board of Medical Examiners, 21 Cal.2d 790, 136 P.2d 304; Russell v. Miller, 21 Cal.2d 817, 136 P.2d 318; Sipper v. Urban, 22 Cal.2d 138, 137 P.2d 425. It should be noted that at the time of the trial, February 16, 1943, Dare v. Board of Medical Examiners, supra and Russell v. Miller, supra, had not been decided.

Not to prolong this decision it may be stated that the appellants do not contend that the trial court violated any rule in the cases we have just cited except as will herein be noted. Indeed it is conceded that the trial court followed said rules with meticulous care.

[1, 2] Speaking of assignments of error, the appellants make one contention, "It is respectfully submitted that the trial court erred in permitting evidence additional to that considered by appellant board to be introduced at the hearing on the petition for writ of mandate. In this connection it is pertinent to observe that the trial court was greatly influenced by the testimony of Dr. Bolin, a witness who did not testify at the proceedings of the appellant board." In support of that contention the appellants state, "The opinions of the supreme court in the Dare, Russell and Sipper cases above cited indicate that evidence additional to that received by the administrative agency may be considered by the reviewing court only in the following instances: (1) where evidence has been offered and improperly rejected by the administrative agency; (2) where pertinent evidence was in existence at the time of the hearing before the administrative agency but could not have been at that time produced by the exercise of due diligence; and (3) evidence discovered subsequent to the hearing before the administrative agency." That is the appellants base their contention specifically on what is said by the supreme court in Dare v. Board of Medical Examiners, 21 Cal.2d 790, at pages 796-800, 136 P.2d 304, at pages 307-309. However it will be noted from a reading of said case that there was not before the court any question about evidence that was received which should not have been received. On the other hand the identical question was before the court in Laisne v. California State Bd. of Optometry, 19 Cal.2d 831, 123 P.2d 457. In that case, as in this case, it was strongly urged that the trial court should not have received the additional evidence. On page 835 of 19 Cal.2d, 123 P.2d at page 460, the court said: "If, in the instant case, the superior court in the mandate proceeding were limited to the evidence presented before the board, or if the findings of fact by the board were conclusive on the court, then the board would be exercising the complete judicial power reserved to the enumerated courts." Continuing, that court a little lower down on the same page, said: "This then would be an exercise of the complete judicial power that was contemplated by the framers of the Constitution, and appellant would be deprived of his constitutional right unless he had a right to go into a court of law and question the validity of that order by the introduction of any material evidence to prove that he did not commit the acts alleged." Then, 19 Cal.2d on page 843, 123 P.2d on page 464, the court quotes from Drummey v. State Board of Funeral Directors, 13 Cal.2d 75, 87 P.2d 848, and says: "It was there said at page 85 of 13 Cal.2d, at page 854 of 87 P.2d: 'The findings of the board come before the court with a strong presumption of their correctness, and the burden rests on the complaining party to convince the court that the board's decision is contrary to the weight of the evidence.' Undoubtedly, the court in this reference to the 'evidence' contemplated not only the record of the proceedings before the board, but such additional evidence as either party desired to introduce before the trial court." It is clear that in the instant case the trial court did not err in receiving evidence which was not offered on the hearing before the defendant board.

Hereinabove we referred to conflicts in the evidence. As we understand the appellants they do not claim that they are not bound by the findings of the trial court—except as follows: It is their claim that the trial court should not have received the testimony of Dr. Bolin and if it had not received such testimony there would be no conflict. Hence they argue that the reception of Dr. Bolin's testimony was error, that the record can be treated as though such testimony was not received and, under those circumstances, there was no conflict. However we have shown above that the trial court did not err in receiving the testimony of Dr. Bolin. Moreover as we view the record his testimony created a conflict as to certain factors and that it was the only evidence on certain other material factors.

[3,4] Of course as to Mrs. Hope and also as to Mrs. Gribble, the defendants were bound to prove that both women were pregnant when Dr. Wyatt rendered services to them on the dates alleged in the complaint. On the witness stand both denied they were pregnant. Each had given birth to children and knew the symptoms of pregnancy but neither admitted she was pregnant. Miss Malone, the nurse who assisted Dr. Wyatt in performing said operations, gave testimony regarding what she claimed to have seen. She claimed that the doctor curretted the womb of Mrs. Hope. She testified that the doctor operated on Mrs. Gribble and removed a fetus which she said showed the form of a human being. She also testified that before the operation Mrs. Gribble stated to her that she was pregnant. All of those statements about the removal of a fetus were denied by Dr. Wyatt. Dr. Bolin, the witness mentioned above, testified that a fetus of an age of four weeks, the age of the one removed, would be the size of a buckshot and the nature of the substance could be ascertained only by the use of a microscope. It thus appears there were conflicts in the evidence, that the trial court has decided those conflicts against the appellants, and that a court of review may not disturb those findings.

[5,6] Regarding the charge of disturbing the peace at Bieber, it was the theory of the defendants that under the record as made before the defendant board it was shown that the petitioner did, during his probation period, violate section 415 of the Penal Code, that such act was one of moral turpitude and therefore the petitioner was guilty of an act of unprofessional conduct. (Sec. 2383, Business and Professions Code, St.1937, p. 1377.) The vice in that contention is that it assumes the offense of disturbing the peace is an act of "moral turpitude". That it is an act of turpitude may be conceded, however it is equally clear that it is not ipso facto an immoral act. In re Disbarment of Rothrock, 16 Cal.2d 449, 456, 106 P.2d 907, 131 A.L.R. 226. If and when it is claimed such an act is one of moral turpitude the trial court may inquire into such facts as show or tend to show the offense complained of was or was not an act of moral turpitude. In re Hatch, 10 Cal.2d 147, 151, 73 P.2d 885. But in the case before us such evidence was produced by the petitioner. Thereafter the court made findings that the offense alleged to have been committed at Bieber was not one of moral turpitude. Under well settled rules that finding is conclusive in a court of review.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Robert B. Burch, Judge.

Action by Ida Fackrell against the City of San Diego for injuries resulting from defective street and sidewalk improvements. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

S. G. North and Edgar G. Langford, both of San Diego, for respondent.

GRIFFIN, Justice.

Defendant and appellant The City of San Diego appeals from a judgment rendered by the trial court sitting without a jury, in the sum of $3,500 in favor of plaintiff and respondent Ida Fackrell. The action is based upon the Public Liability Act of 1923 (Stats.1923, p. 675, Deering's Gen. Laws 1937, Act 5619), for injuries claimed to have been caused to plaintiff as a result of a defective street and sidewalk improvement.

On this appeal, no complaint is made as to the amount of damages awarded. No question of the contributory negligence of plaintiff is here presented. The sole question turns on the liability of the city.

West Palm Street in the City of San Diego is a short street sloping from the east to the west, connecting part of the uptown areas of San Diego with direct routes to the Consolidated Aircraft factory. For many years prior to the winter of 1940-1941, this street had been closed to traffic, both for the motorist and pedestrian. The soil was in its virgin state.

Late in November, 1940, the city undertook to grade and oil this street in order to facilitate the movement of workers in the aircraft industry to and from their work at the factory. The grading and oiling was finished on January 8, 1941. The work was not done on contract but directly by the city. Milton Rader, a witness for the city, was in charge of this improvement. He was street foreman and had been so engaged for several years prior to the trial. He worked directly under the City Superintendent of Streets in charge of new construction and general maintenance of all unimproved streets in the city. It was also his duty to inspect unimproved streets. The result of the grading done on West Palm Street was that at the intersection with Kettner Boulevard no more than a few inches were cut from the land in its natural state; but at the railroad crossing at the intersection of West Palm and California Streets the cut deepened to a maximum of 12 to 13 feet. At California Street the lot level was left above the street about ten feet on the south side of West Palm. On the north side the cut was 12 to 13 feet. A sidewalk of virgin soil was left above the street level on either side, 10 feet wide and slanting from the bank near the property line toward the street, which sidewalk was bordered with a curb graded out of the soil.

There was a conflict in the testimony as to the character and height of the curb. Rader and the witnesses for the plaintiff were in agreement that there were no concrete curbs, or curbs of any substance except the soil left by the grading. Rader contended that the curbs did not exceed 8 or 10 inches in height from the level of the street and that they were beveled from the street back to the sidewalk for the purpose of holding the oil which was afterwards put on the street. Witnesses for the plaintiff, on the other hand, testified that the curbs were 12 to 18 inches high and that there was a perpendicular drop from the sidewalk to the street level at the point where the plaintiff fell.

After the street was graded oil was applied thereto. This was a light penetrating oil sprayed on from a truck with a power pump on it under pressure at a temperature of 450 degrees. The oil was purposely sprayed on the curb to provide a seal against erosion and to prevent dust from blowing into the street. Rader insisted that it was not intended that the oil sprayed on the curb should result in producing a sidewalk with an oiled surface.

There was a conflict in the evidence as to the width of the oiled surface produced by the wind spreading oil upon the dirt sidewalk near the curb or gutter. Rader testified that the overlap on the curbing was limited to "four to six, sometimes eight inches". The evidence produced by plaintiff indicated that the oil strip on the sidewalk bordering the curb was approximately 18 inches wide at the point of the accident.

After the conclusion of the work, on January 8, 1941, Rader was in charge of inspection of the street. He disclaimed responsibility for inspection of the sidewalk. The sidewalk was considered by his department to be wholly unimproved, and that no repairs would be made on it unless someone in the neighborhood called attention to a condition which was unsafe and dangerous. However, he inspected the oiled street up to the first part of February, 1941. He then testified that it is usual for streets treated as West Palm Street had been treated to show pot holes after traffic "hits the street"; that upon his last inspection in February, 1941, the usual number of pot holes appeared in the street; that he did not notice any large holes at that time, and that it was late in January and in March, 1941, when the rains came.

On March 21, 1941, at about 1 p. m., plaintiff was walking westerly along a strip about 12 inches from the curb, on the north dirt sidewalk bordering on West Palm Street and toward her home when the part of the sidewalk covered with the overflowed or overlapping oiled surfacing gave way under her; apparently from erosion, and she fell into a hole in the street which was about 18 inches from the curb and in the street opposite to the place where the oiled surface of the dirt sidewalk near the curb gave way. The hole was described by her as having the appearance of a "mud pie", formed in the crust of the street; that it was small and about 5 inches across, but she did not notice any depth to it. The fall caused a fracture of her right leg at the ankle.

Plaintiff testified that after she fell the hole appeared to be larger than before; that "it seemed like everything gave way and it all just crumbled in"; that when she finished falling, her body was in the bottom of a hole about 3 feet below the level of the dirt sidewalk; that there had been no appreciable change in the condition of the sidewalk or around "this point in the street" from the time it was put in until the month of March, 1941; that the hole in the street where she slipped had only been there, to her knowledge, "about a couple of days before the accident"; and that "hundreds of aircraft workers" would go up and down this sidewalk each day.

Upon the issue of the dangerous character of the street and upon the issue of notice to the city, the plaintiff produced a witness, Margaret Crawford, who testified that in January, 1941, she rented a room from plaintiff at 1330 West Palm Street; that at that time West Palm Street was "very bad"; that there were a few small holes all along the side where the curbs were supposed to be; that the sidewalk was in a very bad condition; that "there was supposed to be oil and gravel, but most of it was done way with; I guess, worn away". She was then shown a picture of West Palm Street taken after the accident and a hole in the street was pointed out by her. She was asked whether there "was such a hole there during the time she lived in plaintiff's house" and she replied: "Yes, it was very small, around the first of January, but, then, after the rains, why, then it became larger". (The evidence conclusively shows that the street and sidewalk were not completely graded until January 8, 1941.) She then testified that she thought it was about a foot and a half drop from the level of the sidewalk to the street, but on cross-examination she testified that the distance could have been 9, 10, 12, or 18 inches,—"I was just guessing"; that the hole "dropped" still farther; that "before the rains it was about 3 or 4 inches down but after the rains"—"it was another foot". She then testified that about one week before plaintiff fell she had an accident on the same dirt sidewalk "about 30 or 40 feet down from the corner of Kettner * * * about that same location" where plaintiff had her accident. She testified that she "couldn't swear it was at that same spot, but it was right in that neighborhood"; that she "slid down right into the hole where she went"; that the "sidewalk crumpled"; that "there was just a little hole" and "my ankle went in it"; that she did not report her injury or the condition of the sidewalk to the city officials; that the rain came in March and washed out these holes.

Plaintiff testified that the place pointed out by Mrs. Crawford as the place where she fell was not the place where plaintiff fell.

Defendant's superintendent testified that the purpose of the oil was to seal the street from "ordinary erosion"; that the oil from the "spray bar will spray or spread—from 4 to 8 inches" over onto the dirt sidewalk, depending on the amount of wind blowing, type of curbing, etc.; that the oil "went up there accidentally"; that no attempt was made to spray or oil the sidewalks in any way; that during February, 1941, he was "over the street several times", watching it; that he saw nothing "wrong with the street at any place", nothing more than happens to any oiled street—a few "little pot holes shows up"; that he noticed no large holes at the curb or otherwise; that he didn't recall whether he inspected it in March; that "we don't expect any work to last forever, and when we put a dirt sidewalk in we more or less always expect to have to do work on it"; that there is bound to be more erosion on a hill than there is on a level piece of ground; that "there is bound to be, on new work, erosion. On our policy that we have tried to follow, the only thing that we ever repair on unimproved sidewalks is something that is reported to us as dangerous. We don't try to maintain or keep up unimproved sidewalks, only when there is a bad wash or something that somebody has reported to us as dangerous".

This is about the only evidence of possible constructive or actual notice to the city of the defective condition of the street and sidewalk.

Upon this evidence the trial court found that the defendant city had control of the street and sidewalk involved; that it "negligently maintained" them and that they were "in a dangerous and defective condition"; that defendant on January 8, 1941, improved the street and sidewalk by grading the sidewalk and street and oiling the same and that by reason of said work the sidewalk and street were left in a condition which was inherently dangerous; that said inherently dangerous condition was known to the defendant and was not known to the plaintiff; that a hole in the street adjacent to the sidewalk had existed for sometime prior to March 21, 1941; that thereby the street and sidewalk were made dangerous and defective; that defendant had notice and knowledge of the defective and dangerous condition of said street and sidewalk; that a reasonable time had elapsed after the defendant and its said officers acquired knowledge and received notice of the said defective and dangerous condition during which time the defendant could have remedied said dangerous and defective condition; that the defendant and its officers who had authority to remedy said defective and dangerous condition failed and neglected for a reasonable time after acquiring said knowledge and receiving said notice to remedy said defective and dangerous condition; that as a direct and proximate result of said dangerous and defective condition of said sidewalk and of the negligence of defendant, plaintiff fell upon said sidewalk and street and into and upon said hole and was thereby injured. Judgment was rendered accordingly.

Defendant appealed and argues that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings and judgment in that (1) the defective and dangerous condition complained of was, according to the evidence, a latent defect of which the defendant had no knowledge or notice, and could not, by a reasonable inspection, have acquired knowledge or notice of said defect; (2) that plaintiff failed to show that the sidewalk was in a dangerous and defective condition, and failed to show that the city had notice either actual or constructive of any dangerous or defective condition for any such length of time as would reasonably enable it to fix or repair the same.

[1] We will first consider the evidence supporting the finding that the manner of grading and oiling of the street and the partial oiling of the sidewalk was "inherently dangerous". There was nothing unusual in the manner in which the street and sidewalk were graded. Placing the penetrating oil on the dirt street was according to adopted standards and in itself could not be considered dangerous. Placing the penetrating oil in and upon the street gutter and curb to prevent erosion of the dirt street and dirt sidewalk could not be said to be inherently dangerous. The only argument that plaintiff offers in this respect is that the city negligently applied penetrating oil and allowed it to be "blown onto the dirt portion of the sidewalk" thereby creating a "crust" which might thereafter cave in if rains came and caused erosion of the dirt from under it.

It is apparent from the undisputed testimony that it was good practice to apply such an oil to the curb or embankment of the dirt sidewalk to prevent erosion. Plaintiff produced no evidence to the contrary. The oil surfacing had to terminate at some appropriate point on the dirt sidewalk. It was not intended that any part of the sprayed area of the dirt sidewalk was to be used or considered by pedestrians as a part or portion of any paved sidewalk. It was clearly intended as a binder to prevent erosion. We see nothing in the original improvement, i. e., the construction of the street and sidewalk or in the nature of the application of the penetrating oil that could be considered inherently dangerous. The claimed defective condition subsequently arose from erosion due to the action of the elements. The finding of the court in this respect is therefore not supported by the evidence.

In City of Phoenix v. Clem, 28 Ariz. 315, 237 P. 168, 172, where a trench in a public street had been back-filled in the usual way, so as to be safe for use by the public, and the city had no knowledge of a hole therein, due to rains causing settling, and the hole had not existed long enough to give the city constructive notice thereof, it was held that the city was not liable for personal injuries caused when a taxicab struck the hole and injured an occupant. The court there discusses many of the cases from other states and quotes the general rule: "Generally speaking, when a particular kind or class of work is done in the usual and customary way, its conformity to the rule may be granted. When a city improvement is not defective when made, but later becomes so, the rule is that the city must have actual notice of a defect, or the defect must have existed a sufficient length of time to imply notice before it is guilty of actionable negligence. True, the city in the progress of making an improvement must take steps to guard the public against the dangers incident thereto. It is not entitled to notice of a dangerous condition that it has created or caused to be created during the course of the improvement, but, where the improvement is finished or completed to the extent of being safe for use by the public, as in this case, we think to hold the city not entitled to notice but liable at all events is not the law." See also, National Laundry Co. v. City of Newton, 300 Mass. 126, 14 N.E.2d 108; Frisk v. City of Des Moines, 196 Iowa

The next question that arises is whether the evidence supports the finding that the city "negligently maintained the street and sidewalk in a dangerous and defective condition" and whether the city had constructive notice of such condition.

[2, 3] In Cook v. Superior Court, 12 Cal. App.2d 608, 55 P.2d 1227, cited in Whiting v. City of National City, 9 Cal.2d 163, at page 165, 69 P.2d 990, at page 991, it was stated that the constructive notice necessary to fasten liability on the city under the statute and the authorities must be constructive notice not only of the condition of the sidewalk, but also of the dangerous character of such condition. The crust formed over the portion of the dirt sidewalk here involved gave no patent appearance, from any approach to it, of being dangerous to pedestrians who might walk over and upon any portion of the sidewalk. The defective character or condition, if any, was latent and not conspicuous. Plaintiff herself, who had walked over and upon this particular dirt sidewalk almost daily for several weeks immediately prior to the accident, testified that she never noticed any hole in the dirt sidewalk or any such defect as here indicated. She only noticed a "little hole about a foot and a half out in the street", at a place where it would not be anticipated that she would be walking. There was nothing apparent about the character of that hole in the street, where pedestrians were not expected to be walking, that would in any manner give notice to a pedestrian walking on the dirt sidewalk, that the so-called crust formed thereon and in the street had been undermined by erosion. In other words, the so-called defective condition of the dirt sidewalk was not of such a character as to be conspicuous to the plaintiff or the general public using it. It was a latent defect which was unnoticed by and unknown to the city authorities as well. The fact that a pot hole or mud hole may have been present, at some given point in the street, did not necessarily give notice to the city of the dangerous character of the latent defect in the dirt sidewalk. Plaintiff herself saw the hole in the street but did not conclude from that fact that the sidewalk had been undermined. The street foreman made several examinations of various pot holes in the street during the months of January and February, and he discovered no evidence of erosion or undermining of the dirt sidewalk. The elements of knowledge or notice are logically essential to show culpability in failure to remedy the condition of a defective street or sidewalk, and proof of one or the other is necessary to recover. Watson v. City of Alameda, 219 Cal. 331, 26 P.2d 286. The evidence does not disclose any actual notice to the city of such defective condition. Plaintiff therefore must rely upon constructive notice, if any, to support the court's finding on that issue.

It has been well established in this state that, under the conditions here prevailing, liability may be imposed upon a city only by showing (1) dangerous and defective condition; (2) knowledge or notice of the defective condition; (3) failure to remedy it upon knowledge or notice thereof. Nicholson v. City of Los Angeles, 5 Cal.2d 361, 363, 54 P.2d 725. It is not enough to show a dangerous condition of the sidewalk. Little consideration can be given to the testimony of plaintiff's witness Mrs. Crawford. It was apparent that the condition she described was at a place other than that described by plaintiff. She observed no defective condition of the dirt sidewalk either. Her testimony that there was a small hole in the street "around the first of January", is conclusively established as being unworthy of credence because the work was not completed until January 8, 1941. However, her testimony in relation to what she said she observed is subject to the same criticism as that of plaintiff in respect to establishing any constructive notice to the city of a defective condition of the dirt sidewalk.

From the record before us it plainly appears that there was no element of conspicuousness or notoriety showing any danger apparent to a person exercising ordinary care in using the dirt sidewalk on the occasion here described which could possibly give to the city authorities constructive notice of any dangerous condition of the sidewalk or of the dangerous character of such condition.

[4] It has been well established in this state that a city is not an insurer of its public ways and is not bound to keep them so as to preclude a possibility of injury or accident therefrom. Whiting v. City of National City, supra.

If plaintiff's argument that defendant city's failure to make adequate inspection of the unimproved streets and sidewalks in that city with its many miles of unimproved streets and dirt sidewalks, constituted negligence on its part, and that the existence of any defective condition in such streets with a resultant latent defect in the adjacent dirt sidewalks, for a period of a few days or a few weeks, constitutes constructive notice to the city of such dangerous condition of the sidewalk, then cities and counties must hereafter proceed at their peril and such a construction of the statute would prevent public agencies from building and constructing unimproved dirt streets and dirt sidewalks.

The rule as to the duty to inspect has been applied in Nicholson v. City of Los Angeles, supra, 5 Cal.2d at page 367, 54 P.2d at page 728, where it is said (quoting from Davanza v. City of Bridgeport, 118 Conn. 23, 170 A. 484): "'in order to charge a municipality with implied or presumptive notice of a defect, it must be shown that, had it exercised a reasonable supervision over its streets and sidewalks, it would have discovered the condition a sufficient time before the accident to have had a reasonable opportunity to guard against injury from it. That test is * * * would it have been discovered had the municipality exercised reasonable supervision over its streets * * * in view of the whole problem with which it was confronted." * * * This, in common with the other elements of municipal liability for defective streets and sidewalks, contemplates consideration of all the existing circumstances, including, not only the cause and nature of the defect and the length of time it had existed, but also the location, extent, and character of the use of the walk in question, the magnitude of the problem of inspection, and remedy presented by the conditions, and the resources in men and money available to cope with the problem.'"

It is also said, 5 Cal.2d at page 367, 54 P.2d at page 728: "The plaintiff herself testified, and relies upon this testimony to show an absence of contributory negligence, that from the direction from which she approached the sidewalk appeared to be perfectly level. This testimony also tends to show that the defect was not conspicuous, and might also go far toward establishing that it might have been overlooked in a reasonable inspection of the city streets."

In Whiting v. City of National City, supra, 9 Cal.2d at page 165, 69 P.2d at page 991, it is said: "It is a matter of common knowledge that it is impossible to maintain a sidewalk in a perfect condition. Minor defects are bound to exist. A municipality cannot be expected to maintain the surface of its sidewalks free from all inequalities and from every possible obstruction to travel. Minor defects due to continued use, or action of the elements, or other cause, will not necessarily make the city liable for injuries caused thereby. What constitutes a minor defect is not always a mere question of fact. If the rule were otherwise, the city could be held liable upon a showing of a trivial defect." (Italics ours.)

[5] The holding in the Nicholson case that the continued existence of a minor defect is of itself insufficient to impose liability on the city for injuries resulting therefrom is recognized as the law in this state. In view of the nature and character of the claimed latent defect in the dirt sidewalk, the cases cited by plaintiff are factually distinguishable. Many of those cases are adequately distinguished in Watson v. City of Alameda, supra; Wise v. City of Los Angeles, 9 Cal.App.2d 364, 49 P.2d 1122, 50 P.2d 1079; and Nicholson v. City of Los Angeles, supra. We conclude that the constructive notice found by the court is insufficient to support the judgment. Dineen v. City and County of San Francisco, 38 Cal.App.2d 486, 101 P.2d 736; Silva v. City of Somerville, 253 Mass. 545, 149 N.E. 410; Taylor v. Town of Sterling, 250 Mass. 123, 145 N.E. 40; Stone v. City of Boston, 280 Mass. 31, 181 N.E. 746; Malone v. Union Pav. Co., 306 Pa. 111, 159 A. 21; Reinhard v. Lawrence Warehouse Co., 41 Cal.App.2d 741, 107 P.2d 501; Hembling v. City of Grand Rapids, 99 Mich. 292, 58 N.W. 310; Burns v. City of Bradford, 137 Pa. 361, 20 A. 997, 11 L. R.A. 726.

In re KENNEDY'S ESTATE

KENNEDY v. ROGERS et al.

SAME v. WALDRON et al.

Civ. 14195, 14306.

June 8, 1944.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 3, California.

1. Executors and administrators $\S$ 196

A finding that dismissals of claims with prejudice rendered decedent's estate solvent did not in itself require that a second family allowance to widow be granted, but second allowance could be denied if first allowance was reasonable. Probate Code, $\S$ 680.

2. Executors and administrators $\S$ 194(7)

The Court of Appeal would not be justified in reversing order denying a second family allowance to widow unless court was satisfied that trial court had abused its discretion. Probate Code, $\S$ 680.

3. Executors and administrators $\S$ 196

Where devisee, to keep intact her interest in devised lot appraised at \$4,600, paid family allowance of \$1,200 to widow and funeral expenses of about \$500, and claims against the estate appraised at \$4,940.75 were dismissed, denial of second allowance to widow was not an abuse of discretion. Probate Code, $\S$ 680.

4. Executors and administrators $\S$ 194(7)

Where appellate court had affirmed order making family allowance to widow without remanding the case, doctrine of law of the case did not apply to subsequent petition for additional family allowance. Probate Code, $\S$ 680.

5. Courts $\S$ 202(3)

Findings are required in trial of contested probate matters where issues of fact are joined.

6. Courts $\S$ 202(4)

While facts found in trial of contested probate matters may be stated in the order or decree, they should be stated as clearly and fully as in decision of civil actions.

7. Executors and administrators $\S$ 314(12), 510(8)

An order settling executor's final account and for distribution was not reversible for failure to make specific findings, where only ground of objection was based upon widow's application for further family allowance which had been denied, and an appeal taken, and there was no issue of fact concerning her claim which required a decision upon settlement of the account. Probate Code, $\S$ 680.

8. Executors and administrators $\S$ 194(7)

An order denying new trial in proceeding by which further family allowance to widow was denied was not appealable. Probate Code, $\S$ 680.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Florence M. Bischoff, Judge pro tem.

Proceeding in the matter of the estate of John E. Kennedy, deceased, wherein Celia Kennedy, the deceased's widow, filed a petition for family allowance which was contested by A. B. Rogers and another, and wherein Celia Kennedy, as the widow, contested the first and final account and also a supplemental account of Jack Waldron, executor named in the deceased's will which named Laura K. Rogers and her husband as beneficiaries. From an order which denied the family allowance, and from another order settling the accounts over the widow's objections, and from an order denying a new trial, Celia Kennedy appeals.

Appeal from order denying new trial dismissed, and probate orders affirmed.

DESMOND, Presiding Justice.

This case presents two appeals by Celia Kennedy, widow of John E. Kennedy, from orders in probate, which are to be disposed of as a single appeal, under order heretofore made. By the first order she was denied a family allowance requested after an earlier allowance had expired; by the second, the first and final account, and also a supplemental account, of the executor named in her deceased husband's will were settled over appellant's objections and the property of the estate on hand was distributed to Laura K. Rogers, sister of the deceased.

John E. Kennedy died on October 23, 1940, leaving an estate appraised at $4940.75, consisting of $340.75 cash and one parcel of real estate, appraised at $4600. In his will, dated September 30, 1935, Mr. Kennedy nominated his friend, Jack Waldron, executor without bond, and bequeathed his entire estate to his sister, and in the event she predeceased him, to her husband, A. B. Rogers. The will specifically disinherited testator's wife, "because of her abandonment of me shortly after our marriage in 1918, and with whom I have not lived or cohabited since 1918." There were no children, issue of this marriage. Petition for probate of will was filed November 6, 1940, and it was admitted December 3, 1940.

The application for family allowance above mentioned was filed on September 21, 1942, two days before the date set for hearing upon the executor's first and final account and petition for distribution. At the same time, appellant filed her exceptions to the account and petition, reciting that a family allowance of $100 per month for a period of one year from date of death of decedent had been granted on July 1, 1941, to expire October 23, 1941, and praying that the hearing upon the first and final account and petition for distribution be ordered off calendar "until objector herein is granted a family allowance for the period from October 23, 1941 to date of closing said estate and the same paid for in full." The hearing on the final account was postponed from time to time and, ultimately, to March 23, 1943. Meanwhile, on October 14, 1942, an amendment to the exceptions was filed, in which the following recital appears: "That said first and final account, etc. shows on its face that certain alleged liabilities of the above entitled estate are still outstanding and have not as yet been liquidated and/or determined as follows to wit: determination as to the validity of the alleged claims for $4,320.00 filed by A. B. Rogers and Laura Rogers for alleged board and room furnished the decedent, for the sum of $4,000.00 on an alleged note and mortgage filed by Laura K. Rogers and for a note in the sum of $1,000.00 filed by Laura K. Rogers." On that same date, a hearing on the petition for family allowance was had before the same judge pro tempore who had granted the first allowance, namely, Miss Florence Bischoff, a probate commissioner, and the petition was, by her, denied on December 29, 1942.

On March 1, 1943, a supplement to the first and final account was filed and, in her objection and exception to that supplement, appellant notified the court that on February 26, 1943, she had filed a notice of appeal from the order denying the family allowance and that if her appeal proved successful it would be necessary that the real property be sold and the proceeds of sale used to pay the sum so allowed her as a family allowance. Notwithstanding this objection, the court, as we have stated heretofore, ordered the real property, which was found to be the separate property of the deceased, distributed to the respondent, Laura K. Rogers, requiring the distributee, as a condition to distribution, to "post a surety bond in the sum of $3,000.00 indemnifying the executor against any and all claims, demands, costs and attorneys' fees to which he may be subject by reason of said distribution having been made prior to a final adjudication of the claims of said Celia Kennedy."

The first and final account, instead of following the usual course, declaring that all claims against the estate had been paid and that the estate was, therefore, ready for distribution, contained the following statement: "That the time for filing creditor's claims has expired and the only claims filed against this estate are those on behalf of Laura K. Rogers, sole legatee and devisee, and A. B. Rogers, her husband. That the said Laura K. Rogers and A. B. Rogers, by and through their attorney, John P. Tobin, have executed and delivered to your petitioner a certain document purporting to withdraw each and all of said claims in accordance with the terms of said document; that a true copy of the same is attached hereto marked Exhibit 'A' and made a part hereof by this reference, and the same is submitted to the Court for its consideration and such action thereon as to the Court seems just and proper in the premises." The document referred to as Exhibit "A", reads as follows:

"To the Honorable, the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of Los Angeles:

"The undersigned Laura K. Rogers, devisee and legatee of the above described estate, and A. B. Rogers, her husband, contingent devisee and legatee of above described estate, having heretofore filed certain lawsuits against the executor of said estate on claims rejected by him, together with an action for foreclosure of a mortgage on the only piece of real estate in said estate, and they, and each of them, being the only legal beneficiaries under said estate, agree to file a dismissal of each of said actions, being numbered 464248 and 472-684 in above court, with the Honorable Jess Stephens, Judge Presiding in the Probate department of above court, upon the following conditions: 1. That the Petition for Distribution and the accounting of the Executor be approved; 2. That there be no further claims of any or all nature be filed or approved by Executor or by the Court, including any claim for Family Allowance or continuance thereof in any way shape or form; it is understood and agreed, however, that the payment of the statutory fee for counsel or the fee acceptable to Executor or such taxes as may be levied are not to be included in the first portion of No. 2, hereof. 3. It is distinctly made a part of this agreement to enter dismissal that this agreement shall not constitute a dismissal of any rights actions or potential rights or potential actions by the signatories hereof, nor is it intended by these presents to constitute a waiver of any and all rights therein, but that it is an agreement to file, in futuro, as aforesaid, dismissals in accordance with provisions of law relevant thereto forever relieving said Executor or said estate from any or all liability thereunder upon the happening of the foregoing contingencies.

"A. B. Rogers

"Laura K. Rogers"

When this account was filed, August 27, 1942, notice of hearing thereon, fixed for September 23, 1942, was served by the executor upon the contending parties. On September 21, 1942, two days before the date of the scheduled hearing, appellant filed her exceptions to that account and petition for distribution. Hearing upon the first and final account was postponed, as we have stated, to March 23, 1943. Meanwhile, Miss Bischoff had heard the petition for the extra family allowance and at that time the dismissals of suits, mentioned in Exhibit "A", were discussed by the court, Honorable John Gee Clark, then handling the probate calendar, Miss Bischoff, and counsel. Following are excerpts from the transcript of proceedings had at that time:

"Mr. Tobin: * * * Counsel for the widow objected to the final account and his basis of objection at that time was that there were certain outstanding claims which had not been paid and that there were suits on those claims and that those suits were still on file. He never had filed objections to the account prior to that, but has since filed objections and Judge Stephens therefore continued the matter over [hearing on objections to final account] and I had before, and I have now, dismissals ready to be filed insofar as those suits are concerned. * * * However, Mr. Penprase [one of the attorneys for the executor] contended he should have some type of dismissal and I refused to file a dismissal of those suits for the simple reason that we did not want to lose our protection under that right. For that reason, I offered to dismiss those suits or to file a dismissal with the court, but do not care to do so unless this matter is approved, and Mr. Penprase, attorney for the Executor, incorporated that document and that paper in this petition for Final Accounting and that is part of the record here. * * *

"Mr. Smith: * * * Involved in the second petition, is the question of solvency of the estate under Section 680 of the Probate Code. I believe there were three claims filed which were rejected. * * * As to whether or not those claims are valid or not is the determining feature as to whether the estate is or is not solvent. That being the case, I couldn't come in at any time and say we were entitled to a family allowance until the validity of those claims are determined, that is the reason why we did not file our Petition for Family Allowance [the second one] some time ago. * * * In order to protect ourselves, we filed exceptions to the First and Final account. * * * Mr. Tobin or the beneficiaries entered into some sort of arrangement whereby if the Final Account were approved, they would agree to dismiss the suit, because of the fact that they were the heirs. * * *

"Mr. Tobin: The only reason the claims were not prosecuted was because it would entail further expense on their part. If they were going to get money, they would get it any way, that is the reason for not prosecuting the claims.

"Miss Bischoff: Whether or not it was their reason or whether it is a valid reason or not, it has considerable to do with the status of the estate as to whether it becomes solvent or insolvent.

"Mr. Tobin: That is correct.

"Miss Bischoff: You will have to determine whether you are going to dismiss those claims and make it solvent or whether you are going to prosecute them.

"Mr. Tobin: The claims are on file, Your Honor. * * *

"Mr. Smith: * * * Those [claims] which have been allowed, leave the estate solvent; those which are rejected are the ones which would make the estate insolvent. On those claims rejected, suits have been filed. The rejecting of the claims and the filing of the suits, do not tend to make the estate insolvent; as the record stands, the estate is solvent. The presumption is as to solvency, not as to insolvency. Therefore, this estate is solvent until it is proved to be insolvent by the establishment of the validity of those suits on file in the Superior Court. * * * Is it the feeling of the court that our Petition for Family Allowance will have to go off calendar and the executor instructed to litigate these claims?

"Miss Bischoff: I think so, if those claims are good, the estate is insolvent. We cannot say it is not insolvent and spend out money that belongs to creditors. There are cases where the family allowance is only good for one year, automatically it would cease at the end of one year. I put that in probably to avoid any confusion because I thought they might think it could keep right on, I put in that order something that is a matter of law. * * *

"Mr. Tobin: We are willing to dismiss all of our claims, those two lawsuits and I am willing to file with Your Honor right now, dismissals of those two lawsuits and let the matter be submitted to Miss Bischoff.

"The Court: When you file those dismissals, does that make the estate solvent or insolvent?

"Mr. Tobin: We can't stipulate as to that, but we are willing to dismiss the lawsuits—

"The Court: Are there any undetermined claims upon which suit has been filed?

"Mr. Tobin: No.

"Miss Bischoff: Are there any in the file? We will have to have written withdrawal of those.

"Mr. Tobin: I will file that, Your Honor. I will take care of the withdrawal of claims on those matters, those are the lawsuits that were on file against the estate. * * *

"The Court: Let the record further show that in the case of A. B. Rogers et ux. v. John Waldron, Defendant, No. 472684 in the Superior Court of this county, and that the case of Laura K. Rogers v. John Waldron, No. 464248, have been filed with the court, with prejudice, against all defendants, dated August 21, 1942. * * * And that these dismissals may be filed, they are not actually filed, they were handed to the court.

"Mr. Smith: Do we have any information that will tie those into the action on the rejected claims?

"Mr. Tobin: I can obviate the necessity of all of that by complying with Miss Bischoff's request to me, she asked me to file a withdrawal of those claims.

"Mr. Smith: Stipulate that the withdrawal of the claims be filed.

"The Court: Withdrawals of the rejected claims will be filed by—

"Mr. Smith: Laura K. Rogers and A. B. Rogers.

"Mr. Tobin: Yes, they are the only legal heirs of the estate."

[1-3] It appears from the findings entered by Miss Bischoff in the second proceeding for family allowance that the "suits pending and claims on file were dismissed and withdrawn on or about the 14th day of October, 1942." Since these were dismissals with prejudice, Miss Bischoff, when they were filed, was in a position to find the estate solvent, as she did; but, in our opinion, this finding did not, in itself, require that a second allowance be granted. The estate was then ready to be closed by reason of the filing of the dismissals, and while, in our opinion, Miss Bischoff could have granted a second allowance to cover the period from October 23, 1941, to the date of closing the estate, she was also empowered to deny that request if she considered that the amount granted as the first allowance was "reasonable" within the meaning of section 680, Probate Code. See Estate of Coffin, 1936, 16 Cal.App.2d 532, 534, 61 P.2d 81. In determining that question she had many facts before her. She knew, from having conducted a hearing at the bedside of Mrs. Kennedy when the first petition for a family allowance was under consideration, that Mrs. Kennedy was and had been a paralytic for many years. She knew, also, that Mr. and Mrs. Kennedy had lived separate and apart for a period of at least fifteen years prior to his death and that during that time Mrs. Kennedy had never received or claimed support from him, the record indicating that she had received support regularly from her brother. Prior to the first hearing, the claims of Mr. and Mrs. Rogers had been filed, as had the inventory of the estate showing assets less than the amount of the claims. It appeared from the objections filed by Mrs. Rogers to the petition for the second allowance that she, personally, had paid the amount thereof in a lump sum a few weeks before the first and final account was filed and that the payment reduced, by an equivalent amount, her equity in the estate, which had been bequeathed to her by her brother. With all these facts before her, Miss Bischoff, on October 14, 1942, took under advisement the petition for the second allowance, counsel stipulating that she might consider, as evidence, the entire file in the Kennedy Estate and the transcript of testimony taken at the time of the hearing upon the petition for the first allowance. When, two months later, on December 29, 1942, she entered the order denying the petition for the second allowance, she merely affirmed her earlier decision by which she limited the total allowance in this estate to the sum of $1200. This clearly appears from the conclusion of law which she filed in the following language: "the petitioning widow has already received an award of family allowance, which said award of family allowance has been fully paid and satisfied and that said widow has received as much of the estate of deceased to which she is entitled by way of family allowance." We would not be justified in reversing the order unless we were satisfied that the trial court had abused its discretion. 11A Cal.Jur., page 527. It is quite apparent to us from the record, and it must have been to Miss Bischoff, that Mrs. Rogers, in order to keep intact her interest in the lot bequeathed to her by her brother, paid not only the family allowance of $1200, but also charges against the estate for funeral expenses amounting to approximately $500. In view of the conditions to which we have alluded, and especially the small size of the estate, and the dismissals filed by Mr. and Mrs. Rogers, we cannot say that the denial of the second petition constituted an abuse of discretion.

[4] It is contended that the findings made by Miss Bischoff in considering the petition for second allowance constituted a departure from the "law of the case" as established by the appeal which was taken from the order granting the first allowance in 1941. Estate of Kennedy, 1942, 51 Cal. App.2d 714, 125 P.2d 508. It may be that certain findings upon the two petitions are irreconcilable, but we are not impressed by appellant's argument that no departure from the earlier findings is possible or permissible under the doctrine of the "law of the case", for, in our opinion, that doctrine does not apply in the present situation. In 42 Harvard Law Review at page 938, we find this comment upon the doctrine: "The rule is simple enough to state: the decision of an appellate court resulting in a remand for a new trial is binding on the parties in all subsequent stages of the litigation, and is conclusive in the event of a second appeal to the same court." No proceeding was remanded by the appellate court in passing upon the merits of the appeal from the order granting the allowance in 1941. The present petition for family allowance is an entirely separate proceeding. Furthermore, the facts upon which it was held proper to grant a family allowance for the period of one year would not necessarily, and did not in the present case, compel the court to extend the allowance.

Since all claims against the estate had been disposed of prior to the hearing upon the final account before Honorable Thomas C. Gould, the judge sitting in probate at that time, nothing remained for him to do at that hearing except to consider the objections filed by appellant, to pass upon the correctness of certain charges against the estate and, since the objections were overruled, to order distribution according to the terms of the will. We have examined the order made by the court and believe that it disposed satisfactorily of all matters then to be adjudicated.

[5-7] Appellant insists that the order settling the final account and for distribution must be reversed for the failure to make specific findings as to the matters in issue. Findings are required in the trial of contested probate matters where issues of fact are joined. Estate of Baird, 1943, 59 Cal.App.2d 303, 138 P.2d 698. While the facts found may be stated in the order or decree, Estate of Janes, 1941, 18 Cal.2d 512, 116 P.2d 438, they should be stated as clearly and fully as in the decision of civil actions. But the only ground of objection was based upon appellant's application for further family allowance which had been denied, and an appeal taken. There was no issue of fact concerning her claim which required a decision by the court upon the settlement of the account and, in the final distribution, only questions of law. The recitals in the order were sufficient.

[8] The purported appeal from the order denying a new trial in the proceedings by which the family allowance was denied on December 29, 1942, is hereby dismissed. See 2 Cal.Jur. 173; Estate of McCarthy, 1939, 36 Cal.App.2d 194, 195, 97 P.2d 480.

Each of the probate orders appealed from is hereby affirmed.

AMERICAN TRUST CO. v. LaTELLE et al.
Civ. No. 12670.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

June 14, 1944.

Hearing Denied Aug. 10, 1944.

Payment 87(5)

Where bank acquired an undisbursed balance of a loan secured by a deed of trust on a house as result of erroneously requiring purchaser of the house at sale foreclosing a mechanic's lien to pay entire amount of agreed loan to secure release of the deed of trust, though bank had advanced only three-fourths of the amount agreed upon, purchaser's assignee was entitled to the sum as a recovery of an involuntary overpayment, as against original owners of house who entered into the agreement for the loan.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank T. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Burton S. LaTelle and another against the American Trust Company and another to enjoin a sale under a deed of trust and to compel named defendant to render an accounting to determine what was due under note secured by deed of trust, wherein the named defendant filed a cross-complaint against the plaintiff and Santa Fe Lumber Company and A. J. Wilbe to determine to whom named defendant should pay undisbursed balance of a loan. From a judgment that the Santa Fe Lumber Company, as assignee of A. J. Wilbe, was entitled to the undisbursed balance of the loan, the original plaintiffs appeal.

Brobeck, Phleger & Harrison, of San Francisco, for respondent American Trust Co.

Walter S. Brann, of San Francisco, and Frank L. Crist, of Palo Alto, for respondent Santa Fe Lumber Co.

PETERS, Presiding Justice.

This action involves a dispute between the plaintiffs and cross-defendants Mr. and Mrs. LaTelle and the cross-defendant Santa Fe Lumber Company over the sum of $1,836.45 held by the American Trust Company as a portion of an undisbursed building loan made by the bank to the LaTelles. The lumber company was awarded the money by the trial court. The LaTelles appeal.

This controversy involves a somewhat complicated set of facts. In 1938 the LaTelles purchased a lot in Redwood City on which they desired to build a house. The Redwood City branch of the American Trust Company agreed to lend them $7,700 on an F. H. A. insured construction loan. The loan was to be paid to the LaTelles in four installments of $1,925 each as designated points in the construction. The third payment was payable upon filing the notice of completion and the fourth became payable at a designated period thereafter if no mechanics' liens were filed, and if the house passed F. H. A. inspection. The LaTelles signed a promissory note for the amount of the loan secured by a deed of trust on the real property on which the house was to be constructed.

The contractor—A. J. Wilbe—agreed to construct the house for $7,700. The bank made two of the $1,925 payments to the LaTelles, who in turn paid them over to Wilbe. On June 16 or 17, 1939, the LaTelles moved in to the house after having been notified by Wilbe that the house was completed. On June 18, 1939, Wilbe presented for their signatures a notice of completion which averred, among other things, that the house was "actually" completed. The LaTelles were reluctant to sign the notice because they contended that the house was defective in several respects. Wilbe assured them that he would remedy the defects. The LaTelles, nevertheless, refused to sign the notice of completion as it was presented to them. Mr. LaTelle drew a pencil line through the word "actually" and printed in ink above it the word "virtually." The LaTelles then signed and acknowledged the notice, and Mrs. LaTelle took it to the bank to deliver it and to get the third installment of the loan. There is a dispute as to what happened at the bank. The testimony most favorable to the respondents is that the branch manager told Mrs. LaTelle that the notice could not be recorded as changed, and that Mrs. LaTelle agreed that he might change the wording by erasing the pencil line through the word "actually" and blacking out the word "virtually." Mrs. LaTelle testified that she did not consent to the change. This conflict was for the trial court. At any rate, the notice of completion was filed with the words "actually completed" contained therein, and the third installment of $1,925 was paid to Mrs. LaTelle. She indorsed the check and delivered it to Wilbe.

On August 18, 1939, the contractor Wilbe, not having received his fourth payment, filed a mechanic's lien on the premises for $2,327.36. The bank did not pay over the fourth installment because the house did not pass the final F. H. A. inspection and because there was a mechanic's lien thereon. The LaTelles failed to pay off the lien and the contractor proceeded to foreclose. At the lien foreclosure hearing, the LaTelles defended on the ground that the house was defective in many respects. After a full hearing the trial court allowed the LaTelles a $100 set off for such defects, and entered judgment for Wilbe in the sum of $2,246.41. Thereafter, and on April 7, 1941, the house was sold to Wilbe at the sheriff's sale for the amount of his judgment, subject to the $7,700 deed of trust. No appeal was taken from the judgment in the foreclosure proceedings, and it has long since become final.

The LaTelles defaulted in their payments on their note and deed of trust. On March 10, 1941, the American Trust Company filed and recorded a notice of default and gave notice that it would sell the property on August 27, 1941. On August 26, 1941, the LaTelles filed the present action asking that the sale under the deed of trust be enjoined, and that the bank be compelled to render an accounting to determine what was due under the promissory note secured by the deed of trust. The bank filed its answer on August 11, 1942. In the meantime, the LaTelles, by lapse of time, had lost their right to redeem the house from the judgment rendered in the mechanic's lien foreclosure proceedings. The sheriff issued his deed to Wilbe on April 9, 1942. Wilbe found a purchaser for the property, but, before he sold the property to such purchaser, he paid off the deed of trust in full. Based on the fact that the bank actually had paid out only three installments of the loan, he contended that all he had to pay the bank to get it to release the deed of trust was these three payments. The bank insisted that he pay to it the full amount of the loan—$7,700. This Wilbe did, and sold the property to third parties. The LaTelles were evicted. Wilbe claimed that the unexpended balance of the LaTelle loan, which, with certain deductions, amounted to $1,836.45, belonged to him. He assigned his claim against the bank to the Santa Fe Lumber Company. It will be noticed that this claim is for the difference between what was actually lent by the bank to the LaTelles and the amount it had been repaid by Wilbe.

The bank thereafter filed a cross-complaint joining the LaTelles and the Santa Fe Lumber Company as cross-defendants, and asking the court to determine to whom it should pay the undisbursed balance of the loan. The bank's answer to the LaTelles' complaint set forth an accounting showing an undisbursed balance of $1,836.45. It will be noted that the bank admits that it holds $1,836.45, and that it makes no claim of ownership to this fund. Both the lumber company and the LaTelles lay claim to the fund.

The two main issues raised by the original complaint of the LaTelles were no longer at issue by the time of trial. The request for injunctive relief had become moot since, by the LaTelles' failure to redeem the property after the sale by the sheriff in his foreclosure of the mechanic's lien, all of their interests in the property were cut off. The accounting issue was taken care of by the accounting of the bank set forth in its answer, the correctness of which is not challenged. Thus, the only remaining issue at the trial was the one presented by the cross-complaint and the answers thereto, namely, the ownership of the undisbursed balance of the loan.

As already indicated, the trial court found that the Santa Fe Lumber Company, as assignee of Wilbe, was entitled to this fund. The correctness of this conclusion seems clear. It is somewhat difficult to follow the exact theory of appellants. Their various contentions seem to be based on the argument that the bank agreed to lend them $7,700, and that since $1,836.45 of that amount was not delivered to them, they are now entitled to receive it. They also argue that equitably they are entitled to damages against the bank because they lost their home for the reason that the bank refused to pay over to them the fourth installment.

These arguments are unsound. The bank agreed to lend the LaTelles money in installments provided certain conditions were fulfilled, one of which was that the house should pass F. H. A. inspection, and another was that the fourth installment would not be paid if mechanics' liens were filed. Since neither of these conditions were met, the bank very properly refused to pay over the fourth installment. Then, instead of removing the lien, the LaTelles permitted the property to be sold, and they failed to redeem. They also defaulted on their payments on the deed of trust. It was judicially determined in the first action that the defects in the premises could be corrected for $100, and they were allowed a credit for that amount. They now own no interest at all in the property. Under such circumstances there is no sound legal theory that supports their contention that they are entitled to the balance of the loan. The money was to be lent to them to build a house. Since they have allowed the house to go out of their hands, and, since the loan has been fully paid off, they have no further interest in the undisbursed balance of the loan. Moreover, they do not claim the undisbursed balance of $1,836.45 as a loan at all. They do not contend that this sum should be lent to them and that they should be required to repay it. They seek a judgment which would give them the right to retain that amount without the obligation to repay.

The right of the Santa Fe Lumber Company to this money is clear. It is the assignee of Wilbe. Wilbe, by virtue of the foreclosure sale, owned the premises subject to the deed of trust. He offered to pay off the deed of trust, but the bank refused to give him a clear title unless he paid off the full amount of $7,700. At that time that was $1,836.45 in excess of what was owed the bank. There can be no doubt that Wilbe was entitled to a cancellation of the deed of trust upon payment of the amount actually owed the bank. The bank erroneously compelled him to make an overpayment. This overpayment was an involuntary one made under business compulsion in order that Wilbe would not lose his sale of the property. Under elementary principles such involuntary overpayment may be recovered. Young v.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; L. N. Turrentine, Judge.

Action by John A. Tearney against Clarence F. Riddle, a minor, and Mrs. Frank N. Riddle for damages alleged to have been caused by the willful conduct of the defendant Clarence F. Riddle in the operation of an automobile. From an order setting aside and vacating a prior order, the default of defendant Mrs. Frank N. Riddle and a default judgment against her, the plaintiff appeals.

Albeck & Albeck, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

MARKS, Justice.

This is an appeal from an order setting aside and vacating a prior order, the default of respondent, and a judgment against her, and ordering her answer to the third amended complaint to be filed.

This was an action for damages alleged to have been caused by the wilful misconduct of Clarence F. Riddle, a minor, in the operation of his automobile. Frank N. Riddle and Mrs. Frank N. Riddle were father and mother of the minor and had signed his application for the operator's license which was issued to him. Their alleged liability arises because of that fact.

Secs. 350, 351, 352, Vehicle Code, St.1937, pp. 1596, 157, St.1935, p. 145.

A third amended complaint was filed on September 25, 1942, which for the first time named Mrs. Riddle as defendant. An alias summons was issued. Service was had on Mrs. Riddle on September 29, 1942. Her present counsel had been retained to represent the minor defendant who was represented by Mr. Riddle as guardian ad litem. Mrs. Riddle gave the alias summons and third amended complaint to Mr. Riddle upon his representation that his attorneys would take care of her interests and appear for her. He mailed the documents to the attorneys without any instructions to appear for Mrs. Riddle. The attorneys, not knowing they were to appear for her, made no appearance and her default was entered and a default judgment in the sum of $5,000 was taken against her.

On January 6, 1943, Mrs. Riddle being advised of these facts filed a notice of motion to set aside and vacate the default. The motion was noticed for January 18, 1943, and was supported by the affidavit of Mrs. Riddle setting forth the foregoing facts and also by her verified answer.

On February 6, 1943, the firm of Albeck and Albeck were associated with Robert L. Beveridge as counsel for plaintiff.

The motion was heard and denied on March 12, 1943, Albert A. Albeck appearing as counsel for plaintiff. No one appeared as counsel for Mrs. Riddle.

On or about May 3, 1943, Mrs. Riddle filed a notice of motion to vacate the order denying the former motion and to vacate and set aside her default and the default judgment against her. Supporting the motion she specified her former affidavit and verified answer, and the affidavit of John W. Holler, one of her attorneys. Besides reciting some of the facts already detailed the affidavit of Mr. Holler contained the following:

"That on or about January 13, 1943, affiant received a copy of a letter addressed to Honorable L. N. Turrentine from plaintiff's attorney, Robert L. Beveridge, stating that the said attorney was then confined to the hospital and asking for a four weeks' continuance of the hearing of said motion.

"That about February 10, 1943, affiant received a copy of a letter from Attorneys Albeck & Albeck addressed to Honorable L. N. Turrentine, requesting that the matter be continued to be set during the week of March 8, 1943; that no further notice of any nature was received by affiant or his associates, or anyone connected with affiant's office. That the first time affiant knew the matter had been heard and passed upon was on the 27th day of April, 1943, when he reviewed the file in the office of the clerk of this court."

It is recited in the bill of exceptions that at the hearing of the second motion, "Defendant, Mrs. Frank N. Riddle, moved the above court orally and in writing, for an 'Order setting aside the order of the above court denying defendant's Mrs. Frank N. Riddle's motion to set aside default, and for an order setting aside default and default judgment entered thereon against said defendant Mrs. Frank N. Riddle'."

The documents we have already mentioned were admitted in evidence. In addition there were also admitted in evidence the first notice of motion, an affidavit of Robert L. Beveridge filed in opposition to the first motion, an affidavit of Albert A. Albeck, a notice dated February 11, 1943, informing Mrs. Riddle and John Holler that the first motion had been continued to March 12, 1943, an affidavit of the mailing of this notice in Los Angeles on February 11th, the order of March 12, 1943, denying the first motion, a notice to Mrs. Riddle and her attorneys dated March 16, 1943, to the effect that the first motion had been denied, and an affidavit of the mailing of this notice in Los Angeles.

It is recited in the bill of exceptions that "the court did at said time (May 18, 1943) grant defendant's motions."

It should be noted that in the affidavit of Mr. Holler it is stated that in the copy of the letter from Albeck & Albeck he was advised that the first motion would "be continued to be set during the week of March 8, 1943"; that no notice of the hearing held on March 12, 1943, was received; that neither he nor his associates knew such hearing was to be held; that the first information received that the motion had been heard and granted was on April 27, 1943. In conflict with this are the notices and affidavits of mailing already mentioned. This presents the familiar question of a conflict in the evidence, which was resolved in favor of Mrs. Riddle by the trial court. Thus we must conclude that Mrs. Riddle and her attorneys had no notice of the hearing of their first motion on March 12, 1943, as all conflicts in the evidence are addressed to and settled by the trial court which is binding upon us.

[1] Plaintiff argues that the denial of the first motion became res judicata on that question. He cites cases supporting the argument. However, they are not controlling here.

Under the second motion, which was granted, not only the default of Mrs. Riddle and the judgment against her, but the order of March 12, 1943, denying her first motion were vacated and set aside. Section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure gives a court the same power to relieve a party from an order as it does from a judgment taken against him. Vacating the order denying the first motion destroyed its effect so the question of res judicata does not arise at this time.

[2] The evidence amply supports the portion of the order vacating the prior order of March 12, 1943. If, as was evidently concluded by the trial court, Mrs. Riddle and her attorneys had no notice of the hearing of the first motion on March 12, 1943, counsel should be excused for not attending to present their motion. Certainly under these facts the trial court was fully justified in concluding that this order was made through the "inadvertence, surprise or excusable neglect" (Sec. 473, Code Civ.Proc.) of counsel for Mrs. Riddle.

[3, 4] It is well settled in California that section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure is remedial in its nature and should be liberally construed; that it is the policy of the law to bring about the trial of a case on its merits where that may be done; that a motion made under the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court and in the absence of a clear showing of an abuse of such discretion an appellate court will not disturb an order of the court below. Brill v. Fox, 211 Cal. 739, 297 P. 25; Salazar v. Steelman, 4 Cal.App.2d 637, 41 P.2d 571; Stub v. Harrison, 35 Cal.App.2d 685, 96 P.2d 979.

[5] Under the facts before us we can find no abuse of discretion on the part of the trial judge in granting the motion before us for review.

The order is affirmed.

Morris Lavine, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Ray L. Chesebro, City Atty., and Frederick von Schrader, Asst. City Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

DORAN, Justice.

Under proceedings taken pursuant to Chapter 2, Title, 2, Part 2, of the Penal Code, sections 758 to 772 thereof, appellant was removed from his office as a councilman of the City of Los Angeles. The judgment rendered in said proceeding was affirmed upon appeal. People v. Harby, 51 Cal.App.2d 759, 125 P.2d 874. Appellant now seeks to compel payment to him of the salary for the unexpired portion of his term as councilman, on the ground that his removal from office by the proceeding aforesaid was illegal, in that the court was without jurisdiction to thus order the removal of an elective official of the City of Los Angeles. The court below denied appellant's application for alternative writ of mandate. Appellant contends that an incumbent of an elective office of the City of Los Angeles may only be removed from office by the qualified electors of said city as provided by section 290 of the city charter. In this connection it is argued that the method provided by the city charter is exclusive. Betskouski v. Superior Court, 34 Cal.App. 117, 166 P. 1027, is relied upon by appellant to support such contention.

In principle, the Betskouski case and appellant's case are identical. In the Betskouski case, supra, the petitioner sought a writ of prohibition to prevent his trial under an accusation presented by the grand jury pursuant to the provisions of sections 758-772 of the Penal Code, above mentioned. The petitioner in that case was also a member of the council of the City of Los Angeles, and was charged by the accusation with a violation of the provisions of former section 18 of the city charter, the provisions of which section are now embodied in section 28 of the said charter, and which provide that no member of the council shall be financially interested in any contract, sale or transaction to which the city is a party, under penalty of forfeiture of his office. Petitioner in the Betskouski case, supra, contended that the right to remove a member of the council under section 18 of the charter was superseded by the right given in the charter to removal by the recall. Inasmuch as it was held in the Betkouski case that the appropriate method of removal from office under section 18 of the city charter was by proceedings instituted pursuant to section 758 et seq. of the Penal Code, what the court there said relative to the recall provisions of the city charter applies with equal force here.

[1] It is there stated, 34 Cal.App. at page 121, 166 P. at page 1029: "The recall provides for the removal of officers at the will of the electors of the municipality, upon reasons, good or bad, satisfactory to the individual consciences of the electors. Even if a recall petition should state, as reason for recall, the same matters which might be made the subject of investigation under section 18, any elector might vote for recall upon entirely distinct and different reasons appearing to him to be equally or more cogent and convincing. If a recall should result at the polls in such a case and, at or near the same time, an acquittal of the same officer should result from an investigation under section 18 of the charges specified in the recall petition, it could not be said and could never be shown that the results were conflicting or even inconsistent. The judicial inquiry would have ended an investigation into specific charges against the officer. The recall election would have thrown open the entire range of the official life of the individual, and made his incumbency of the office depend upon the accumulated judgment of the electorate based upon, not only his minutest official acts, but also upon his private reputation and character." There is no conflict between the provisions of the city charter and the Code provisions. There is nothing in the charter that, by the application of any rule of construction, indicates an intention to make its provisions exclusive. The procedure of each is entirely different in every respect. The "recall" is a governmental process, whereas the "accusation", under the Penal Code provisions, in substance and effect is an action at law. The variety of phases that distinguish them are too numerous to mention. Neither misfeasance nor malfeasance need be necessarily involved in a recall election. On the other hand, the judicial procedure and requirements incidental to the removal proceedings take the form and substance of an action at law.

[2,3] Of the Betkouski case, supra, appellant's brief states: "Thus the Betkouski opinion contrasts the alleged scheme of removal under section 18 with that provided by the recall. It shows that the recall scheme meets the requirement as to designating the cause and also provides the mode of removal 'with great care' whereas section 18, now 28, states the cause but utterly fails to provide the method or mode. It definitely recognizes that where, as in the recall, both cause and mode are found, the charter provision is exclusive of state laws, and it does this both by its plain language and the citation, as illustrations, of such cases as Dinan v. Superior Court, 6 Cal.App. 217, 91 P. 806, and Craig v. Superior Court, 157 Cal. 481, 108 P. 310." However, appellant completely overlooks the fact that section 290 of the Los Angeles charter is exclusive of state laws only so far as the recall of a city official is concerned. In other words, the general laws do not apply where the charter contains such provisions. Appellant has failed to show wherein the Los Angeles city charter provides, either expressly or impliedly, that the recall shall be the only method of removal of an incumbent from an elective city office. The rule as followed in the Betkouski case, supra, is, as there stated, "that where, in the acts of the Legislature and in the provisions of municipal charters there are set down modes of procedure for the removal of officers which are inconsistent with each other, the charters will control." (Italics added.)

Appellant has not pointed out wherein the charter of the City of Los Angeles either expressly or impliedly provides that elected officials of the city shall only be removed from office as in said charter provided. In the Betkouski case, supra, it is stated with respect to section 758 et seq. of the Penal Code (at p. 126): "There is no conflict between those sections and the charter, for they occupy a field which it does not invade. There is apparently no other procedure than that outlined in the sections mentioned to which resort may be had in order to render section 18 of the charter effective and the language of section 758 expressly countenances such a resort, for it provides for the presentation by the grand jury of 'an accusation in writing against any * * * municipal officer, for willful or corrupt misconduct in office.'" Appellant misconstrues the purport of the Betkouski case. As to section 290 of the city charter, the Betkouski case holds that the recall provisions of the charter do not conflict with the provisions of section 18, now section 28 of said charter, nor with the method of removal of a city councilman from office under section 758 et seq. of the Penal Code for violation of the provisions of section 18. The opinion in the Betkouski case, as above quoted, expressly states as a general proposition that there is no conflict between the provisions of the Penal Code, in question, and the recall provisions of the charter. And it is obvious that if removal of a city official may be had under section 758 et seq. of the Penal Code, for a violation of section 18 of the charter without conflicting with the recall provisions, the said sections of the Penal Code may be applied to removal of a city official in any circumstances where appropriate, without conflicting with the recall provisions.

[4] Section 9 of the Los Angeles charter states: "An office becomes vacant when the incumbent thereof * * * is * * * convicted * * * of an offense involving a violation of his official duties, or is removed from office, * * *." Appellant argues at length that this section gives no authority to remove any officer from his office; that it is a mere "eligibility and exclusion act". Regardless of what the section may be termed, it follows from the express provisions thereof that when an incumbent is so convicted or removed the office he occupies becomes vacant. No recall is necessary. The office becomes vacant, ipso facto, upon the conditions specified. Whether this is termed "removal from office" or a "specification of eligibility" to hold or continue in office, the effect is the same. The incumbent is no longer "in office"; and nothing further is needed to render vacant the office hitherto occupied by the incumbent. If the incumbent may not be said to have been "removed" he is nonetheless "out" as effectively as if he were "removed". It is reasonable to infer from the language employed in section 9 of the charter that the possibility of proceedings under section 758 et seq. of the Penal Code was contemplated when this charter provision was drawn. Section 18 of Article IV of the Constitution of California is also pertinent in this regard. That section, after setting forth who shall be liable to impeachment for misdemeanor in office, states: "All other civil officers shall be tried for misdemeanor in office in such manner as the Legislature may provide."

[5] However, it is not necessary to decide here whether removal of an incumbent of an elective city office for misconduct in office, for a violation of official duties, or for any such cause, may or may not be made strictly a municipal affair by the provisions of a city charter. In this connection see Coffey v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 525, at page 535, 82 P. 75. Appellant has based the appeal herein solely on the ground that section 290 of the Los Angeles city charter conflicts with the provisions of the Penal Code above mentioned, through providing the exclusive method for removal of an elected official of that city. It has been shown that there is no such conflict between the charter provision and the particular provisions of the Penal Code; and that alone is sufficient to provide the basis for the decision here.

For the foregoing reasons the order denying the application for an alternative writ of mandate is affirmed.

HUGHES v. WRIGHT.

Civ. 14359.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.

June 15, 1944.

1. Judgment ⇐ 138(2)

Although the law looks with favor upon settlement of controversies rather than litigation and will not permit a litigant to be deprived of his right to plead his cause when lulled into a sense of security concerning necessity for filing formal pleading, the law also frowns upon setting aside default judgments which are the result of inexcusable inadvertence or neglect of defendants or their attorneys. Code Civ. Proc. § 473.

2. Judgment ⇐ 143(3)

The situation which statute relating to setting aside defaults seeks to remedy is one in which a party to a cause is unexpectedly placed to his injury without any fault or negligence of his which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against. Code Civ.Proc. § 473.

3. Judgment ☞ 143(3)

It is not every inadvertence or negligence that warrants judicial relief in the form of setting aside default, but only such inadvertence or negligence as may reasonably be characterized as excusable. Code Civ.Proc. § 473.

4. Judgment ☞ 138(2)

Where defendant's counsel was given additional time in which to plead with the understanding that if further time not exceeding 10 days be desired request therefor should be made, an attempt to negotiate settlement failed after several weeks, defendant was informed that his counsel was withdrawing from the case and of the necessity of obtaining other counsel to avoid default, but defendant made no attempt to obtain other counsel for several weeks, refusing to set aside default judgment entered about 10 weeks after summons was served was not an abuse of discretion. Code Civ.Proc. § 473.

5. Judgment ☞ 136, 138(1)

Although statute relating to setting aside a default judgment is remedial and should be liberally construed, the policy of the courts is to relieve parties from their defaults only when a proper showing is made warranting such relief. Code Civ. Proc. § 473.

WHITE, Justice.

This is an appeal from a default judgment and from an order refusing to set the same aside.

The action was commenced by plaintiff against defendant to quiet title to property, cancel a lease, and to recover certain moneys allegedly due from defendant pursuant to the terms of said lease and of an oral agreement allegedly made in connection therewith.

Service of summons and complaint was made upon the defendant April 30, 1943. He employed counsel (not his present attorney), and an oral agreement was entered into between counsel for plaintiff and defendant extending the time within which the latter might plead to the former's complaint. The term of such extension is in conflict. The affidavit of plaintiff's attorney avers that counsel retained by defendant sought and was granted a 10-day stay of time within which to appear in the action. That no further extension of time was given but that plaintiff's counsel did state to defendant's attorney that should the latter require additional time and forward to plaintiff's counsel a written stipulation providing for a further extension, not exceeding 10 days, such stipulation would be signed, but that no written stipulation was ever presented. That two personal conferences and several telephone conversations were held by respective counsel between service of summons and complaint on April 30th and June 15, 1943. That on or about June 20, 1943, plaintiff's counsel attempted to communicate with defendant's attorney by telephone but was advised that the latter was absent from the city. After two or three subsequent telephone calls, the office of defendant's counsel informed plaintiff's counsel, on or about June 27th, that he was going to retire from the case. That on June 30, plaintiff's counsel received from defendant's attorney a letter stating that the latter was not going to appear in the case and had so notified his client, the defendant Wright. The letter in question was attached to the affidavit of plaintiff's counsel and is not denied. The affidavit of plaintiff's counsel also sets forth that a conversation was had with defendant's attorney on July 2nd in which reference was made to the aforesaid letter and defendant's counsel was informed that no one else had up to that time appeared for the defendant. That upon this occasion defendant's counsel replied "I have told him two or three times to get a new attorney, and I feel under no obligation to him". According to his affidavit plaintiff's counsel then said "What do you think about my taking a default?" to which defendant's attorney replied "I can't ask you not to", and thereupon plaintiff's counsel said "If he doesn't appear by the first of the coming week I'll have it entered". According to his affidavit, plaintiff's counsel then waited until July 7th, or Wednesday of the following week when, no appearance having been made in behalf of defendant, plaintiff's attorney caused the default of said defendant to be entered. That thereafter, not having heard from the defendant or any attorney representing him, plaintiff's counsel brought the matter on for hearing by the court on July 20th, following which hearing a default judgment was ordered entered. That on the following day, July 21st, the defendant personally called upon plaintiff's counsel and was informed by the latter that said judgment had been entered.

The affidavit of the attorney who represented the defendant at the time here pertinent states that he contacted plaintiff's counsel and in conjunction with the latter "tried diligently for several months to effect an amicable settlement between the parties to the action; that during this time there was an indefinite extension granted to defendant by Mr. Moore (plaintiff's counsel), pending the negotiations; that during the week of June 28, 1943, it became apparent to Mr. Moore and to affiant that the matter could not be settled amicably and would have to go to trial; that affiant, for personal reasons, wrote a letter to Mr. Wright (the defendant) on June 29, and withdrew from the case; that this letter stated, in part, as follows: 'Your new attorney should get in touch with Mr. Moore immediately and either get a further extension of time or file whatever type of pleading you desire'. That on the same date affiant wrote to Mr. Moore, advising him that he had requested Mr. Wright to obtain the services of other counsel; that subsequently on one or two occasions, Mr. Wright telephoned affiant and it was understood that he would employ other counsel."

In his affidavit defendant's counsel further states that on July 2nd he talked with plaintiff's attorney on the telephone, during which conversation the latter inquired whether "it was all right to take Mr. Wright's default"; that defendant's counsel informed plaintiff's attorney that "while there was no moral obligation on his part" not to take such default, that defendant's counsel would appreciate it if plaintiff's attorney would wait until the first of the following week "because Mr. Wright had been very busy down in San Diego," and in which request plaintiff's counsel acquiesced. Defendant's attorney then sets forth in his affidavit that by reason of an injury sustained by him he was confined to his home on July 8th and 9th, 1943; that sometime during the day of July 8th, the defendant personally telephoned him at his home and talked with his wife, who after consultation with him, informed the defendant that her husband would try to get a further extension to the first of the following week, which would be July 12th. Defendant's counsel then sets forth in his affidavit that he communicated with his office secretary but that he and his secretary "cannot now agree whether affiant neglected to ask her to call Mr. Moore or whether affiant informed her and the secretary neglected to call Mr. Moore". In any event, it is admitted that defendant's counsel did not make a request of plaintiff's counsel for a further extension.

The affidavit of Charles Wright, the defendant, states that he left the City of Los Angeles on a business trip to San Diego June 26, 1943, at which time "he was under the impression that negotiations for settlement were still pending"; that he remained at San Diego until the evening of July 7th, when he returned to Los Angeles. That on the following morning, upon going to his office, he found there the letter from his attorney written on June 29th requesting that the defendant retain other counsel. In his affidavit defendant further avers that immediately thereafter he communicated with the attorney who had represented him, informed the latter that he had been out of the city for several days and had just received the aforesaid letter; that he would like to have the attorney obtain an additional ten days within which to file his answer so that he could obtain the services of another attorney. That his former counsel "promised to obtain additional time for defendant to plead". That several days thereafter the defendant went to the office of plaintiff's counsel "with the purpose of further discussing a settlement; that not until he had conversed with Mr. Moore for some time did he know that a default judgment * * * had been taken against him". By his affidavit the defendant further avers that he has been advised that he has a good and valid defense to the action herein "as indicated by the proposed answer, counterclaim and cross-complaint attached hereto".

[1-3] While it is true as contended by appellant that the law looks with favor upon the settlement of controversies rather than litigation and will not permit a litigant to be deprived of his right to plead his cause when, by reason of continued negotiations looking toward a settlement, he is lulled into a sense of security concerning the necessity for his filing a formal pleading (Beard v. Beard, 16 Cal.2d 645, 107 P.2d 385), nevertheless, the law also frowns upon setting aside default judgments which are the result of inexcusable inadvertence, surprise or neglect of defendants, themselves, or of their attorneys in the performance of the latter's obligations to their clients. The condition or situation which section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure seeks to remedy is one in which a party to a cause is unexpectedly placed, to his injury without any fault or negligence of his own which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against. It is not every inadvertence or negligence that warrants judicial relief, but only such inadvertence or negligence as may reasonably be characterized as excusable. In the instant case we are confronted with a situation wherein appellant's attorney had two or three times told him to retain the services of another lawyer. Manifestly, from the facts contained in the record and narrated herein, it cannot be said that there was any misunderstanding between respective counsel, but on the contrary it appears that respondent's counsel was unusually lenient with and considerate of appellant's counsel. Indeed, when the latter's counsel was asked by respondent's lawyer what he thought about a default being entered he replied "I cannot ask you not to".

[4,5] As to appellant, himself, the record indicates that on July 8, 1943, when he received the letter from his attorney advising that the latter had withdrawn from the case, he did nothing except to communicate with counsel who had represented him and was informed by the latter's wife that her husband would attempt to secure an additional 10 days extension.

Notwithstanding this precarious condition in the affairs of his case, appellant did nothing to ascertain whether such extension had been granted until July 21st. Even had such 10 day extension been granted on July 8th, it would have expired on July 18th, or two days before the default judgment was entered. Nothing contained in the affidavits on behalf of appellant shows any fault or omission of duty on the part of respondent or his counsel. We are unable to perceive wherein appellant can claim to have suffered accident or been surprised, when he knew, or might have expected, the result which followed the withdrawal of his attorney and his own failure to secure other counsel or to solicit a further extension of time from respondent's counsel. The urgency of respondent's business in San Diego does not appear, but so far as the record discloses, his absence from Los Angeles was a matter of choice. Having chosen to consider his interest at San Diego of more concern than his interest in this action, he cannot now avail himself of his neglect of the latter as something that ought to be excused. Furthermore, upon his return from San Diego on July 7th, there yet remained several days within which he could have engaged other counsel or have sought further extension of time to answer, but he chose to rely solely upon his request of counsel who had withdrawn from his case to attempt to secure a further extension, and beyond that, appellant manifested no further interest until some ten days later, at which time he learned that on the day previous to his inquiry of respondent's counsel, a default judgment had been entered against him. We cannot therefore say that the court, upon the showing made by appellant in his affidavits, committed error in refusing to set aside the default and judgment. Courts are clothed with a broad discretion in granting or refusing relief against default, and only in cases where the lower court has abused its discretion will the appellate tribunal reverse its action. While section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure is remedial, should be liberally construed and applied to the end that one who has a meritorious defense may be given an opportunity to present it, nevertheless, the policy of the courts is to relieve parties from their defaults only when a proper showing is made warranting such relief. In the instant case we cannot say that such a "proper showing" was made by appellant as to justify us in holding that the trial court abused the broad discretion vested in it by denying the relief herein prayed for.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and the order denying defendant's motion to vacate the default taken against him are, and each is, affirmed.

1. Partition $\S$ 100, 111(3)

Where mortgage lien was not against the entire parcel being sold in lieu of physical partition, but attached only to an undivided two-thirds interest therein, statement in notice of sale that sale would be made subject to the mortgage lien was unnecessary, and decree properly provided that payments on account of the lien should come from the two-thirds interest in proceeds of the sale.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 870(3)

Where partition decree had become final by dismissal of an appeal therefrom, the decree was not subject to attack in subsequent appeal from order denying motion to vacate decree on grounds urged in support of prior appeal from the decree.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ruben S. Schmidt and Joseph W. Vickers, Judges.

Action by Lester Balkins and another against Alvin L. Norrby, as executor of the estate of Mary Dargit Trowbridge, deceased, and others to partition land, wherein a decree was entered providing for a sale of the property and directing distribution of proceeds so as to provide for the payment of a lien of the County of Los Angeles against an undivided portion of the land. The executor filed motion to vacate the sale for failure of the notice to state that the sale would be made subject to the mortgage lien. From an order denying the motion to vacate and also granting motion of another party to affirm the sale, the executor appeals.

Affirmed.

BISHOP, Justice pro tem.

The defendant, Alvin L. Norrby, appearing as executor of the estate of Mary Dargit Trowbridge, has appealed from an order which denied his motion to vacate, and also granted the motion of another party to confirm, the sale of a parcel of real estate, the sale having taken place pursuant to an interlocutory decree entered in this partition suit. The only ground of appeal upon which appellant now relies was the principal ground of his motion to vacate the sale, that is, the admitted failure of the notice of the sale to state that the sale would be made subject to a mortgage lien in favor of the defendant Los Angeles County.

[1,2] The silence of the notice on the subject referred to was neither inadvertent nor incorrect. The county's lien, the interlocutory decree declared, was not against the whole parcel being sold in lieu of physical partition, but attached only to the undivided two-thirds interest held by the estate. In such a situation it would have been improper to have ordered the property sold subject to the county's lien (Wernse v. Dorsey, 1935, 2 Cal.2d 513, 515, 41 P.2d 935) and the interlocutory decree that was entered did not so direct. It ordered the parcel sold, not subject to the lien, but providing that payments on account of the lien should come from the estate's two-thirds interest in the proceeds of the sale, after the deduction of some general charges.

Such criticisms of the interlocutory decree as appear in appellant's opening brief were doubtless made in support of the appeal, from the decree, which has been dismissed. Balkins v. Norrby, 1943, 61 Cal.

App.2d 413, 142 P.2d 958. The decree, now being final, is not subject to attack on this appeal. Oliver v. Sperry, 1934, 220 Cal. 327, 329, 330, 30 P.2d 402.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Certiorari by William J. Swars against the Council of the City of Vallejo and the Civil Service Commission of the City of Vallejo to review an order dismissing petitioner from the police department of the City of Vallejo. From an order denying petition for the writ of certiorari, the petitioner appeals.

Reversed with directions.

J. W. O'Neill, of Oakland, for appellant.

Rolland L. Pope, of Vallejo, for respondents.

ADAMS, Presiding Justice.

This is an appeal from an order of the Superior Court of Solano County denying a petition for a writ of certiorari filed therein by appellant. The petition alleged that petitioner was and had been since September 2, 1941, a sergeant of police in the city of Vallejo, qualified under the civil service rules and regulations of the city; that on October 10, 1942, the Chief of the Police Department had presented to the city council a written recommendation that petitioner be dismissed from the police department for the reason that petitioner had conducted himself in a manner unbecoming a police officer in that he had unnecessarily and unmercifully beaten an intoxicated person; that the city council had then and there, without notice to petitioner, and without a hearing of any charges, dismissed petitioner from the police department; that on October 12, 1942, notice of his dismissal was served upon petitioner, and on October 20th petitioner filed with the Civil Service Commission of the city an answer, appeal and demand for a review of his dismissal; that the Commission thereupon set a time and place for the hearing of petitioner's appeal, at which time and place petitioner, with counsel, appeared before said Commission and demanded that he be given a public hearing, which demand was denied; that petitioner and his counsel thereupon left said hearing, which hearing then proceeded behind closed and locked doors, but that at said hearing a stenographic reporter was present who reported all testimony and evidence introduced thereat; on information and belief, that at said hearing there was no testimony or evidence offered or received that petitioner had ever inflicted personal injuries by the use of unreasonable and unwarranted physical force and violence upon the person of any one nor was there received or offered any evidence of any conduct on his part unbecoming a police officer or otherwise; that on November 5th the said Commission filed with the city council its "Findings and Conclusions" which read: "After due consideration of the evidence presented in this case, we, the Vallejo Civil Service Commission, uphold the action taken by the City Council in the adoption of Resolution 28191 N. S., dated October 10th, 1942, wherein the office of Police Sergeant held by William J. Swars, is hereby declared vacant and he is hereby dismissed from the services of the City of Vallejo effective the 10th day of October, 1942."

The petition further alleged that in dismissing petitioner respondents exceeded their jurisdiction, particularly because no evidence was introduced before the Commission to sustain its purported findings and conclusions, and that the purported findings and conclusions are arbitrary and do not set forth either the facts or the evidence to support same.

Upon the filing of the petition in the lower court an order to show cause was issued, and at the time set for hearing thereon the city attorney of Vallejo appeared for respondents but filed no answer, demurrer, motion to dismiss or points and authorities in opposition. However, he argued, orally, that the issuance of a writ of certiorari is in the discretion of the court, and that the allegations of the petition did not justify the issuance of such writ or even an alternative writ in the case, and therefore the petition should be denied. He admitted that the charter of the city of Vallejo gave petitioner the right to a hearing on appeal to the Civil Service Commission, but urged that the allegation on information and belief that no evidence was introduced before the Commission was insufficient, that the denial of an open hearing by the Commission was in accordance with an ordinance of the city providing that hearings conducted by the Commission may by unanimous vote of the members be closed if it be deemed necessary to secure all the facts, and that the findings of the Commission "were complete and were sufficient to inform the petitioner in this matter as to the action taken by them and as to their findings in the matter." He admitted that petitioner has no appeal and no plain, speedy or adequate remedy.

The trial court took the position that the law presumes that the Commission acted legally and also presumes that there was sufficient evidence before it. Also it was apparently of the opinion that petitioner had some other remedy, for in response to a statement by petitioner's counsel that he had no other method or procedure in the law that he knew of, the court stated: "Well, he has. Now, I have been hearing these matters before the Supervisors for these writs, and City Councils for the writs, and Board of Civil Service, and the law is pretty well defined, and the procedure." The petition was thereupon denied, and this appeal followed.

[1] The sufficiency of a petition for a writ of review should be raised by demurrer or by motion to dismiss. Pacific Home B. R. Co. v. Daugherty, 75 Cal.App. 623, 243 P. 473. Neither course was pursued in the court below, nor did the court, at the hearing on the order to show cause why the writ should not issue, resort to evidence without the record for the purpose of determining whether or not injustice might be done by the issuance of the writ, as it has been said may be done (Donovan v. Board of Police Commissioners, 32 Cal. App. 392, 396, 163 P. 69); and no points and authorities in opposition were filed by respondents as Rule 56(b) of the New Rules on Appeals and Original Proceedings now provides may be done. However, as the arguments presented there and here are directed to the sufficiency of the petition the case is determinable as if a demurrer had been filed.

The charter of the city of Vallejo which was adopted in 1911, Stats.1911, p. 1958, provided for a city council. An amendment thereto adopted in 1941, Stats.1941, p. 3370, created a Civil Service Commission. Section 11 of said amendment provides:

"The City Council is hereby vested with the right to exercise the disciplinary and removal powers hereinafter provided.

"An employee holding a position in the Classified Service shall be subject to demotion or removal from office * * * for misconduct, incompetency, inefficiency, failure to perform the duties, or to observe the rules and regulations of the department, office or board, or for failure to co-operate reasonably with the Department Head or with his fellow employees, but subject to the right of the employee to appeal to the Civil Service Commission in the manner set forth in its rules and regulations. An employee shall be entitled to receive a written statement of the reasons for removal from office * * * and a copy of such statement shall be filed immediately with the Civil Service Commission. Such statement shall include in item form the specific instances in support of the cause of dismissal. An employee who has been dismissed shall have ten days after the receipt of such statement within which to file an answer to the same. * * * Within ten days after the filing of his answer * * * an employee who has been * * * removed from office may file a written demand with the Executive Secretary requesting the Civil Service Commission to review such suspension, demotion or removal. In which event the Executive Secretary without delay shall file with the Civil Service Commission any copy of statement of reasons and answer of the employee together with such other information as may be provided for in the rules and regulations of the Civil Service Commission. Said Civil Service Commission may make, or cause to be made, such investigation as it shall deem necessary and thereafter shall hold a hearing; at which time it shall hear evidence for and against such employee. Hearings may be conducted informally and the rules of evidence need not apply. Written findings and conclusions shall be made by the Civil Service Commission within ten days after the matter has been submitted and thereupon the same shall be certified to the City Council and to the official from whose order the appeal had been taken. * * * Said findings of Civil Service Commission shall be final."

The allegations of appellant's petition for writ of review show that after his dismissal by the city council he appealed to the Civil Service Commission, filed an answer to the charges against him denying same, and appeared at the time and place set for a hearing before the Commission; that he demanded an open hearing which was denied, and that he thereupon left said hearing; that the hearing continued in his absence and behind closed doors; that no evidence was introduced at said hearing to support the charges against him; that the Commission thereafter filed what are designated as "Findings and Conclusions" (in the form hereinbefore set forth) sustaining the action of the city council in dismissing petitioner. His contentions before the trial court and before this court are that the Commission in holding such hearing sat as an inferior tribunal or board exercising judicial functions, that in rendering its decision without the introduction of evidence in support of the charges against appellant it acted without or in excess of its jurisdiction, and that its purported findings are insufficient to support its conclusion in that they do not set forth any facts whatsoever; that the jurisdiction of the Commission was limited to hearing and determining upon evidence before it, whether petitioner was or was not guilty of misconduct made grounds for removal by the charter; that in the absence of a denial thereof the allegations of his petition must be taken as true, and that he is entitled to have the proceedings of the Commission reviewed by way of certiorari and to have the order of the Commission annulled if it be revealed that it acted without or in excess of its jurisdiction. Respondents' contentions here are the same as those made in the lower court, that the allegation of the petition that no evidence was produced before the Commission is insufficient because made on information and belief, and that the findings of the Commission are sufficient; that the issuance of a writ of review is a matter of discretion and not of right, and that the denial of a writ in this case was not an abuse of discretion.

[2-4] That the Civil Service Commission in the proceedings before it sat as an inferior tribunal or board exercising judicial functions whose proceedings were special, and limited by the charter of the city of Vallejo to the determination of the correctness of the order of dismissal of petitioner, and that its proceedings, if without or in excess of jurisdiction, are subject to review by writ of certiorari, is well established. Garvin v. Chambers, 195 Cal. 212, 232 P. 696; Petersen v. Civil Service Board, 67 Cal.App. 70, 227 P. 238; Nider v. Homan, 32 Cal.App.2d 11, 89 P.2d 136; Nider v. City Commission, 36 Cal.App.2d 14, 97 P.2d 293; Walker v. City of San Gabriel, 20 Cal.2d 879, 881, 883, 129 P.2d 349, 142 A.L.R. 1383. And if, as alleged by petitioner, there was no evidence adduced before that Commission to support the charges against him, the Commission lacked jurisdiction. Garvin v. Chambers, supra, 195 Cal. 212, at page 221, 232 P. 696; Walker v. City of San Gabriel, supra, 20 Cal.2d 879, at page 882, 129 P.2d 349, 142 A.L.R. 1383; Naughton v. Retirement Board of S. F., 43 Cal.App.2d 254, 263, 110 P.2d 714. Furthermore, the burden was on respondents to show that the Commission did have jurisdiction (Garvin v. Chambers, supra, 195 Cal. 212 at page 223, 232 P. 696; Petersen v. Civil Service Board, supra, 67 Cal.App. 70, at page 79, 227 P. 238), and no presumptions can be indulged in favor of the orders of the Commission as an inferior tribunal. Garvin v. Chambers, supra; Petersen v. Civil Service Board, supra, 67 Cal.App. 70, at page 78, 227 P. 238; Livingstone v. MacGillivray, 1 Cal.2d 546, 549, 36 P.2d 622; 2 MacQuillan on Municipal Corporations, 2d Ed.Revised, p. 485, sec. 590.

[5,6] Regarding the contention of respondents that the allegation of the petition that no evidence was presented before the Commission is insufficient because made upon information and belief, section 446 of the Code of Civil Procedure authorizes the making of allegations in such manner. While a plaintiff may not so allege facts known to him or ascertainable from public records, he may so allege matters which are peculiarly within the knowledge of the other party or which he can learn only from statements made to him by others. 21 Cal.Jur. 49. Such is the case here.

[7] Regarding respondents' argument that the issuance of a writ of review is in the discretion of the court, and that the writ having been denied by the trial court we should affirm its order refusing the issuance of the writ, while it is true as a general proposition that the writ may be denied where the granting of it would work injustice, where the applicant has been guilty of laches, or his inexcusable neglect has made it impossible for the parties to be placed in statu quo, or where there is no miscarriage of justice by reason of the proceeding complained of (4 Cal.Jur. 1061 et seq.), nevertheless the discretion exercised by the trial court must be a sound judicial discretion, controlled by principles of law; and the writ should not be denied if the allegations of the petition are sufficient in law, and none of the above-mentioned grounds for its denial are made to appear. Here the writ was apparently denied, not because its allegations were deemed insufficient or because its issuance would work injustice or petitioner was guilty of laches or because no miscarriage of justice will result to petitioner if the allegations of his petition are true, but because, in the opinion of the trial court, the law presumes that the Civil Service Commission acted legally and upon sufficient evidence and, therefore, appellant may not have the record before the Commission review in order to prove the contrary.

[8] In view of the authorities hereinbefore cited we are of the opinion that in denying the petition of appellant the trial court did not exercise a sound judicial discretion and that its order denying such petition should be reversed with directions to issue the writ and, upon a review of the record of the proceedings before the Commission, determine, from the face thereof, whether there was before such Commission evidence to support the charges against appellant and show that he should be discharged for any of the reasons set forth in the charter of the city of Vallejo as constituting cause for removal; and it is so ordered.

1. Taxation ☞441

The general rule that, where an illegal tax is inseparably connected with a legal tax, the entire tax is void, does not apply where part of a tax is too high as a result of overvaluation or overassessment which can be corrected on proper application to board of equalization.

2. Taxation ☞301(7), 788(9)

Failure to consider anticipated revenue from collection of delinquent taxes and taxation of solvent credits and securities in preparing budget and fixing tax levy did not render tax levy void in its entirety or overcome prima facie effect of tax deed conveying land sold to state for nonpayment of taxes under such levy, where taxpayer did not avail himself of opportunity to object to budget before final adoption or pay tax under protest and sue for refund of excess and revenue reasonably to be anticipated from omitted sources was less than 10 per cent of total amount of budget and levy. Pol.Code, §§ 3627a, 3714, 3804, 3804.1 to 3804.3, 3819, 3897.

3. Taxation ☞442

Invalidity of practically entire county assessment roll should not be adjudged without clear showing of fraud or equivalent thereof.

4. Constitutional law ☞284(2)

Statutory requirement of notice that copies of preliminary budget are available to taxpayers and for a hearing on date specified in notice at which taxpayer may appear and be heard for or against any part of budget satisfies requirements of "due process of law" and meets all jurisdictional requirements. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Gordon Thompson, Judge.

Action by F. D. Strong against Joseph Mack and others to quiet title to realty, wherein C. J. Novotny, sued as John Doe Twenty, filed a cross-complaint. Judgment for plaintiff, and cross-complainant appeals.

Clarence J. Novotny, of San Diego, for appellant.

W. E. Starke, of San Diego, for respondent.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

This is an action to quiet title to two lots in the city of San Diego. The plaintiff claims under a tax deed dated July 9, 1940, which was issued after a sale pursuant to the provisions of section 3897 of the Political Code. The property had been sold to the state because of the nonpayment of the second installment of taxes for the year 1933-1934. The defendant Novotny, the former owner of the property, attacked these sales on the ground that the levy or assessment upon which they were based was void.

At the trial the plaintiff introduced his tax deed and rested. The defendant Novotny introduced evidence showing that in the preparation of the budget for the fiscal year 1933-1934, the auditor gave no consideration to, and made no allowance for, anticipated revenue from the payment of delinquent taxes or for revenue from stocks and bonds and solvent credits, and that the final budget submitted to the board of supervisors contained no reference to these matters. An ordinance of the board of supervisors adopting this final budget and a resolution passed by that board setting the tax rate and levying the tax for that year were then introduced in evidence. It was further shown that under the provisions of section 3627a of the Political Code solvent credits and stocks and bonds were assessed for that year at figures which under the statutory rate would produce $6341.11 from solvent credits and $36,024.56 from stocks and bonds, or a total of $42,365.67 from these sources. It was also shown that during that fiscal year $232,081.96 in delinquent taxes was actually collected and apportioned for county purposes.

The court found in favor of the plaintiff and entered a judgment quieting his title, from which the defendant Novotny, sued as John Doe Twenty, has appealed.

The appellant contends that it appears from the evidence that the provisions of section 3714 of the Political Code relative to the preparation and adoption of a budget were not complied with for the year in question in that no consideration was given therein to solvent credits or to stocks and bonds which were taxable at the statutory rate, and none to anticipated collections from delinquent taxes; that the tax rate adopted was, therefore, larger than it needed to have been or would have been had these matters been included in the budget; that the prima facie effect of the respondent's deed was thus contradicted and overcome by other evidence; and that it follows that the taxes purportedly assessed against this property for that year were illegal and void in their entirety.

[1] The appellant relies on Otis v. Los Angeles County, 9 Cal.2d 366, 70 P.2d 633, in support of his contention that the taxes levied against his property for the year in question were absolutely void. That case also involved taxes for the fiscal year 1933-1934. In that case, as here, the board of supervisors, in fixing the levy on real property, gave no consideration to and did not anticipate revenue from the levy on solvent credits and securities. However, that case was one brought to secure a return of a claimed excess in the amount of taxes paid, the excess having been paid under protest. At that time, provision for the return to the taxpayer of certain excess taxes paid was made by other sections of the Political Code. In upholding the right of the taxpayer to a return of the excess amount thus paid the court held that the failure to consider and allow for anticipated revenue from the tax on solvent credits and securities had resulted in an increase in the tax rate and that the tax levy there involved was invalid to the amount of such excess and to that extent was void. It was not held, however, that the entire assessment or levy for that year was void and we are cited to no case in this state in which such a holding has ever been made. In Redman v. Warden, 92 Cal.App. 636, 268 P. 686, a tax deed was held invalid because the entire assessment was illegal and invalid due to the omission of certain lands which should have been included in the assessment and levy of taxes. This was in accord with the general rule that where an illegal tax is inseparably connected with a legal tax the entire tax is void. However, it was very early held in this state that this rule does not apply to a case where a part of a tax is too high as a result of a mere over-valuation or over-assessment which can be corrected on proper application to a board of equalization. People v. Arguello, 37 Cal. 524.

[2,3] In our opinion, similar principles should here be applied. No failure to tax any property appears and any excess tax which may have resulted from the omissions in question was not only comparatively small but it came from what is in practical effect an overassessment or mistake in fixing the rate, rather than from a source which is recognized as one so contrary to law that it will result in invalidating the entire assessment. A further consideration is that the appellant then had at least two remedies provided by statute for the very purpose of enabling him to obtain relief from any injustice that might otherwise appear. Rittersbacher v. Board of Sup'rs, 220 Cal. 535, 32 P.2d 135, 138. In that case, the court also observed:

"If the plaintiffs were to prevail in this consolidated proceeding, the result would be to invalidate practically the entire assessment roll of Los Angeles county for the year 1933. Such a result may not lightly be contemplated and should not be adjudged except upon a clear showing of 'fraud or something equivalent of fraud' on the part of the assessing authorities * * *."

budget under consideration and thus subjected to inspection and correction.

[6] The appellant had a further remedy in that he could have paid the tax in question under protest and then brought an action to recover the amount of the excess payment under the provisions of section 3804 or section 3819 of the Political Code, as then in effect. The right thus given and the remedy thus afforded was somewhat modified by new sections added in 1939. Sections 3804.1 to 3804.3, Stats. 1939, Ch. 159, p. 1384. See, Southern Service Co., Ltd. v. Los Angeles County, 15 Cal.2d 1, 97 P.2d 963.

A possible further consideration is that this entire tax levy should not be held void on the ground that it was for an amount greater than was needed since the revenue to be anticipated in connection with solvent credits and securities was much less than 10% of the total amount of the budget and levy. See, Bray v. Jones, 20 Cal.2d 858, 129 P.2d 357. Not only would this be equally true if the amount collected on delinquent taxes in that year is also considered, but on this phase of the matter it should be remembered that the year 1933-1934 was in the deepest part of the depression and the amount of delinquent taxes actually collected may not in any degree reflect the amount of such collections which could reasonably have been anticipated at the time the budget was prepared and when the rate of the levy was fixed. For all of the reasons given, we conclude that the tax levy in question was not void in its entirety and that the evidence offered by the appellant did not have the effect of contradicting and overcoming the prima facie evidence of the respondent's deed.

[7] The only other point calling for any consideration is the appellant's suggestion that on August 20, 1938, under the "ten-year plan" he paid $11.37 as one-tenth of the delinquent taxes on this property for the years 1933 to 1936, inclusive, together with $17.06 interest thereon, that a part of this payment should have been applied to the delinquency for 1933-1934, and that it follows that the property was sold for more than the amount of taxes due. It does not appear that any further payments were made on this plan and the only evidence we find in the record is a receipt for this amount showing that it was a conditional payment on account of delinquent taxes and that it was issued under the pro-

[4,5] The variation from the procedure required by section 3714 of the Political Code, of which the appellant now complains, is one which appears in the printed preliminary budget, a copy of which was introduced in evidence, and the record indicates that the same omission was carried into the final budget which was adopted by the board of supervisors. The omission was one of which the appellant had notice and to which he had an opportunity to object before the final budget was adopted and the rate of the tax levy fixed. While section 3714 requires the preparation of a budget that shall include consideration of all income and revenue from all known material sources, it also provides for notice to the taxpayers that copies of the preliminary budget are available to them and for a hearing on the date specified in such notice "at which time and place any taxpayer may appear and be heard for or against any part of such budget." It is not contended that these provisions were not complied with in this instance, and it may fairly be inferred from the evidence appearing in the record that the appellant failed to avail himself of this opportunity to have the omission of which he now complains corrected. The notice and hearing thus provided for were sufficient to constitute due process of law and to meet all jurisdictional requirements. Not only did the appellant have an opportunity to be heard but these provisions of the statute, for a notice and hearing, seem to have been clearly intended to give a certain finality to this consideration of the budget with respect to all matters included in or omitted therefrom which could have been questioned at the hearing, and except as otherwise provided by statute. With such a hearing provided for it would reasonably seem to follow that objections to the form and substance of the budget as thus presented are to be deemed waived, if not raised at the hearing, at least insofar as they affect the general validity of the tax levy which is to be based upon this budget. This should especially be true with respect to matters which merely affect the amount necessary to be raised by taxation and the determination of the rate of the levy which is to follow and which is to be largely, if not entirely, governed by the items of the visions of the Political Code as a receipt which "may be applied on redemption" of the property in question, which was sold to the state on June 28, 1934. It is not claimed that the property was ever redeemed, and there is nothing to show that the amount in question was to be applied or was applied to the delinquent tax for 1933-1934. Section 3817c6 of the Political Code, added in 1938 (Stats.Ex.Sess.1938, Chap. 17, p. 97), then provided that no such partial payment should constitute a redemption or affect the right, title or interest of the State, and that any such payment is merely "compensation for the use of the real estate." See, Higbie v. County of Los Angeles, 47 Cal.App.2d 281, 117 P.2d 933. There is nothing in the record from which it can be determined or held that when this property was sold by the state in 1940 it was sold for an excessive amount.

Under the views herein expressed, it is unnecessary to consider respondent's further contention that any defects claimed and relied upon by the appellant have been cured by various curative statutes.

The judgment is affirmed.

SWANSON v. HEMPSTEAD et al.

Civ. No. 14207.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 3, California.

June 2, 1944.

1. Attorney and client ☞147

Where client had various claims against a defaulting and impecunious debtor which she might or might not be able to establish, attorneys were not guilty of fraud or of taking undue advantage in inducing client to enter into contract calling for contingent fee of 50 per cent. of any recovery.

2. Attorney and client ☞147

Where client sought legal assistance in enforcing claims against a defaulting and impecunious debtor, contingent fee contract calling for fee of 50 per cent. of any recovery was not "unconscionable", notwithstanding that it subsequently appeared that attorneys would receive substantial remuneration for a relatively small amount of work.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Unconscionable Contract".

3. Contracts ☞94(1)

An "unconscionable contract" is one such as no man in his senses and not under a delusion would make on the one hand, and as no honest and fair man would accept on the other.

4. Attorney and client ☞147

Whether a contingent fee contract is unconscionable must be determined upon the situation as it fairly appeared to the parties at the time it is entered into, and not as subsequent events reveal it to be.

5. Judgment ☞251(1)

Where client made no claim in pleading or at the trial that attorneys had burden of establishing validity of contingent fee contract, judgment apparently based on failure of attorneys to establish validity of contingent fee contract was improper because it was inconsistent with theory of the pleadings. Civ.Code § 2235.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John Beardsley, Judge.

Suit by Carolyn Swanson against Walter E. Hempstead, Jr., and others to obtain a decree that a promissory note payable to plaintiff did not fall within purview of plaintiff's retainer contract with the defendants, and that the note and moneys collected by the defendants be delivered to the plaintiffs. From a judgment for the plaintiffs and from an order denying a new trial, the defendants appeal.

Judgment reversed, and the appeal from the order denying a new trial dismissed.

Harry Sutton, of Hollywood, for appellants.

Frank L. Simons, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

DESMOND, Presiding Judge.

We find the judgment in this case to be based on findings which are inconsistent with the theory of the pleadings. We recognize that in the administration of justice pleadings are a means to an end, not an end in themselves, and that an issue which has been tried and determined should not be removed from the foundation of the resulting judgment just because it was not an issue within the framework of the pleadings. Where, however, the judgment rests upon the determination of issues which were neither foreshadowed by the pleadings nor understood by the parties to be in dispute at the trial, and which determination is the result of one party's failure to produce evidence of whose need he has had no warning, we have a case where the departure from the pleadings may not be merely technical, but substantial, resulting in a miscarriage of justice. We find that to be the situation in this case.

The case went to trial upon the issues created by the complaint and the joint answer of the three defendants. By the silence of their answer the defendants admitted the allegations of the complaint that they were attorneys at law, that the plaintiff employed them to perform certain legal services, and entered into the following contract of employment with them: "The Undersigned, hereinafter called the client, hereby retain Walter E. Hempstead, Jr., Attorney at Law, hereinafter called the attorney to: Institute suit against Vivian Gardner Williams, Frank Williams, Hazel Campbell, Harry Lindley for the purpose of recovering money and property owed by said persons to undersigned, or held in trust by said persons for undersigned, and agrees that the attorney is empowered to perform the said services for and on behalf of the client, and in his name, and to do all things necessary, appropriate or advisable, or which the attorney may deem necessary, appropriate or advisable, thereto whether by instituting and maintaining to completion an action or actions or other legal proceedings, or otherwise, either before or after judgment, or judgments.

"As compensation for the services of the attorney, the client will pay the sum of 50 per cent of any money or property paid, received or collected, by action, compromise or otherwise, upon or in satisfaction of any claim, or recovery made, incident to, or as a result of, the said services.

"The client will advance all necessary fees, costs and expenses incident to the performance of said services.

"This retainer shall be irrevocable, in so far as it may be made such, and the discharge, or attempted discharge of the attorney, or the sale, assignment, transfer, or encumbrance of claim or right of recovery, or the proceeds thereof, or any judgment thereon, whether resulting from his services or otherwise, shall not affect or destroy his right and interest in the said claim, right of recovery, the proceeds thereof, or judgment thereon.

"This retainer shall operate as an assignment pro tanto to said attorney, of any claim or right of recovery, in so far as such assignment may be lawful, arising out of, or incident to, the matter or matters in which the attorney is retained to perform said services, and of anything received or collected thereon or of judgments obtained thereon.

"Both the attorney and client will use their best efforts in furthering the purpose of this retainer and in obtaining the necessary evidence and attendance of witnesses.

"This retainer is executed in duplicate and the client acknowledges receipt of a copy thereof. Should it be necessary to institute legal proceedings for the collection of any part of the aforesaid sums, the client agrees to pay costs of Court and a reasonable attorney fee therefor. Client hereby gives and grants to said attorney a lien upon the aforesaid claim and cause of action as security for the payment of compensation herein agreed upon to be paid said attorney."

After entering into this contract, the complaint continues, the defendants performed certain legal services for the plaintiff between December 12, 1941, the date of the contract, and the 20th day of the following January, "for which the said defendants were paid in full." Two events are then alleged to have taken place, on the two following days, as though they had no relation to what had gone before. On January 21, it is alleged, one Vivian Williams made a promissory note for $2,825, payable to plaintiff, in lieu of and in cancellation of a promissory note for $2,900, dated May 7, 1941, and in consideration of the cancellation of the former note and of other obligations owing from Vivian Williams to the plaintiff, and of the dismissal with prejudice of an action brought by the plaintiff upon the $2,900 note. Then, on January 22, plaintiff complained, the defendants "caused" her to execute to them, without any consideration, an assignment of an undivided one-half interest in the new note, which had been delivered to them and of which they have ever since held exclusive possession, collecting and retaining for themselves 50% of the $50 monthly installments paid upon it. The plaintiff has demanded that the defendants cancel the assignment, deliver the new note and the payments they have received and retained, under it to the plaintiff, but that the defendants have refused to comply with these demands, claiming an interest in the note because of the retainer contract. The complaint then concludes its averments with the statement: "that an actual controversy exists between the plaintiff and the said defendants respecting the said contract, Exhibit 'A', and as to what the said Exhibit 'A' covered, or covers, and of the interest, if any, which the said defendants have, or should have, in and to said promissory note, plaintiff's Exhibit 'B', and that the said plaintiff herein requests a determination by this Honorable Court of the construction of the said contract, plaintiff's Exhibit 'A', and of the validity of the assignment of the interest in the promissory note, plaintiff's Exhibit 'B'." The prayer is for a decree that the promissory note does not fall within the purview of the retainer contract and that it and all moneys the defendants have collected under it be delivered to the plaintiff.

The trial court found that each allegation of the complaint was true, a finding broader than the evidence justified, but made no finding on new matter set up in the answer, in which facts were alleged that were established by the evidence beyond dispute. That is, contrary to the allegations of the complaint, and its implications, the services rendered by the defendants were not limited to the period between December 12 and January 20, nor were they paid for in full. As alleged by the answer and proved beyond question, the defendants brought an attachment action on plaintiff's behalf against Vivian Williams on a $2,900 note and upon plaintiff's claim that almost $1,250 more was due her, and a levy netted some $57. A compromise was then effected whereby Vivian Williams transferred to plaintiff "certain personal property" (an automobile) and executed a new note for $2,825 in her favor. This compromise was not reached until January 21, and some of the details, including the execution of the assignment of the one-half interest in the note, were not completed until the next day. The new note, for some time prior to the trial, had been in the possession of a bank, which was making the collections at the defendants' expense, and forwarding one-half of the monthly payments received to the plaintiff, one-half to the defendants.

We have reviewed the pleadings somewhat extensively to show that the issues which they presented were simple. The ultimate issue was whether or not the defendants had a half interest in the new note. That issue depended upon the interpretation to be given to the retainer agreement and upon the endeavor of the plaintiff to have it appear that the assignment she executed was a transaction separate from all others, and was without consideration. There was no suggestion anywhere of a contention on plaintiff's part that the retainer agreement had been signed by her as a result of overreaching; that her confidence had been abused; or that, for any other reason, the contract was not valid.

The judgment which was entered in this case cannot be successfully defended upon the finding that the complaint's allegations are true, even if it were not the fact that, in part, this finding has no support in the evidence. Beyond decreeing that the assignment of the half interest in the new note was without effect, and was cancelled, and that the note should be delivered to the plaintiff, the judgment declared that the retainer contract was likewise invalid, and cancelled it, and gave plaintiff judgment against each defendant for $279, the amount already received by the defendants over $250, which was found to be the reasonable value of their services. The portion of the decree which cancelled the retainer contract was based on findings that the retainer contract was an unconscionable contract; that at the time it was entered into the plaintiff was the client of the defendants, and that in getting her to enter into the contract they took undue advantage of her and practiced fraud upon her. Oddly enough, the support in the evidence for the finding that at the time the retainer contract was entered into the plaintiff was defendants' client, is found in the testimony of the defendants, and then only goes to show that one of the defendants had been employed by, or had even met, her. The plaintiff as a witness most positively denied that she had employed any of the defendants as her counsel prior to December 12. The trial court, of course, could disbelieve her positive statements and yet decide in her favor, on the defendants' testimony, but the circumstance is further proof that the theory upon which the judgment depends was not at all the theory on which the plaintiff came into court or presented her case. She must have been happily surprised at the outcome.

The defendants, also, were surprised, and prejudicially so. The trial court's findings, that the retainer contract was unconscionable, that the defendants took an undue advantage of the plaintiff, and practiced fraud upon her, must find support, if they have any, either in the evidence introduced or by a presumption which cast a burden upon the defendants that they did not sustain. The evidence produced does not support any one of the three findings. Picking here and there in the testimony to obtain the bits which best support the findings, we learn that the first contact that the plaintiff had with any of the defendants was on or about December 9, 1941, when she was introduced to defendant Hempstead in a corner drug store. The plaintiff, it developed, had had some dealings with the Vivian Williams mentioned in the retainer contract, with the result that Mrs. Williams had the plaintiff's stove and ice box in operation in Mrs. Williams home, and had some other of plaintiff's household effects in her garage. Hempstead assisted the plaintiff in obtaining possession of this property. According to her testimony he was not employed and did nothing to help her until after the retainer agreement was signed, but, as we have already noted, the trial court must have accepted the defendant Hempstead's testimony, at least in part, that he had agreed with the plaintiff, sometime before December 12, to attempt to recover the stove and other articles, his fee to be fifty percent of what was recovered. His services under this agreement, it would appear, began prior to, but were not concluded until sometime after, the execution of the retainer agreement.

Plaintiff's difficulties were more extensive than the loss of possession of these household goods, and for relief with respect to her further wrongs Hempstead introduced her to defendant Widoff, with whom he shared an office suite and had been associated in some cases. Widoff was told that the plaintiff had advanced to or on behalf of Mrs. Williams various sums amounting to over $4,100, and that Mrs. Williams had an automobile belonging to the plaintiff. The automobile was registered in the name of Mrs. Williams, and there was no writing indicating that the plaintiff had any interest in it, but the plaintiff claimed to own it by virtue of the fact that she had paid $395 for it, having purchased it some time earlier for some business she and Mrs. Williams were running. The only written evidence known to exist in support of plaintiff's claim that Mrs. Williams owed her $4,100 was a promissory note for $2,900 (on which $75 had been paid)—and she did not have that. An attorney had had possession of it, but its present whereabouts was not known. (It later developed that this note represented, in effect, an account stated between the plaintiff and Mrs. Williams.) Mrs. Williams had no revealed assets other than her proprietary interest in a beer parlor known as the Cave Man's Cafe and an action pending for the death of one who, she claimed, but could not prove, was her husband, an action which was soon thereafter settled for $250. She had no money with which to pay attorney fees and none immediately available for court costs.

[1] We cannot state with certainty just how many of these facts were told Widoff and how many the plaintiff failed to disclose to him, at their first meeting. At best, the situation presented to him was one where the only fees that could be expected would come from proving a claim that might be defeated by a denial as persuasive as the claim, and then making a collection from a defaulting, impecunious debtor. It may be that on a retrial additional facts will appear, revealing this to be an invalid contract. But declining to take such a case as was outlined to the defendant except on the terms set forth in the retainer contract, cannot be fairly said to be the practice of fraud upon, or taking undue advantage of, the one seeking legal services. Attorneys are often called upon and frequently do render service without expectation of reward, but there is no legal duty requiring them to do so in such a situation as that presented here.

[2-4] Nor is there any justification in the evidence produced for characterizing the contract as "unconscionable." An "unconscionable contract", the authorities are agreed (65 C.J. 1201; 43 Words and Phrases, Perm.Ed., pp. 78, 79), is one "such as no man in his senses and not under a delusion would make on the one hand, and as no honest and fair man would accept on the other." Carter v. Boone County Trust Co., 1935, 338 Mo. 629, 92 S.W.2d 647, 657. Whether or not a contingent fee contract is unconscionable, even were that term to be given a less drastic meaning than the authorities ascribe to it, must be determined upon the situation as it fairly appears to the parties at the time it is entered into, not as subsequent events reveal it to be. Implicit in the nature of the contract is speculation on the outcome. A fee of fifty percent of a recovery sure to be made, or which, had a reasonable effort been made to ascertain the facts, would appear to be sure, might well be held unconscionable. But that cannot be and is not plaintiff's position under the evidence produced in this case. The present contract is unconscionable, she argues, because the defendants have received $529.52 for no more work than bringing an attachment action, levying an attachment by which some $57 was netted, bringing about a settlement whereby "plaintiff's" car was recovered and sold, a new note with better terms obtained in lieu of the lost one, and, as a consequence of a number of letters written by the defendants, monthly payments of $50 each, amounting to $750, have been collected on the note; and for every dollar still to be received on the note—if any more will be received—the defendants will obtain 50¢. This argument, based on hindsight, is not a valid argument upon the question which the pleadings did not present but the trial court raised: Was the retainer contract unconscionable?

[5] There remains the possibility, probability indeed, that the trial court made the findings it did, not because of the evidence produced, but rather because of that not produced. This would be on the principle that, it having been found that the relation of client and attorney existed between the plaintiff and the defendants at the time the retainer contract was entered into, a burden was cast upon the defendants to prove that the contract was valid. The extent of that burden has been prescribed by statute in these words of section 2235, Civil Code (Luiz v. Queen of Angels Hospital, 1942, 53 Cal.App.2d 310, 312, 127 P.2d 966): "All transactions between a trustee and his beneficiary during the existence of the trust, or while the influence acquired by the trustee remains, by which he obtains any advantage from his beneficiary, are presumed to be entered into by the latter without sufficient consideration, and under undue influence." By case law the burden is somewhat greater (Hawkins v. Faries, 1942, 49 Cal.App.2d 186, 189, 121 P.2d 20, 21): "Actually, the transactions here involved having been between attorneys and their clients, the question is whether the respondent attorneys overcame by clear and satisfactory evidence the presumption of invalidity which arises from such transactions. 'All dealings between an attorney and his client for the benefit of the former are not only closely scrutinized, but are presumptively invalid on the ground of constructive fraud, and such presumption can be overcome only by the clearest and most satisfactory evidence. Not only must the attorney offer clear and satisfactory evidence that the transaction between himself and his client was fair and equitable, and no advantage was taken by him, but he must also offer proof that the client was fully informed of all matters relative to the transaction, and was so placed as to be able to act understandingly and to deal with the attorney at arm's length.' Estate of Witt, 198 Cal. 407, 419, 245 P. 197, 202. To the same effect see Kisling v. Shaw, 33 Cal. 425, 91 Am.Dec. 644; Cooley v. Miller & Lux, 156 Cal. 510, 105 P. 981; Clark v. Millsap, 197 Cal. 765, 242 P. 918." It can be argued, therefore, that the trier of fact, believing neither the plaintiff when she testified that she was not the client of any of the defendants before the retainer contract was entered into, nor the defendants' version of what the facts were, other than that the plaintiff had for three days been the client of the defendant Hempstead, could have concluded that the defendants failed to overcome the presumption that they had taken advantage of their client in securing her signature to the retainer contract. We shall not pause to weigh this argument, nor to assay the evidence in its light. To find support for the judgment in the failure of the defendants, if they did fail, to prove fully facts of whose need they were not made aware by a hint in the pleadings or by any claim of the plaintiff at the trial, would be a miscarriage of justice. Those permitted to practice law in this state have standards set for their conduct. Those standards are set high and must be kept so. Before they can be penalized for a failure to live up to those standards attorneys should, however, be given their day in court. In an action which they do not bring, but in which they appear as defendants, they should not have judgment go against them because of their failure satisfactorily to prove a fact not in question.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed. The appeal from the order denying a new trial is dismissed.

1. Automobiles ⇨244(13)

Substantial evidence supported trial court's finding that, when motorist entered intersection, motorcycle approaching from his right on through highway at a distance of 300 to 400 feet was not an immediate hazard and established that motorist exercised ordinary care in the circumstances. Vehicle Code, § 82.5, St.1937, p. 413; § 552, St.1935, p. 187.

2. Automobiles ⇨226(2)

Where motorist, after stopping and waiting for traffic to pass on through highway, entered intersection at speed of 15 miles per hour, and when near center line looked to his right without seeing approaching motorcycle, while cyclist knowing of motorist's presence within intersection traveled 300 or 400 feet on through highway at speed of 40 to 45 miles per hour and skidded 99 feet before striking extreme right rear end of automobile, the proximate cause of collision was cyclist's failure to yield right of way to motorist who was lawfully crossing intersection. Vehicle Code, § 82.5, St.1937, p. 413; § 552, St.1935, p. 187.

In action by motorcyclist for injuries sustained in collision with automobile crossing through highway on which motorcyclist was traveling, trial court's findings Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harold B. Jeffery, Judge.

Action by John Clifton Glynn against Robert A. Vaccari for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff in a collision between his motorcycle and defendant's automobile. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

W. W. Comstock, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Elbert E. Hensley and John H. Klenke, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiff appeals from a judgment in favor of defendant rendered by the trial court sitting without a jury in an action for damages on account of personal injuries sustained by said plaintiff in a collision between his motorcycle and the automobile of defendant.

The collision occurred about three o'clock in the afternoon of July 18, 1942, a bright, sunny day, at the intersection of Olympic Boulevard and Gerhart Street in the County of Los Angeles. Appellant was proceeding easterly on Olympic Boulevard, a through highway, seventy feet in width, and he testified that as he approached the intersection in question, he was traveling 20 feet from the south curb of Olympic at a speed of 35 to 40 miles per hour, and when he was 300 or 400 feet west of the intersection, he observed that respondent, who was traveling south on Gerhart Street, had stopped at a point near the stop sign on that street, which was approximately 30 feet north of the north curb line of Olympic Boulevard; that respondent "started out from the stop sign very easily; that he shifted into second gear, about 20 feet from the north side of the highway he shifted into second gear, I believe, and picked up speed"; and started across Olympic at about 15 miles per hour. "He proceeded straight south after he entered the highway and after he had crossed the middle of the street, approximately 15 feet, he heard me coming and so he stopped"; whereupon appellant's motorcycle struck the right rear fender of respondent's automobile, which was then "seven feet south of the middle" of Olympic Boulevard. Appellant also testified that he intended to pass in front of respondent's automobile, but that respondent speeded up when he reached the center of the boulevard, and the collision occurred when appellant attempted to go around back of respondent's automobile. Appellant sustained a "compound fracture of the tibia and fibula of the right leg about three inches above the ankle."

Two witnesses testified that they were present in the Justice's Court of Montebello Township when respondent Vaccari testified "that he stopped, looked to the left and to the right and saw a truck and followed the truck up the street and looked to the left again and proceeded across the street without looking to the right again."

A third witness, who was traveling east on Olympic Boulevard at the time of the accident, testified that respondent Vaccari stated in said Justice Court that "he made the stop; then noticed a truck coming on his left and watched the truck some 75 yards down the road on his right; then looked ahead and continued across the street." It was also shown that the motorcycle left skid marks on the pavement for a distance of 99 feet and that the automobile left none. "The skid mark started in a straight line; then it broke to the south and eventually again turned to the north just before the start of the impact." After the impact respondent's car was parked at the west curb of Gerhart Street south of Olympic Boulevard. State Traffic Officer Thomas, who investigated the accident, testifying as an expert gave as his opinion that appellant was traveling at a speed of approximately 45 miles per hour at the time of the collision.

Respondent Vaccari testified that he approached the intersection in question and came to a complete stop at the north curb line of Olympic Boulevard where he waited "until three or four cars went west and some east"; that as he started into the intersection a truck went by; "I let that get a distance of 75 yards approximately; then I looked to my left and there was two cars about a block and a half down, coming from the east, that is going west; and I looked to my left, as I proceeded across, at about the center line, I looked to my right and I kept going across. I never saw him (appellant) coming down Olympic. There are shadows from the trees that cover almost three-fourths of that curb lane, and when I first saw him is when I heard the screech of brakes coming down." Also, that he did not stop his car before the motorcycle struck him and did not shift gears after starting up or while he was in the intersection; that when he saw appellant "coming down on me, I tried to accelerate but it just didn't pick up right away"; and the motorcycle struck "the extreme end of my right fender and bumper."

Appellant urges that the trial court's findings of fact V and VI, to the effect that when respondent entered the intersection, appellant's motorcycle, which was then a distance of between 300 and 400 feet west of the intersection, did not constitute an immediate hazard to respondent—are erroneous because (1) they disregard section 82.5 of the Vehicle Code, St. 1937, p. 413, requiring one to stop before crossing as well as before entering the highway, and that said findings adopt section 552 of the Vehicle Code, St. 1935, p. 187, as the only law applicable to the facts; (2) that they are based on a construction of section 552, supra, to the effect that the point of entrance to the through highway is the fixed and only place where respondent was required to observe approaching traffic or yield to it; and (3) they are contrary to the truth, i. e.: that appellant's motorcycle was an immediate hazard, else there would have been no collision.

Section 82.5 of the Vehicle Code reads: "A 'through highway' is a highway or portion thereof at the entrance to which vehicular traffic from intersecting highways is required by law to stop before entering or crossing the same, and when stop signs are erected as provided in this code."

Section 552 of the same Code provides: "The driver of any vehicle which has stopped as required by this code at the entrance to a through highway shall yield the right of way to other vehicles which have entered the intersection from the through highway or which are approaching so closely on the through highway as to constitute an immediate hazard, but said driver having so yielded may proceed and the drivers of all other vehicles approaching the intersection on the through highway shall yield the right of way to the vehicle so about to enter or cross the through highway."

NUTZEL v. KOZDRON et al.

Civ. No. 14456.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

June 15, 1944.

1. Attachment ⇐6

An attachment lies in all cases of an implied contract for payment of money when the defendant is a nonresident of the state. Code Civ.Proc. § 537, subd. 2.

2. Money received ⇐8

If defendant steals money from a plaintiff, an implied contract to repay money arises.

3. Attachment ⇐122(2)

Although original affidavit upon which a writ of attachment has been issued is defective in failing to state that defendant is a nonresident, such defect may be remedied by filing of amended affidavit at or before time of hearing of motion to dissolve attachment.

4. Attachment ⇐6, 122(2)

Where affidavits on file at time of hearing of motion to vacate attachment disclosed that defendants had stolen money from plaintiff, and amended affidavit filed at that time alleged that defendants were nonresidents, plaintiff was entitled to an attachment, and motion to dissolve attachment should have been denied. Code Civ. Proc. § 537, subd. 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Alfred L. Bartlett, Judge.

Action for money had and received by George W. Nutzal against Walter Kozdron and Hugh Lynn, also known as Robert L. Riley, Jr., wherein the plaintiff caused a writ of attachment to be levied upon funds which the defendants had deposited in two banks, and wherein the defendants filed a motion to vacate the writ of attachment. From an order granting the defendants' motion, the plaintiff appeals.

Order reversed.

Leola Buck Kellogg, of Sacramento, for defendants and respondents.

Frank O. Weller and Thomas S. Tobin, both of Los Angeles, for plaintiff and appellant.

[1,2] Substantial evidence was produced on behalf of respondent to support the findings of fact complained of, and to establish the exercise by him of ordinary care in the circumstances presented herein: That he stopped and waited for traffic to pass before entering the intersection; that as he started into the intersection a truck passed by and he waited until it had progressed a distance of 75 yards; that he then proceeded to cross the boulevard at a speed of 15 miles per hour, having first looked to his left; that when he was near the center line of Olympic, he looked to his right, did not see appellant approaching, and continued across the boulevard until he was struck. Meanwhile, appellant, with knowledge of respondent's presence within the intersection, traveled 300 or 400 feet at a speed of 40 to 45 miles per hour, and skidded 99 feet before striking the extreme right rear end of respondent's automobile. From this it would appear that appellant's failure to yield the right of way (Sec. 552, Vehicle Code) to respondent, who was lawfully crossing the boulevard, was the proximate cause of the collision. As stated in Casselman v. Hartford A. & I. Co., 36 Cal.App.2d 700, 708, 98 P.2d 539, 544: "This appellant, in common with many users of the highways, seems to have the impression that every motorist who attempts to enter a main highway from a side road, does so at his peril. This misconception of the law is a prolific source of accidents. As we have shown, such motorist has very definite rights granted to him by the provisions of the Vehicle Code, and those users of the main highway who ignore such rights must be prepared to pay the penalty."

[3] In conclusion, findings of fact VII, VIII and IX, to the effect that during appellant's last 100 feet of approach to said intersection he failed to yield the right of way to respondent and was guilty of negligence contributing to the collision; that the defense of contributory negligence was established; and that appellant's injuries resulted proximately from his own negligence—are supported by the law and the evidence and therefore were properly made by the trial court.

For the reasons stated, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

DORAN and WHITE, JJ., concur.

McCOMB, Justice.

From an order granting defendants' motion to vacate an attachment levied on funds deposited by defendants in two Los Angeles banks, plaintiff appeals.

These are the essential facts:

On October 30, 1943, plaintiff filed a complaint against defendants in the form of a common count for money had and received in the sum of $9,200 and caused a writ of attachment to be levied upon funds which defendants had deposited in two Los Angeles banks. In order to secure the writ of attachment plaintiff's attorney filed an affidavit in which it was alleged that plaintiff's cause of action against defendants arose from the fact that defendants had forcibly robbed plaintiff of the sum of $9,200 on September 10, 1943.

Defendants made a motion to vacate the writ of attachment theretofore issued; at the time of the hearing of the motion to dissolve the writ of attachment plaintiff's attorney filed an affidavit in opposition to the motion to vacate the attachment in which it was alleged that (a) on September 10, 1943, defendants in the city of Baltimore, Maryland, assaulted and robbed plaintiff of the sum of $9,200, and (b) defendants were not residents of the State of California and had left this state. The trial court granted defendants' motion to vacate the attachment theretofore issued.

This is the sole question necessary for us to determine:

Did the trial court err in granting defendants' motion to vacate the writ of attachment which had been issued?

This question must be answered in the affirmative, and is governed by the following principles of law:

[1] (1) An attachment lies in all cases of an implied contract for the payment of money when the defendant is a non-resident of this state. (Section 537, subdivision 2 of the Code of Civil Procedure.)

[3] (3) Even though the original affidavit upon which a writ of attachment has been issued is defective in failing to state that defendant is a non-resident of this state, such defect may be remedied by the filing of an amended affidavit at or before the time of the hearing of a motion to dissolve the attachment. (Runkle v. Lane, 40 Cal.App.2d 654, 656, 105 P.2d 373; Rosenberg v. Bullard, 127 Cal.App. 315, 320, 15 P.2d 870; Hamburger v. Halperm, 28 Cal.App. 317, 318, 152 P. 61; Nichols v. Davis, 23 Cal.App. 67, 69, 137 P. 41.)*

[4] Applying the foregoing rules to the facts of the instant case, as it appears from the affidavits which were on file at the time of the hearing of the motion to vacate the attachment that defendants had stolen money from plaintiff, thereby giving rise to an implied contract for the repayment of the amount of the stolen money; and since it was alleged in the amended affidavit, filed at the time of the hearing, that defendants were non-residents of the State of California, under section 537, subdivision 2 of the Code of Civil Procedure, plaintiff was entitled to an attachment and the motion to dissolve the same should have been denied.

The order from which the appeal is taken is reversed.

MOORE, P. J., and W. J. WOOD, J., concur.

* Fairbanks, Morse & Co., v. Getchell, 13 Cal.App. 458, 463, 110 P. 331; relied on by defendants is inapplicable to the facts of the instant case because in that case there was not any affidavit filed when the attachment was issued and therefore nothing to amend, while in the present case an affidavit was filed when the writ of attachment was issued which was defective, but subject to amendment pursuant to the provisions of section 558 of the Code of Civil Procedure. (See Corum v. Superior Court, 114 Cal.App. 741, 744 et seq., 300 P. 837.)

EVARD v. BOARD OF EDUCATION OF CITY OF BAKERSFIELD et al.

Civ. 3132.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

June 7, 1944.

1. Schools and school districts ⇨141(4)

Where teacher having permanent tenure was employed for a specified time but she left her position before expiration of that time without consent of school board, she was guilty of "unprofessional conduct" within School Code and was subject to statutory penalty provided therefor. MARKS, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment denying plaintiff's petition for a writ of mandate to require defendants to assign plaintiff to a teaching position in the elementary schools of the city of Bakersfield.

Plaintiff had acquired the status of a permanent teacher in the elementary schools of the city of Bakersfield. She was under contract to teach during the school year of 1942-1943. She was married and her husband, a Lieutenant in the United States Army, was stationed at a camp near Mineral Wells, Texas.

Under date of November 23, 1942, she made a request for a leave of absence, effective immediately, to enable her to join her husband in Texas as she believed he was about to be ordered overseas.

On the next day the superintendent of schools wrote plaintiff a letter acknowledging receipt of the request and informing her that it would be placed before the board of education at its next meeting on December 10, 1942. He called her attention to section 28,A, paragraph 8, of the "Rules and Regulations of the Board" providing that: "No leaves of absence will be granted, except for illness or other equally grave emergencies, unless the Superintendent of Schools shall have ascertained that a competent substitute, satisfactory to the Board of Education, is available." He further informed her that finding such a substitute by December 10th was very doubtful but that one might be available at the commencement of the second semester on January 18, 1943. The letter concluded: "In the event that I am unable to find a satisfactory substitute a recommendation to the Board that you be released at the close of the first semester, January 15th, 1943, is much more probable."

The board of education passed the following resolution:

"On motion by Mr. West, seconded by Mr. Meagher, it was ordered that the Board of Education follow the provision set forth in Section 39 of the Rules and Regulations and Section 28,A,8 of the Rules and Regulations, which state in effect that teachers shall not be released from service until a satisfactory substitute has been found and that the Superintendent be authorized to release Roselyn Baumgardt, Rita Evard, Vinetta Laugh, Johannah Long, Betty Kelly and Virginia Hamel in accordance with said sections of the Rules and Regulations of the Board."

Under date of December 14, 1942, plaintiff was informed of the substance of the resolution by a letter which concluded as follows:

"Therefore, your request for leave of absence will be granted if and when a satisfactory substitute can be found.

"Please be assured that every reasonable effort will be made to secure a satisfactory teacher to take your place.

"You will be notified in the event it is possible to grant your leave of absence."

Plaintiff performed her duties as teacher up to and including December 11, 1942, and did not report for duty or teach on December 14th, or thereafter, but left without obtaining a leave of absence. She wrote the superintendent of schools on December 19, 1942, from Mineral Wells, Texas, stating, among other things, that: "Thirty-nine Lieutenants were moved away this week, so you see how indefinite things are, and I would certainly like to return to Bakersfield."

Under date of April 21, 1943, plaintiff sent the following telegram to the superintendent of schools:

"I shall return for duty next September or when the next school year starts. My summer address is 412 Sixth Street, Antioch, California, and my present address is Crazy Hotel, Mineral Wells, Texas."

The minutes of a meeting of the board of education held on May 3, 1943, contains the following:

"The case of Rita Evard, a permanent teacher in the Bakersfield City Schools, who left her position without the written consent of the Board as required in School Code Section 5.380 was discussed. On motion by Mr. Drury, seconded by Mrs. Voorhees, the Superintendent was instructed to address a letter to Mrs. Evard asking for her resignation."

Under date of May 5, 1943, the following letter was written to plaintiff:

"At a meeting of the Board of Education held on May 3rd, 1943, the statement of your intent to return to service was read to the Board.

"The Board desires to call your attention to Section 5.380 of the California School Code, which reads as follows:

"Should any teacher who is the holder of an educational or life diploma and is employed by a board of school trustees for a specified time, leave the school before the expiration of such time, without the consent of the trustees, in writing, said teacher shall be deemed guilty of unprofessional conduct. The superintendent of schools shall report the delinquency of the teacher to the state board of education, who are thereupon authorized to suspend said diploma for a period of one year."

"Under the existing circumstances the Superintendent has been reluctant to file a letter with the State Board of Education as required in School Code Section 5.380, because such action might result in the suspension of your diploma for a period of one year.

"You will appreciate the fact that it is not possible for the Board of Education to permit teachers to leave and return at will.

"The Board of Education believes that inasmuch as you left your position without its written consent, and in violation of School Code Section 5.380, you will consider it your professional obligation to submit your resignation to the Board by return mail. Further action of the Board is pending your immediate reply."

Plaintiff replied to this letter under date of May 12, 1943. She asked reconsideration of her case, stating:

"I realize teachers are not to go and come from their positions at will, but I feel that my case is different as my husband was on foreign orders. I left feeling a substitute could be found, and I did not intend any unprofessional action."

Under date of May 27, 1943, plaintiff was informed that her letter had been submitted to the board of education; that it adhered to the position stated in the letter of May 5th; that as plaintiff left her position without consent and in violation of law she should consider it her professional obligation to submit her resignation.

Under date of July 23, 1943, the following letter was written to plaintiff:

"I have been directed by the Board of Education of the Bakersfield City Schools to file a statement with the County Board of Education requesting a hearing on your case in accordance with School Code Sections 5.390, 5.391 and 5.396.

"However, as a matter of professional courtesy I have requested the Board's permission to notify you of the Board's action and again suggest to you that your resignation be submitted.

"The request for a hearing will be filed with the County Board of Education in the event that your resignation is not received on or before Wednesday, August 4, 1943."

As no resignation was received from plaintiff, charges were filed against her with the County Board of Education. A hearing was held and under date of September 3, 1943, the action of the County Board was communicated to the executive officer of the Bakersfield City Board of Education in the following letter:

"The following is the action of the Kern County Board of Education at the hearing of the Bakersfield City Schools v. Rita Finley Evard.

"After weighing evidence presented by both parties in the case of the Bakersfield City Schools versus Rita Finley Evard requesting that the County Board revoke the County certificate of Mrs. Evard in accordance with the California School Code, Section 5.396, by a five to nothing vote, the County Board denied the petition."

"The County Board feels that any disciplinary action against Mrs. Evard should be taken by the Bakersfield City School District as provided for by law."

Under date of September 13, 1943, plaintiff was informed that at a meeting of the Board of Education of the Bakersfield City Schools, held on September 9, 1943, it was decided that as she had broken her tenure by leaving her position contrary to the provisions of section 5.380 of the School Code she was no longer considered an employee of the Bakersfield City School District. Plaintiff presented herself for duty at the commencement of the school term in September, 1943, and demanded that she be assigned a position as teacher. That demand having been refused she brought this action for reinstatement.

[1] It is admitted that plaintiff had tenure in the Bakersfield City Schools; that she was employed in the Bakersfield City Schools for a specified time and left her position before the expiration of that time without the consent of the trustees of the district. It follows that she was guilty of unprofessional conduct and was subject to the punishment of having her diploma suspended "for a period of one year". Sec. 5.380, School Code. She was also subject to punishment by the county board of education which had power to revoke or suspend her certificate granted by it on proof of unprofessional conduct. Sec. 5.390, School Code. Neither section, as in effect at that time, made suspension of the diploma or certificate mandatory.

[2] Plaintiff argues that as she had permanent tenure in the Bakersfield City Schools she could not be refused reemployment at the commencement of the next school year without previous notice of the termination of her tenure by the school board. The same argument is presented in another form. She maintains that defendants are estopped from now claiming that she has forfeited her tenure, because, instead of notifying her that her tenure was forfeited and that she was no longer a permanent teacher in the Bakersfield City Schools, they requested her resignation which was a recognition of her permanent status and that there was an existing contract of her employment.

We do not construe the evidence before us as supporting either argument. The letter to plaintiff of May 5, 1943, quoted section 5.380 of the School Code in full. This clearly informed her that leaving her position in the middle of the school year without permission in itself made her guilty of unprofessional conduct and made her liable to suspension of her State credentials for one year. The balance of the letter, as well as other correspondence, should have made it clear to plaintiff that although the city board of education had an understanding sympathy with her desire to be with her husband before he went overseas, it regarded her offense seriously and could not condone it; that the request for her resignation was made because defendants did not want the more serious penalty of suspending her State credentials imposed upon her. We find nothing in any of the letters, when reasonably construed which should have led plaintiff to believe that her unauthorized and continued absence would be forgiven or that her tenure would be continued. She left her position after her attention had been called to the rules and regulations of the board which prohibited leaves of absence until the superintendent of schools had ascertained that a competent substitute satisfactory to the board of education was available. In the same letter she was informed of the difficulty of obtaining a satisfactory substitute and that one might be found by January 15, 1943. Disregarding this warning, plaintiff left her position, and by so doing immediately became guilty of unprofessional conduct and subject to the penalties provided therefor. It is difficult to see how any estoppel can be based on any such state of facts.

The important question for decision here is the effect on plaintiff's tenure because of her leaving her position, before the expiration of her contract, without the consent of the board of trustees. The question is answered in the cases of McKee v. Edgar, 137 Cal.App. 462, 30 P.2d 999, and Brightman v. Board of Education, 4 Cal. App.2d 394, 41 P.2d 346. In both cases it is held that a teacher with a permanent status in one school district terminated her tenure in such district when she voluntarily left her employment there, even though she immediately accepted employment in another district under jurisdiction of the same board of education.

[3] Under the rule announced in these cases we must conclude that plaintiff forfeited her tenure in the Bakersfield City School District when she voluntarily ceased her employment with that district without the consent of the school board. The question of her good or bad faith, and the question of her unprofessional conduct, are not necessarily involved here.

[4] Plaintiff argues that in the trial of the charges before the Kern County Board of Education she was found not guilty of unprofessional conduct which is res judicata and decisive of this case. We do not so construe the order of the county board. It merely denied the petition to revoke the county certificate of plaintiff and left disciplinary action to the city board of education. This is very different from finding her not guilty of unprofessional conduct.

[5] As plaintiff voluntarily ceased her employment with the Bakersfield City School District where she had tenure, she voluntarily abandoned her tenure in that district and ceased to be a permanent teacher. McKee v. Edgar, supra; Brightman v. Board of Education, supra. As plaintiff was not a permanent employee of the Bakersfield City School District there was no obligation resting on that district to employ her in September, 1943.

The judgment is affirmed.

A judgment on defendant's plea of guilty under second count of information, charging misdemeanor by inducing minor to obtain, remove, and transport marijuana cigarettes from pocket of defendant's coat in his hotel room, thereby causing such minor to become a law violator, barred prosecution of defendant under first count of information, charging felony of employing, and using such minor to transport and carry such cigarettes. In determining whether conviction of one offense bars prosecution for another offense, regard should be had to type of offense, notions of fairness, and purpose of statute defining crime involved.

13. Criminal law ⇨179, 180

The fact that trial court's dismissal of charge in order to hold defendant for higher offense after jury has been impaneled and sworn bars subsequent prosecution of defendant for higher offense, in which dismissed charge is included, does not preclude court from dismissing charge of lighter offense, after defendant pleads guilty thereof, in order to hold him for higher offense. KNIGHT, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas M. Foley, Judge.

Gene Krupa was convicted of employing or using a minor in unlawfully transporting or carrying a narcotic, and from the judgment on the verdict and orders denying his motions for new trial, in arrest of judgment, and to stay pronouncement of judgment, he appeals.

Appeals from orders denying motions in arrest of judgment and to stay pronouncement thereof dismissed, and judgment of conviction and order denying motion for new trial reversed.

J. W. Ehrlich, of San Francisco (Roy A. Sharff and Alfred M. Miller, both of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., and David K. Lener, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

PETERS, Presiding Justice.

[1] After a trial by jury, defendant was found guilty of a violation of section 11714 of the Health and Safety Code, St.1939, p. 772. From the judgment of conviction, and from the orders denying his motions for a new trial, in arrest of judgment, and to stay the pronouncement of judgment, he prosecutes this appeal. The orders denying his motions in arrest of judgment and to stay pronouncement of judgment are not appealable, but are reviewable on the appeal from the judgment. For this reason the direct appeals from such orders must be dismissed. People v. Williams, 184 Cal. 590, 194 P. 1019; People v. Fitzgerald, 14 Cal.App.2d 180, 58 P.2d 718; see cases collected 8 Cal.Jur. p. 492, sec. 508.

The information, as originally framed and as amended, contained two counts. The first count charged a violation of section 11714 of the Health and Safety Code, a felony. That section provides: "Every person who hires, employs, or uses a minor in unlawfully transporting, carrying, selling, preparing for sale, peddling, or using any narcotic is guilty of a felony punishable by imprisonment in the State prison for not less than one year nor more than six years, and for each subsequent offense shall be imprisoned in the State prison for not less than six years." The second count charged a violation of section 702, Welfare and Institutions Code, St.1937, p.

1033, that is, contributing to the delinquency of a minor, a misdemeanor.

When arraigned, defendant pleaded guilty to the misdemeanor charge and not guilty to the felony charge. He also interposed the plea, as to count one, that the judgment about to be entered upon his plea of guilty to count two, would be a conviction of the same offense charged in count one. The court, with full knowledge that defendant intended to rely on the judgment of conviction under count two, pronounced judgment on that count and sentenced appellant to ninety days imprisonment and a fine of $500. The court then ruled that conviction of count two was not a bar to a prosecution of count one, and the case proceeded to trial on that count.

[2] The evidence produced on the trial amply supports the judgment. It shows that on the night of January 18, 1943, Krupa instructed his valet and property man Pateakos, a minor of the age of twenty years, to go to his, Krupa's hotel room and remove an envelope from his coat pocket; that Pateakos removed the envelope which contained thirty-seven marijuana cigarettes from Krupa's coat pocket; that he was attempting to leave the hotel with that envelope, and another containing two and one-half such cigarettes, removed by Pateakos from the desk in Krupa's room, when he, Pateakos, was arrested by two agents of the Federal Bureau of Narcotics. This evidence obviously supports the implied finding of the jury that appellant employed or used "a minor in unlawfully transporting" or "carrying" a "narcotic" in violation of section 11714 of the Health and Safety Code.

On this appeal, no direct attack is made upon the sufficiency of the evidence. However, in addition to the main contention of double jeopardy, appellant does contend that several other serious, prejudicial, and reversible errors were committed at the trial. In view of the conclusion that we have come to on the question of jeopardy, it is not necessary to discuss these other alleged errors.

[3] Count one of the amended information charged a violation of section 11714 of the Health and Safety Code in the following language: "The said Gene Krupa, on or about the 18th day of January, A. D. nineteen hundred and forty-three, at the City and County of San Francisco, did hire, employ and use one John Pateakos, a minor of the age of twenty years, in unlawfully transporting and carrying a quantity of cigarettes containing a narcotic, to-wit: marihuana, also known as cannabis indica and also as cannabis americana."

The second count, as set forth in the amended information, is as follows: "Gene Krupa is also accused by the District Attorney of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, by this information, of the crime of misdemeanor, to-wit: Violation of Section 702 of the Welfare and Institutions Code of the State of California committed as follows: The said Gene Krupa on or about the 18th day of January A. D. nineteen hundred and forty-three at the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, did endeavor to induce and persuade and did induce and persuade one John Pateakos, a male minor of the age of twenty years, to go to the room of him, the said Gene Krupa and obtain and remove and transport therefrom from a pocket of a coat located therein an envelope containing a quantity of narcotic, to-wit: marihuana, also known as cannabis indica, and also known as cannabis americana, and said Gene Krupa did also then and there permit and allow said John Pateakos to handle and have in the possession of said John Pateakos cigarettes containing marihuana, the said John Pateakos being then and there in the employ of said Gene Krupa, all of which wilful and unlawful acts and course of conduct of said Gene Krupa as aforesaid did thereby, then and there, manifestly tend to, and did encourage, cause and contribute to the said John Pateakos becoming and remaining such a person as is described in said Section 700 of said Welfare and Institutions Code, St.1939, p. 3027, to-wit: A person under twenty-one years of age who violates any law of this State or any ordinance of any town, city, or county, of this State defining crime contrary to the form, force and effect of the Statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the People of the State of California."

It will be noted that the second count charges that the appellant violated section 702 of the Welfare and Institutions Code in that he induced the minor to do an act which tended to cause, and caused, the minor to become a law violator. The minor's violation of law, as alleged in the information, was to "obtain" marihuana from the pocket of a coat in appellant's room, and to "remove and transport" the marihuana thus obtained.

The Attorney General, in his brief as originally filed in support of the judgment, argued that the two offenses were not necessarily identical because, consistently with the information, the marihuana referred to in count one may not have been the same marihuana referred to in count two. In a letter written after this brief was filed, however, he requested that this portion of his brief be stricken and disregarded. The Attorney General now concedes (and the concession is in accord with the facts) that both counts in the amended information relate to the same incident, that is, to the minor obtaining the marihuana from Krupa's coat pocket and carrying it on his person until he was apprehended. Among other things, the letter states: "Count Two as amended in our opinion is not substantially different than Count One. There is additional language used in Count Two as amended relating to possession which it would appear may be implied in the allegations of Count One." Thus it is now admitted that the only possession of marihuana by the minor involved in either count was the possession involved in the coat pocket incident described in detail in count two. This is of considerable importance. It has been held in prosecutions for violations of the liquor laws that where the only possession shown is that incident to transporting the liquor, and it does not appear that there was a prior or subsequent possession, the possession and transportation may not be treated as two separate offenses. People v. Clementt, 208 Cal. 142, 280 P. 681; In re Chaus, 92 Cal.App. 384, 268 P. 422; People v. Buchanan, 106 Cal.App.Supp. 765, 288 P. 50; Schroeder v. United States, 2 Cir., 7 F.2d 60. See note 74 A.L.R. 411, citing also cases contra. Since there admittedly was no possession here except that involved in the coat pocket incident, it cannot be held that count two is based in part on a different violation of law by the minor, that is, on a separate unlawful possession not incident to the unlawful transportation which is the basis of count one.

[4] The statements of the law applicable to the doctrine of double jeopardy are by no means clear, and in some respects inconsistent. See, generally, for traditional statements of the rule, 1 Bishop's Criminal Law, 9th Ed., p. 776; 1 Wharton's Criminal Law, 12th Ed., p. 535, sec.

394; 2 Freeman on Judgments, 5th Ed., p. 1370, sec. 650; 7 Cal.Jur. p. 955, sec. 97; 15 Am.Jur. p. 53, sec. 380. As stated by the Supreme Court of this state, in its more recent decisions, the rule is that a defendant may be convicted of two offenses when they differ in their necessary elements and one is not necessarily included within the other. People v. Craig, 17 Cal. 2d 453, 110 P.2d 403; People v. Warren, 16 Cal.2d 103, 104 P.2d 1024; People v. Herbert, 6 Cal.2d 541, 58 P.2d 909; People v. Coltrin, 5 Cal.2d 649, 55 P.2d 1161; People v. Day, 199 Cal. 78, 248 P. 250. That is, although offenses are not the same, if one is necessarily included in the other, the guaranty against double jeopardy applies. Under all tests, the doctrine of included offenses is recognized. Section 1023, Penal Code, provides: "When the defendant is convicted or acquitted, or has been once placed in jeopardy upon an indictment or information, the conviction, acquittal, or jeopardy is a bar to another indictment or information for the offense charged in the former, or for an attempt to commit the same, or for an offense necessarily included therein, of which he might have been convicted under that indictment or information." Thus it is held that every battery includes an assault, as do mayhem, rape and robbery. People v. McDaniels, 137 Cal. 192, 197, 69 P. 1006, 59 L.R.A. 578, 92 Am.St.Rep. 81; People v. Defoor, 100 Cal. 150, 34 P. 642. Murder includes manslaughter. People v. Ny Sam Chung, 94 Cal. 304, 29 P. 642, 28 Am.St.Rep. 129.

[5] Section 1023 in terms applies where the prosecution for the higher offense is first. But it is thoroughly settled that the same rule applies where the prosecution for the lesser offense comes first. People v. McDaniels, supra; People v. Ny Sam Chung, supra. Where prosecution for the included offense is first, and there is an acquittal, the defendant may not thereafter be tried for the greater, for if he is not guilty of the lesser included offense he cannot be guilty of the greater. A conviction of the lesser is held to be a bar to prosecution for the greater on the theory that to convict of the greater would be to convict twice of the lesser. These propositions are developed at length in People v. McDaniels and People v. Ny Sam Chung, supra.

[6] It should also be noted that even where crimes arising from the same incident are distinct and non-inclusive in the sense that each requires an element not essential to the other, an acquittal in one may bar prosecution for the other. Where offenses possess a common element, as well as distinct elements, an acquittal, where it can be shown to be a decision negating the existence of the required element, will be res judicata in those jurisdictions which recognize that doctrine as obtaining in criminal proceedings. See 2 Freeman on Judgments, 5th Ed., p. 1364, sec. 648; 24 Minn.L.Rev. 558; 19 Minn.L.Rev. 476; 10 Wash.L.Rev. 198.

[7] It is clear that where an offense cannot be accomplished without necessarily committing another offense, the latter is a necessarily included offense. If, in the commission of acts denounced by one statute, the offender must always violate another, the one offense is necessarily included in the other. In the case herein a violation of section 11714, Health and Safety Code, inevitably and necessarily involves a violation of section 702, Welfare and Institutions Code. It is impossible for a person to commit a violation of section 11714 of the Health and Safety Code without committing the misdemeanor denounced by section 702 of the Welfare and Institutions Code. The person who uses a minor to unlawfully transport a narcotic has necessarily induced the minor to do an act which renders the minor a person subject to section 700, Welfare and Institutions Code, that is, a person who has violated a law of the state, section 11160 of the Health and Safety Code, St.1941, p. 2820, and this constitutes an offense under section 702 on the part of the person who has thus induced the minor to violate the law.

[8-10] To repeat, section 11714, Health and Safety Code, cannot be violated without also offending against section 702, Welfare and Institutions Code. Having regard for the incident upon which both counts are admittedly based, as set forth in count two, exactly the same facts were required to prove an offense under count one as to establish a crime under count two. Every element of the felony charge was necessary and indispensable to a conviction of the misdemeanor charge.

While it is true that section 11714 cannot be violated without offending also against section 702, it is apparent, as respondent urges, that the converse is not true. A person may violate section 702, that is, contribute to the delinquency of a minor, otherwise than by causing such minor to become a law violator, or by causing him to violate a law dealing with another subject than narcotics. If a violation of section 702 always involved a violation of section 11714 (as a violation of section 11714 always involves a violation of section 702) the offenses would be identical in the sense that neither would involve an element not necessary for the other. But, as we have said above, the cases are clear that the principle of double jeopardy applies where one offense is necessarily included in the other, as well as where they are identical. It is of the nature of included offenses that the included offense may be committed without accomplishing the inclusive offense.

In the instant case, the essence of both offenses charged against appellant was the commission of acts which contributed or tended to contribute to the delinquency of a minor. It is not necessary to establish an offense under section 702 that the minor should actually have been debauched or corrupted. People v. Kinser, 99 Cal. App. 778, 279 P. 488. Nor is such proof necessary to constitute the crime under section 11714. Under section 702 the offense of contributing to the delinquency of a minor is a misdemeanor. Likewise, some other violations of the code provisions dealing with narcotics are misdemeanors. See sections 11710-11716, Health and Safety Code. But under section 11714, where a minor is used to unlawfully transport, carry, sell, etc., any narcotic, the person thus using the minor is guilty of a felony. Though not expressed, the apparent reason for increasing the grade of crime above that which prevails generally as to narcotic offenses is the tendency of the act denounced by section 11714 to contribute to the delinquency of the minor. Viewed in relation to section 702, where contributing to the delinquency of a minor takes the form of using the minor unlawfully to transport narcotics, the offender is subject to prosecution under section 11714, which creates a felony carrying a heavier penalty than section 702. However, the person accused should not also be subject to the misdemeanor penalty. He is liable to prosecution under either section, but a conviction or acquittal of an offense under one bars prosecution under the other. Where the state instead of prosecuting first for the offense which carries the heavier penalty, prosecutes for the offense which carries the lighter penalty, or accepts a plea of guilty to that offense, it is without right thereafter to prosecute for the offense which carries the heavier penalty. This follows from the thoroughly settled principle that a conviction or acquittal of an included offense bars prosecution for the greater offense. People v. McDaniels, supra.

[11] By way of illustration, robbery is of the first degree where perpetrated by torture or by a person armed with a dangerous or deadly weapon. Sec. 211a, Penal Code. This does not mean that where the robbery is thus committed the defendant may be punished for both robbery of the first degree and for robbery of the second degree, the offense he would have committed had he acted otherwise than he did in fact, that is, if he had accomplished the crime without torture or use of such weapon. So in the present case the defendant may not be convicted of both a felony and a misdemeanor on the basis of the same incident because if he had contributed to the delinquency of the minor otherwise than he did in fact he could have been prosecuted for a misdemeanor only.

The principle of included offenses is recognized in the rule, referred to above, that every battery includes an assault, as do mayhem, rape and robbery. People v. McDaniels, supra; People v. Defoor, supra. We have heretofore referred to the cases arising under liquor laws in which it has been held that the possession involved in the transportation of liquor may not be prosecuted after conviction or acquittal on charges of transportation. People v. Clemett, supra; In re Chaus, supra; People v. Buchanan, supra; Schroeder v. United States, supra. In People v. Lopez, 46 Cal. App.2d 857, 117 P.2d 10, section 1159, Penal Code, was involved. It provides: "The jury may find the defendant guilty of any offense, the commission of which is necessarily included in that with which he is charged, or of an attempt to commit the offense." The defendant was charged with aiding and abetting her co-defendant in commission of statutory rape. She was found guilty of contributing to the delinquency of a minor, that is, violation of section 702, Welfare and Institutions Code. She contended that the offense of which she was convicted was not necessarily included in the offense charged. The judgment against her was affirmed.

In the case of some included offenses, an additional element is required to establish the greater offense, as with assault and battery. In the present case it is not even required that additional facts be proved. The identical facts which are required to convict under count two constitute a violation of section 11714.

As already pointed out, it is the law that a defendant may be convicted of two offenses when they differ in their necessary elements and one is not necessarily included within the other. People v. Craig, supra; People v. Warren, supra; People v. Herbert, supra; People v. Coltrin, supra. Thus in People v. Coltrin, supra, it was held that two separate non-inclusive offenses are committed where the victim dies of an illegal abortion. Neither offense necessarily involves the commission of the other. Abortion does not necessarily involve the death of the victim, and murder may be committed otherwise than in the perpetration of an illegal abortion. Moreover, where death results from an abortion the wrongdoer has accomplished two wrongs. He has put an end to the embryo, as well as to the victim of the illegal operation. But a violation of section 11714 necessarily constitutes a violation of section 702.

Statutory rape and incest arising out of the same act have been held to constitute separate non-inclusive crimes. People v. McCollum, 116 Cal.App. 55, 2 P.2d 432. Each requires proof of an element not essential to the other, incest, the prohibited relationship, rape, want of consent, actual or constructive. Either may be committed without the other. Where the offender commits both offenses by means of a single act his conduct is doubly wrong. He should be punished for both crimes, although they arise from a single act. But a violation of section 11714 cannot be accomplished without violating section 702.

Death resulting from reckless driving affords another illustration of separate non-inclusive offenses. People v. Herbert, 6 Cal.2d 541, 58 P.2d 909. Where death ensues from reckless driving the offense of manslaughter is complete. But manslaughter may arise otherwise than through automobile injury and death. Conversely the offense of reckless driving is complete although there is no injury to person or property.

In People v. Day, 199 Cal. 78, 248 P. 250, the question decided was that assault by means or force likely to produce great bodily injury (sec. 245, Penal Code) and the crime denounced by section 244, Penal Code, were separate, non-inclusive offenses. Section 244 provides: "Every person who willfully and maliciously places or throws, or causes to be placed or thrown, upon the person of another, any vitriol, corrosive acid, or caustic chemical of any nature, with the intent to injure the flesh or disfigure the body of such person, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not less than one nor more than fourteen years." It is apparent that an assault by means or force likely to produce great bodily injury could occur by other force or means than vitriol, corrosive acid, or caustic chemical. But to establish the separate, non-inclusive character of the two offenses the opinion found it necessary to demonstrate that there could be a violation of section 244 without inevitably committing an assault by means or force likely to produce great bodily injury. This the court did by holding that the crime under section 244 would be accomplished although the vitriol, corrosive acid, or caustic chemical thrown was so small in quantity or weak in strength as to be incapable of producing great bodily injury. Illustrations could be multiplied indefinitely.

The decisions in People v. Stangler, 18 Cal.2d 688, 117 P.2d 321, and People v. Bevans, 19 Cal.App.2d 288, 65 P.2d 92, are not inconsistent with these conclusions. In the Stangler case the defendant was charged in separate counts with statutory rape and violation of section 288, Penal Code (lewd and lascivious acts upon the body of a child under 14), based upon the same incident. He was acquitted of violating section 288, but convicted of rape. He contended that the verdicts were inconsistent and that the acquittal of violation of section 288 was, therefore, an acquittal of rape. Statutory rape does not inevitably involve a violation of section 288, for the offense under that section must be committed upon the body of a child under the age of fourteen, whereas statutory rape is perpetrated where the female is under eighteen. Although there is some confusing language in this case, it is clear that the court did not purport to overthrow the law as set forth in extenso in such cases as People v. Coltrin, supra; People v. Herbert, supra, and People v. Day, supra. As to effect of inconsistent verdicts generally, see 43 Harv.L.Rev. 657; 28 Mich.L.Rev. 339; 14 Cal.L.Rev. 336; 10 So.Cal.L.Rev. 208. It should also be pointed out that it appears from an examination of the record in People v. Stangler that insofar as the information charged violation of section 288, it was not based on the rape proper, but on acts preceding it, which, it has been held, may constitute a separate offense. People v. Jameson, 136 Cal.App. 10, 27 P.2d 935; People v. McAfee, 82 Cal.App. 389, 405, 255 P. 839.

In the Bevans case, supra, the defendant was convicted on two counts, one charging contributing to the delinquency of a minor, the other violation of section 288. The court pointed out that one act was proved which would not come under the provisions of section 288, Penal Code, as it was not "upon or with the body, or any part or member thereof" of the child, but which was clearly denounced by the juvenile court law.

[12] It has been said that no rule of thumb is adequate to all cases; that any single test may reach absurd or unjust results in particular cases. 24 Minn.L.Rev. 556, 562; 22 C.J.S., Criminal Law, § 278, p. 414. Regard should be had to the type of offense, notions of fairness, and the purpose of the statute defining the crime involved, etc. 18 Cal.L.Rev. 171. In the case herein it is obvious that fairness requires that the defendant should not be punished twice for what he did.

It is true that the effect of this holding is that defendant escapes punishment for the more serious offense, violation of section 11714, Health and Safety Code, a felony, and suffers only the lighter punishment prescribed for an offense under section 702, Welfare and Institutions Code, a misdemeanor. This result does not, necessarily, show a weakness in the law. The doctrine that no man shall be put in jeopardy twice for the same offense is based upon sound and fundamental principles, which are recognized by both the federal and state constitutions. The fault in the present case, if any there be, lies in the procedure adopted. It was within the discretion of the law enforcement authorities to prosecute defendant for either the felony or the misdemeanor. They elected to frame an information charging the two identical offenses. This made it possible for the defendant to adopt the procedure he did.

[13] It should also be pointed out that the record shows that the plea to both counts was made at the same time. Judgment was not pronounced on the plea of guilty to the second count until after defendant had made his plea of not guilty and double jeopardy to the first count. The court, therefore, pronounced judgment on count two knowing that defendant intended to rely on that judgment in bar of the felony charge. An examination of the pertinent code sections indicates that the trial court, instead of accepting the plea of guilty to count two, and pronouncing judgment thereon, had it desired to hold defendant for the higher offense, could very likely have dismissed the second count, even after plea, and have refused to enter judgment therein. Section 1021 of the Penal Code provides: "If the defendant was formerly acquitted on the grounds of variance between the indictment or information and the proof, or the indictment or information was dismissed upon an objection to its form or substance, or in order to hold the defendant for a higher offense, without a judgment of acquittal, it is not an acquittal of the same offense." (Italics added.)

The above section recognizes a right in the court to dismiss a charge in order to hold the defendant for a higher offense. It is not provided that the dismissal must be made before plea. It has been held that a dismissal made to hold for a higher offense after a jury has been impaneled and sworn, that is, after jeopardy has attached, will bar a subsequent prosecution for a higher offense in which the dismissed charge is included. People v. Ny Sam Chung, 94 Cal. 304, 29 P. 642, 28 Am.St. Rep. 129; People v. Hunckeler, 48 Cal. 331; 7 Cal.Jur. 944, 949, 953; see also People v. Horowitz, 131 Cal.App.Supp. 791, 19 P.2d 874. But it does not follow that where the defendant has not submitted himself to trial, but has offered a plea of guilty to the count charging the lighter offense, that the court is without right to dismiss that count in order to hold the defendant for the higher offense.

There are also sections 1385 and 1387, Penal Code. Section 1385 provides: "The court may, either of its own motion or upon the application of the district attorney, and in furtherance of justice, order an action or indictment to be dismissed. The reasons of the dismissal must be set forth in an order entered upon the minutes." By section 1387 it is provided that the order for dismissal is not a bar if the offense is a felony. People v. Smith, 143 Cal. 597, 77

P. 449; People v. Brown, 42 Cal.App. 462, 183 P. 829; People v. Saenz, 50 Cal.App. 382, 195 P. 442.

As to justices' courts there is a specific section, section 1429, Penal Code, which permits the judge to reject a plea to the lesser offense in order to hold the defendant for the greater. It provides in part as follows: "* * * If the defendant pleads guilty, the court may, before entering such plea or pronouncing judgment, examine witnesses to ascertain the gravity of the offense committed; and if it appear to the court that a higher offense has been committed than the offense charged in the complaint, the court may order the defendant to be committed or admitted to bail, to answer any indictment which may be found against him by the grand jury, or any information which may be filed by the district attorney."

If sections 1021, 1385 and 1387 of the Penal Code, referred to above, are not broad enough to enable the superior court to reject the plea of guilty to the lesser offense in order to hold the defendant for the greater, then the matter calls for legislative rectification.

The appeals from the orders denying the motions for arrest of judgment and to stay pronouncement of the judgment are dismissed. The judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial are reversed.

WARD, J., concurs.

KNIGHT, Justice (dissenting).

I dissent upon the following grounds: First, the reversal of the conviction in my opinion is based not only on a misconstruction of material portions of the record, but also on legal theories which are out of line with the established law of this state as declared in numerous decisions dealing with the question of double jeopardy. Secondly, it will be noted that factually the reversal rests entirely upon the assumption that both counts of the amended information involved but one identical act and that this assumption is based upon the single sentence of a letter written by the attorney general and submitted to this court after the briefs were filed, which the majority opinion interprets to be a concession on the part of the people that both counts of the information involve only one identical act. But when this letter, consisting as it does of two pages, is read as a whole, in the light of the purpose for which it was written, it becomes apparent that the majority opinion has misinterpreted the purport of this single sentence. In any event, the record itself must control in the determination of the appeal, and as will hereinafter be demonstrated, the factual assumption upon which the majority opinion is founded is not only clearly negated by the allegations of the second count of the amended information, but it is directly contrary to position taken by the prosecution throughout the trial of the case and in opposing appellant's motions for new trial and arrest of judgment; also contrary to the conclusion reached by the trial court in denying these motions. Moreover, it is directly contrary to the position taken by the appellant himself while testifying at the trial as a witness in his own behalf. Thirdly, section 1041 of the Penal Code declares that a plea of once in jeopardy raises an issue of fact. It becomes an issue of law only when the facts are undisputed. People v. Wilkison, 30 Cal.App. 473, 158 P. 1067; People v. Conson, 72 Cal.App. 509, 237 P. 799. Here at the trial appellant himself treated the issue as a disputed issue of fact, and it was submitted to the determination of the jury as such pursuant to instructions proposed by appellant; the jury found against appellant on that contested issue, and as will hereinafter be shown, the testimony of the defendant himself supports the jury's conclusion. However, the majority opinion fails to give any consideration to this aspect of the case.

Turning to the record itself, the facts and circumstances leading up to the arrest of appellant as they are shown by the evidence of the prosecution, which in view of the verdict must be taken as true, are as follows: At the time of trial the appellant, Gene Krupa, was 34 years old, a musician, and the proprietor and leader of a band which played in night clubs and theatres. Appellant played the drums. Marijuana is a narcotic plant, the growing, possession, transporting, selling or giving away of which constitutes separate criminal offenses. See Articles 1 and 4, Division 10, Chapter 7, Health & Safety Code. The plant is dried and smoked in the form of cigarettes, and when inhaled deeply, causes unpredictable results, one of its effects being to distort time. If used by a musician it will cause him to "play faster without feeling the effects of doing it." At the time of appellant's arrest, his band was filling an engagement at a theatre in San Francisco, and he was staying at one of the leading hotels. The adjoining room to his was occupied by his manager, there being a connecting door between the two rooms. Prior to the opening of his engagement in San Francisco he filled one in Los Angeles, and while doing so hired a boy named John Pateakos as valet and property man, whose chief duty was to take care of appellant's clothing, particularly the suits he wore; and he brought the boy to San Francisco with him. On the night of January 18, 1943, three agents from the federal bureau of narcotics, named Guibbini, Grady and Polcuch, having been informed that appellant was in the possession of marijuana cigarettes, called at appellant's dressing room in the theatre in which he was playing, to interview him regarding the information they had received. Pateakos was present at the beginning of the interview, but the agents requested him to leave the room, which he did. After identifying themselves as federal narcotic agents, they asked appellant if he had any marijuana on his person or in his room, and he denied having any. They told him they had been informed that he did have a quantity of marijuana in his possession, and he replied that there was nothing to the information. They then asked him if they might search his dressing room, and he told them to "go ahead." While they were doing so Guibbini asked appellant if he had ever used marijuana, and appellant stated that he had at one time, about 10 years ago, but that lately he had had nothing to do with it. While the search was going on, appellant asked permission to leave the room to go out and wash. He was allowed to do so, but as soon as he left Guibbini followed him and he observed appellant about halfway up the stairs leading to the second floor engaged in earnest conversation with Pateakos. Guibbini separated them, and brought appellant back to his dressing room, where he was further questioned. Guibbini thereupon went to a phone and instructed the room clerk at the hotel where appellant was staying to allow no one except appellant to enter the latter's room. Guibbini then proceeded to the hotel, leaving Polcuch with appellant. As Guibbini got out of the elevator at the hall leading to appellant's room, he saw Pateakos waiting to enter the elevator. He brought Pateakos back to the room adjoining appellant's occupied by the manager of the band, who was there present, and upon searching Pateakos found in his pocket two envelopes, one containing 37 marijuana cigarettes and the other containing two whole ones, and one-half of one partially smoked. Shortly thereafter, Polcuch and Grady arrived with appellant, and Polcuch and Guibbini took him to his room, where the officers found some fragments of marijuana in a drawer of a writing desk. Appellant denied having anything to do with the marijuana cigarettes or the fragments found. He was then taken back to the adjoining room, and Pateakos was taken to appellant's room. Pateakos refused then to make a statement in explanation of his possession of the marijuana cigarettes. He admitted having them in his pocket, but he denied knowing anything about marijuana. He was then returned to the room where appellant was, and appellant stated if the boy had the marijuana cigarettes on him, it was his worry and not his (appellant's); that he did not have anything to do with it. The agents then took Pateakos to their office, where he made a statement, and appellant was placed under arrest the following day.

Pateakos appeared as a witness against appellant at the preliminary examination, but shortly afterwards disappeared, and was unavailable at the trial. The substance of the testimony given by him at the preliminary examination was as follows: He was 20 years of age, and his home was in New Bedford, Massachusetts. He had been employed at the Paladium at Hollywood, where appellant employed him as his valet and property man. Part of his duties were to "carry" all of appellant's "clothes along," and "assist him at his room." After leaving appellant's dressing room at the theatre at the time of the visit of the federal agents, appellant came out and overtook him about half way up the stairs; and appellant told him to go to his room and get an envelope in his coat pocket. In obedience to this request he ran to the hotel and went to the clerk's office to get the key to appellant's room, but was told they were not supposed to give out the key. He then went to a "bell hop" he knew, who let him into appellant's room, where he got the envelope from a pocket of appellant's coat. It was in the closet. The envelope was open, and contained marijuana cigarettes. After leaving the room he recalled that one day while in the room the drawer to the writing desk was open and he had noticed two and a half marijuana cigarettes in the drawer, so he told the bell boy he had forgotten something and returned to the room, where he took these two and a half cigarettes and placed them in an envelope and took them with him. At the elevator he met Guibbini, who took him to the band manager's room, searched him, and found the two envelopes containing the marijuana cigarettes from the clothing he wore.

The bellboy corroborated Pateakos' testimony. He testified that he let Pateakos into the room at the time indicated and saw him remove the envelope from the clothes in the closet and put it in his pocket; that he let him into the room the second time when Pateakos stated in the hall he had forgotten something; that he saw Pateakos take another envelope from the writing desk; that when he let Pateakos in the room he was unaware of the instructions to the clerk to permit no one but appellant to enter his room.

Section 11712 of the Health and Safety Code deals with the possession of narcotics. It provides that any person convicted of having possession of any narcotic is punishable by imprisonment in the county jail or the state prison. Section 11713 of the same code deals with the act of transportation of narcotics. It provides that any person convicted of transporting, selling, or giving away any narcotics is punishable by imprisonment in the county jail or the state prison. The element of transportation is not included in the former section, nor is the element of possession included in the latter. They constitute separate offenses under the different sections. Section 11714 of said code declares that every person who hires, employs or uses a minor in unlawfully transporting or carrying any narcotic is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison. This section makes no mention of possession.

The juvenile law has been made a part of the Welfare and Institutions Code, and section 702 thereof provides among other things that any person who commits an act which causes or tends to cause or encourage a minor to come within the provisions of the juvenile law as specified in section 700 thereof is guilty of a misdemeanor, and among the acts specified in section 700 is the violation of any law of this state.

Under the authority of the provisions of the two statutes above mentioned and in view of the facts developed at the preliminary examination, the district attorney on February 2, 1943, filed an information against the appellant charging him in separate counts with having violated both the Health and Safety Code and the juvenile law. The first count charged appellant with having violated section 11714 of the Health and Safety Code, to-wit, with having employed and used Pateakos "in unlawfully transporting and carrying a quantity of cigarettes containing a narcotic." By the second count he was charged with having committed two acts in violation of the juvenile law: (1) By inducing Pateakos "to keep" a quantity of narcotics in his, Pateakos', room; and (2) by permitting and allowing Pateakos to "handle and have in the possession of said John Pateakos" cigarettes containing marijuana, all of which it was alleged did cause and contribute to the said Pateakos "becoming and remaining such a person as is described" in section 700 of the juvenile law, to-wit, a person who violates any law of this state." Appellant moved to dismiss the information and filed a demurrer thereto, but on April 19, 1943, before any ruling was made on his motion or demurrer, he entered a plea of guilty to the second count and asked for probation. The cause was then continued from time to time until May 17, 1943, on which date the district attorney filed an amended information. Count 1 as originally filed was not changed, but count 2 was. The charge made in the original count 2 that appellant induced Pateakos "to keep" narcotics in his room was omitted, and it was charged in the amended count 2(1) that appellant induced and persuaded Pateakos to "obtain and remove and transport" from the pocket of appellant's coat an envelope containing a quantity of narcotics; and (2) that he permitted and allowed Pateakos "to handle and have in the possession" of Pateakos cigarettes containing marijuana, all of which did encourage and cause and contribute to Pateakos becoming a person such as is described in section 700 of the juvenile law, to-wit, a minor who violates any law of this state. In other words, in count 2 as amended appellant was charged with having induced Pateakos to violate two separate sections of the Health and Safety Code, to-wit, (1) possession of narcotics, Sec. 11712; and (2) transporting narcotics, Sec. 11713. On the day following the filing of the information appellant was again arraigned and the minutes of the court as originally entered recited the following: "Thereupon, the defendant, Gene Krupa, pleads that he is not guilty as charged in count one of the amended information, and not guilty by reason of a former holding; and guilty to count two of the amended information"; whereupon appellant interposed a motion for probation. (It should be here stated, however, that after the clerk's transcript was filed herein the trial court made a nunc pro tunc order correcting the minutes so that as corrected the plea of once in jeopardy was legally sufficient to meet the requirements of subdivision 4 of section 1017 of the Penal Code.) On the same day that appellant asked for probation his motion was denied, and he was sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail for ninety days and fined $500; thereafter and on June 29, 1943, he was brought to trial before a jury on the second count.

On account of the disappearance of Pateakos the testimony given by him at the preliminary examination was read to the jury. Appellant became a witness in his own behalf, and in contradiction of the denials he had made to the federal agents on the night of January 18th he admitted that all of the marijuana cigarettes which had been taken from his clothes belonged to him. In this connection he testified that he brought them to San Francisco from Los Angeles in the clothing which Pateakos was required to take care of, and that he had smoked part of one of the cigarettes after coming to San Francisco. He further admitted that while in San Francisco the cigarettes were kept in the clothes Pateakos was required to take care of, and that Pateakos "handled the clothes every day in the week." He denied, however, that he had asked Pateakos on the night in question to remove them from the pockets of his clothes. He was asked why he pleaded guilty to count 2 wherein he had been charged with having done so, and in reply he went on to say that he was advised by his attorney that it was against the "rule" in California to have a minor around where there was marijuana cigarettes, and that Pateakos had taken care of his, appellant's room, his laundry, and clothes. In other words, the purport of his testimony was that he had pleaded guilty to that portion of the charge that he had allowed Pateakos to "handle" and have possession of the cigarettes, but that he was not guilty of the other act charged therein, to-wit, that he had induced the boy to transport and carry the cigarettes. In that state of the record the issue of double jeopardy was submitted to the determination of the jury pursuant to two instructions, one of which was proposed by appellant, and was as follows: "It appears from the evidence in this case that Gene Krupa pleaded guilty on the 19th day of May, 1943, in this Superior Court to the charge of contributing to the delinquency of John Pateakos, a minor, committed by allowing said John Pateakos to have and handle the marijuana cigarettes involved in the prosecution now before you and by persuading said John Pateakos to obtain and remove and transport said cigarettes from the pocket of a coat, and therefore, if you find the present information charges the same offense the defendant is twice in jeopardy and entitled to an acquittal." Upon the evidence before it the jury returned a verdict finding appellant guilty, which necessarily carried with it the implied finding that the act of allowing Pateakos to handle and have possession of the marijuana cigarettes was not the same act involved in the charge of inducing Pateakos to transport and carry the cigarettes, on which charge appellant was then on trial; and as stated, the testimony of appellant himself is legally sufficient to support the conclusion reached by the jury.

Even assuming, however, that this court, in the exercise of its reviewing powers, has the right to disregard the conclusion reached by the jury and the evidence supporting it, and may, contrary thereto and as a matter of law, hold that the handling, transportation, possession and carrying constituted one transaction, the judgment in my opinion should nevertheless be affirmed, for regardless of whatever may be the rule in other jurisdictions, it is the well settled law of this state "that a plea of once in jeopardy * * * is not good unless the second prosecution is for the same offense, both in law and in fact, as that for which the first prosecution was instituted." 7 Cal.Jur. 955. In other words, the established rule is that a defendant may be convicted on two or more separate offenses arising out of the same transaction where each is stated in a separate count and when the offenses differ in their elements and one is not included in the other. The real test is the identity of the offenses, as distinguished from the identity of the transaction from which they arise. People v. Hoyt, 20 Cal.2d 306, 125 P.2d 29; People v. Venable, 25 Cal. App.2d 73, 76 P.2d 523; People v. Bevans, 19 Cal.App.2d 288, 65 P.2d 92; People v. Coltrin, 5 Cal.2d 649, 55 P.2d 1161; People v. Warren, 16 Cal.2d 103, 104 P.2d 1024; People v. Zimmer, 23 Cal.App.2d 581, 73 P.2d 923. The same doctrine is stated in 15 Am.Jur. at page 63 as follows: "A single act may constitute two or more distinct and separate offenses, and a person charged therewith may be convicted and punished for both. Prosecutions of a person for separate offenses based upon the same transaction do not involve double jeopardy where there are distinct elements in one offense which are not included in the other. If a single transaction constitutes two or more offenses wherein the lesser offense is not necessarily involved in the greater and the facts necessary to convict on the second prosecution would not necessarily have convicted on the first, then the first prosecution is not a bar to the second." Later on, in the same volume at page 65, it is said: "A putting in jeopardy for one act is no bar to a prosecution for a separate and distinct act merely because they are so closely connected in point of time that it is impossible to separate the evidence relating to them on the trial for the one of them first had. Consequently, a plea of former jeopardy will not be sustained where it appears that in one transaction two distinct crimes were committed." And again on page 67 it is stated: "A single act may be an offense against two statutes; and if one statute necessitates proof of a different circumstance or element from that which the other requires, an acquittal or conviction under either statute does not exempt the defendant from prosecution and punishment under the other. * * * Undoubtedly, it is within the power of the legislature to create two or more offenses which may be committed by a single act, each of which is punishable by itself. A conviction or acquittal in such case under either statute would be no bar to a conviction under the other, for the accused would not be twice in jeopardy for one offense, but only once in jeopardy for each offense."

In applying the foregoing rules in this state it has been held that an acquittal on a charge of rape does not exclude a conviction for incest, since they were not identical offenses. People v. McCollum, 116 Cal.App. 55, 2 P.2d 432. It has also been held that the conviction of misdemeanors consisting in the unlawful possession and manufacture of intoxicating liquor do not constitute former jeopardy in a prosecution for possession of a still, notwithstanding the fact that all of the offenses were committed at the same time and place. People v. Painetti, 210 Cal. 476, 292 P. 965. In People v. Bevans, supra, the appellant was charged in separate counts with a violation of section 288 of the Penal Code and with violation of the juvenile court law, and he was convicted on both counts. He contended that the offenses were identical, but the court held otherwise, saying in part [19 Cal.App. 2d 288, 65 P.2d 93]: "* * * the offenses charged while identical in time were not the same either in law or in fact. The conviction of the one would not be a bar to the conviction of the other." In People v. Moon, 7 Cal.App.2d 96, 45 P.2d 384, it was held that in a prosecution for robbery and grand theft where the two offenses consisting of different elements but arising from the same acts were charged in two separate counts of the information, the dismissal of the count charging robbery did not bar a conviction upon the second count for grand theft. And in People v. Sheasbey, 82 Cal.App. 459, 255 P. 836, it was held that robbery and kidnapping do not possess the same elements and both may be punished although relating to the same transaction.

In the present case the elements of the two offenses denounced by the separate statutes which form the basis of the two counts were essentially different. In order to establish guilt under the second count, which was based on the juvenile court law, to which appellant pleaded guilty, all that was necessary to prove was that the minor violated section 11712 of the Health and Safety Code by having possession of narcotics, and that appellant contributed to such act of violation by the minor; whereas in order to establish guilt under the first count, which was based on the Health and Safety Code, and upon which appellant was convicted by a jury, it was essential for the prosecution to prove more than mere possession of narcotics by the minor; it was required to establish the additional element that appellant induced the minor to transport and carry the narcotics.

It is my conclusion, therefore, that under the doctrine of the authorities above cited the conviction under the second count did not bar a conviction under the first, and that accordingly the judgment should be affirmed.

Hearing denied; SHENK, J., dissenting.

SHEWBRIDGE v. POLICE COMMISSION OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al.

Civ. 12644.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.

June 9, 1944.

Rehearing Denied July 8, 1944.

Hearing Denied Aug. 7, 1944.

1. Witnesses ⇨1

The fact that witness, who testified against discharged policeman in hearing before police commission, was subsequently adjudged insane, was not pertinent to competency of witness at time he testified, in absence of anything in record indicating that witness was insane at such time.

2. Evidence ⇨63

A person is presumed to be sane until adjudicated insane.

3. Municipal corporations ⇨78

The general law, requiring that police department rules and regulations prescribe a separate and distinct penalty for violation of each of such rules and regulations, has no application to police department of city and county of San Francisco which acts under a charter.

4. Municipal corporations ⇨185(7)

The fact that the word lawful, as used in charge before police commission that policeman refused to obey and strictly execute lawful order of his superior officer, might be a mere conclusion did not vitate charge, since word was mere surplusage. Civ.Code, § 3537.

5. Municipal corporations ⇨185(5)

Where two charges were lodged with police commission against policeman and policeman's attack was directed at pleading of first charge only, commission had jurisdiction to hear and determine proceedings if second charge was well pleaded.

6. Mandamus ⇨168(4)

Where policeman was discharged by police commission after trial on charges that at a particular time, in violation of regulations, he did not have his gun and handcuffs on his person, passages from reporter's transcript indicating that at such time officer was properly equipped, in light of other passages indicating that he was not so equipped, merely showed a conflict in evidence, not an excess of jurisdiction which would authorize the overruling of board's order in mandamus proceeding. Code Civ.Proc. § 953a.

7. Municipal corporations ⇨185(7)

It was proper to lodge charges against police officer with police commission in the form of an ordinary verified complaint in a justice or police court, as against contention that charges were improperly verified.

8. Mandamus ⇨168(4)

Where record before trial court in mandamus to review action of police commission in ordering dismissal of policeman failed to disclose that board acted arbitrarily or fraudulently or without due regard to rights of policeman, trial court should not have granted peremptory writ.

9. Mandamus ⇨172

In mandamus to review action of police commission, truth as to jurisdictional facts cannot be contested, and court is limited in reviewing order to record made before commission, and, from such record, jurisdiction of commission to act must appear.

Appeal from Superior Court, City & County of San Francisco; Theresa Meikle, Judge.

Mandamus and certiorari by Thomas E. Shewbridge against the Police Commission of the City and County of San Francisco and William P. Wobber and others, as members of and constituting such Commission, to review petitioner's dismissal from the police force. From a judgment annulling the order of dismissal and granting a peremptory writ of mandate, defendants appeal.

Reversed.

John J. O'Toole, City Atty., and Walter A. Dold, Chief Deputy City Atty., both of San Francisco, for appellants.

John J. Taaffe, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, Justice.

Heretofore the plaintiff, Thomas E. Shewbridge, hereinafter called the petitioner, was a member of the police department of the city and county of San Francisco. On the 21st day of July, 1942, charges were filed against him in the office of the police commission. Later he appeared and entered a plea of not guilty. On July 29, 1942, a hearing before the police commission was had. The petitioner was found guilty and was ordered dismissed from the department. On the 16th day of September, 1942, the petitioner appeared in the superior court and filed a petition asking for a writ of mandate and for a writ of certiorari. An alternative writ was thereupon issued. The appellants answered denying many of the allegations set forth in said petition and at the same time filed in the superior court a return consisting of the reporter's transcript of all proceedings had before the police commission. Thereafter the proceeding came on for trial and the appellants offered in evidence the said return and all exhibits that had been before the police commission. No other evidence, oral or documentary, was introduced. On the 1st day of October, 1943, the trial court signed and caused to be entered a formal order: "Judgment and order annulling order of respondents dismissing petitioner and granting peremptory writ of mandate." Thereafter the appellants appealed from said judgment and order and the whole thereof. Said appeal was taken pursuant to section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1,2] The transcript was filed December 29, 1943. The appellants' opening brief was filed January 27, 1944. The petitioner's brief was filed April 5, 1944. On April 21, 1944 the petitioner filed in this court, "Application of petitioner and respondent for leave to produce additional evidence." The hearing of that application was continued and submitted with the hearing of the cause. An examination of the papers filed in the application last mentioned discloses that on the hearing before the police commission on July 29, 1942, Albert S. Munn was called as a witness by the appellants. Said papers further show that on September 27, 1943, Albert S. Munn was adjudged an insane person. Be that as it may, the fact is immaterial in the case at bar. When he was called as a witness at the time mentioned above he was presumed to be sane. Nothing appears in the record indicating anything to the contrary. The fact that he was later adjudged insane is in no manner pertinent to his competency at the time he was called as a witness before the police commission.

The charge preferred against the petitioner alleged:

"Now comes Albert S. Munn, Captain of Police, and charges said Police Officer Thomas E. Shewbridge, hereinafter referred to as the 'accused' with violations of Rule 329 and Rule 431 of the Rules and Regulations of the Department, committed as follows to wit:

"That during all the times herein mentioned, said accused was and still is a member of said Police Department, and a member of Company 'K', thereof.

"That at or about 2.00 o'clock p.m., on Tuesday, July 21st, 1942, the said accused was detailed to traffic patrol duty at Powell and Geary Streets and did refuse to obey and strictly execute the lawful order of his superior officer, Captain Albert S. Munn, the complainant herein, to issue a traffic citation for a public offense committed in the presence of the said accused.

"That at or about 2.00 p.m., on Tuesday July 21st, 1942, the said accused while detailed to traffic patrol duty at Powell and Geary Streets and in uniform was not equipped with his revolver and handcuffs.

"That by reason of the foregoing, the said accused violated the Rules and Regulations of the Police Department of the City and County of San Francisco.

"The foregoing charges are based upon two sections of the Rules and Regulations of the Police Department of the City and County of San Francisco. They read in part as follows:

"329. A member shall, while on duty in uniform, carry the following equipment:

* * * (b) Loaded revolver * * *
(e) Handcuffs. * * *

"431. Shall strictly obey and promptly execute the lawful orders of his superior officers. In case of conflict of orders from superior officers he shall respectfully call the attention of the superior officer giving the last order to such conflict; should the latter not change his order, it shall be obeyed and the member shall not be held responsible for disobedience of any former order or any violation of the rules in obeying said last order."

[3] The petitioner asserts: "The order of the police commission dismissing him is void because the rules and regulations of the San Francisco police department violate the state law in that they do not prescribe a separate and distinct penalty for the violation of each of such rules and regulations." We find no merit in the point. Bearing in mind that San Francisco is acting under a charter, the general laws referred to by the petitioner have no application in the case at bar. West Coast Advertising Co. v. City and San Francisco, 14 Cal.2d 516, 521, 95 P.2d 138; Ludolph v. Board of Police Com'rs, 30 Cal.App.2d 211, 217, 86 P.2d 118; Christal v. Police Commission, 33 Cal.App.2d 564, 572, 92 P.2d 416.

[4, 5] The petitioner contends: "The charges are insufficient on their face and the board had no jurisdiction to try the petitioner." He quotes from the first charge "* * * did refuse to obey and strictly execute the lawful order of his superior officer * * *." He points to the use of the word "lawful". He claims it is a conclusion of law. Conceding it was, it was merely surplusage. Superfluity does not vitiate. Civ.Code, sec. 3537. Moreover the attack is directed at the pleading of the first charge only. It does not apply to the second charge. If the latter was well pleaded it follows that the defendant board had jurisdiction to hear and determine the action.

[6] The petitioner quotes certain passages from the reporter's transcript to the effect that he had his gun and handcuffs on his person at the time alleged in the charges. It is a sufficient reply to state that other passages from the reporter's transcript may be quoted as showing that he did not have them and that the testimony given by Captain Munn was true and correct. Such facts merely showed a conflict in the evidence—not an excess of jurisdiction.

[7] The petitioner contends that the charges were improperly verified. That contention rests on the fact that the charges were in the form of an ordinary complaint in a justice or police court and that the verification thereof was "Albert S. Munn being first duly sworn deposes and says: That he is the complainant preferring the within charges; that he has read said charges and that the same are true of his own knowledge, except as to those matters therein stated upon information and belief, and as to those matters he believes the same to be true. Albert S. Munn, complainant. Subscribed and sworn to before me this 21st day of July, 1942. A. J. Goldman, Deputy County Clerk." That form was altogether proper. Christal v. Police Commission, 33 Cal.App.2d 564, 570, 92 P.2d 416; Charter (1932) sec. 155.

The appellants contend that the record before the trial court did not show that the defendant board had acted "arbitrarily, capriciously or fraudulently or without due regard to the rights" of the petitioner, and therefore the judgment of the trial court should not have been against the appellants. In Ludolph v. Board of Police Com'rs, 30 Cal.App.2d 211, 216, 86 P.2d 118, 121, the court said:

"The authority thus conferred upon the board is pursuant to the provisions of our state Constitution and is of a judicial character exercised by a quasi-judicial body. California Constitution, art. 11, sec. 8½, subd. 3; Imperial Water Co. v. [Board of] Sup'rs, 162 Cal. 14, 17, 18, 120 P. 780; Crane v. Board of Sup'rs, 17 Cal. App.2d 360, 364-366, 62 P.2d 189. If, and only if, the board acted in excess of the jurisdiction granted certiorari will lie."

In Murphy v. Retirement Board, 49 Cal. App.2d 58, on page 60, 121 P.2d 101, on page 102, this court, speaking through Mr. Presiding Justice Nourse, said:

"When the case is one in mandamus to 'review' the trial and judgment of an administrative or quasi judicial board, the function of the trial court is not that of a court sitting in a trial de novo. We endeavored to make this clear in Hogan v. Retirement Board, 13 Cal.App.2d 676, 677, 57 P.2d 520, 521, where we said: 'When the law gives to a fact-finding body the power to hear and determine a question of fact, the judgment of that body will not be controlled by mandamus in the absence of a showing that it acted arbitrarily, capriciously, or fraudulently, or without due regard for the rights of the applicant. Mogan v. Board of Police Com'rs, 100 Cal. App. 270, 279 P. 1080; Sevina v. Hickok, 113 Cal.App. 301, 298 P. 116; McColgan v. Board of Police Com'rs, 130 Cal.App. 66, 19 P.2d 815.'"

[8, 9] On the other hand, the petitioner throughout his brief contends that he is entitled to show that the record made before the defendant board did not speak the truth. He does not state any specific jurisdictional fact which was not stated in the charges but makes numerous contentions that the facts stated were not true. He thus assumes a position that is wholly untenable. In Miller & Lux v. Board of Sup'rs, 189 Cal. 254, at page 269, 208 P. 304, at page 311, the court said:

"In reply the plaintiff properly calls attention to the fact that the function of a writ of review is to bring before the court for consideration the proceedings before the inferior tribunal, including the evidence, and that the proceedings for a writ of review is not a proper one in which to contest the truth as to the jurisdictional facts. Golden Gate [Con. H.] M. Co. v. Superior Court, 65 Cal. 187, 191, 3 P. 628; Hoffmann v. Superior Court, 79 Cal. 475, 21 P. 862; De Pedorena v. Superior Court, 80 Cal. 144, 22 P. 71; [City of] Los Angeles v. Young, 118 Cal. 295, 50 P. 534, 62 Am.St.Rep. 234. This position is undoubtedly well taken.

"The court is limited in its proceedings to review the order of the board of supervisors to the record there made, and from that record the jurisdiction of the board to act in the premises must appear." (Italics ours.)

So in the instant case, the trial court was called upon to determine whether the pleading filed with the defendant board stated facts sufficient to confer jurisdiction on that board to hear those charges. If it did confer jurisdiction, that jurisdiction in the abstract was power to determine incorrectly as well as correctly.

We have read the record of the proceedings before the defendant board and the proceedings before the trial court from the beginning to the end. We find no place where the record shows, or purports to show, that the defendant board exceeded its jurisdiction.

It follows that the judgment of the trial court must be reversed and it is so ordered.

CALIFORNIA SHIPBUILDING CORPORATION v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.

Civ. 14287.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 3, California.

May 29, 1944.

Hearing Denied July 27, 1944.

1. Workmen's compensation ☞1753

Where there was conflict in evidence as to condition of staging encircling ship under construction, Industrial Commission was not required to make specific finding as to which of the two conditions existed, where either would be in violation of safety order requiring slip staging to be not less than 36 inches wide. St.1937, p. 309, § 6402.

2. Workmen's compensation ☞1939

On petition for writ to review an order of Industrial Commission awarding compensation, court was required to accept inference drawn by commission as to place from which deceased employee fell if it was a reasonable and logical one, even if other inferences could reasonably be drawn from evidence.

3. Workmen's compensation ☞1557

Evidence sustained Industrial Commission's finding that flanger's helper fell to his death at point on staging encircling ship, where staging violated safety order requiring slip staging to be not less than 36 inches wide, in that at such point there was either no plank or only a single plank 12 inches wide, and that such violation was proximate cause of accident. St.1937, pp. 281, 309, §§ 4553, 6402.

4. Workmen's compensation ☞940

Stage-rigger foreman who had responsibility of erecting staging encircling ship under construction, and who received no orders from superiors and required none, were "managing officers" so as to make corporate employer liable for increased compensation for serious and wilful misconduct for death of employee proximately resulting from foremen's failure to see that staging, where men were working 40 feet above ground, was not constructed in accordance with safety order requiring slip staging to be not less than 36 inches wide. St.1937, pp. 281, 309, §§ 4553, 6402.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Managing Officer".

5. Workmen's compensation ⇨1557

Evidence sustained Industrial Commission's finding that death of flanger's helper, who fell from staging encircling ship under construction, proximately caused by failure of stage-rigger foremen to have staging at that point complying with safety order, was result of "serious and willful misconduct" of "managing officers" of employer, justifying an award of increased compensation. St.1937, pp. 281, 309, §§ 4553, 6402.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Serious and Willful Misconduct".

6. Workmen's compensation ⇨941

It is "serious and willful misconduct" justifying an award of increased compensation to allow employees to work under conditions made unsafe through employer's violation of safety orders of Industrial Commission. St.1937, p. 231, § 4553.

7. Workmen's compensation ⇨941

An increased award against corporate employer for "serious and willful misconduct" is proper, where unsafe condition which causes injury to employee has been created by another employee who has independent duty of seeing that law is complied with and that working conditions are made safe, or where an employee who is under that duty has knowledge of the unsafe condition and does nothing to correct it. St.1937, p. 281, § 4553.

8. Workmen's compensation ⇨940

An employee whose authority is complete in his own department is a "managing officer" within statute making corporate employer liable for exemplary compensation for injuries proximately caused by violation of a safety order, where the alleged dangerous condition is shown to have been brought home to an executive, managing officer, or general superintendent of employer. St.1937, p. 281, § 4553.

9. Workmen's compensation ⇨1800

The Industrial Commission's practice of submitting application for rehearing to a reviewing referee other than referee who conducted hearing and recommended an award is not improper. St.1937, p. 193, § 115.

10. Workmen's compensation ⇨1730, 1800

The Industrial Commission may delegate to its referees the hearing of evidence and may act on the findings and recommendations of referee, and the same rule applies to petition for rehearing. St.1937, pp. 193, 303, §§ 115, 5906.

11. Workmen's compensation ⇨1800

Where contentions relied on in support of petition for rehearing in workman's compensation case were same as those urged on original hearing, commission was authorized to deny petition without a further hearing if contentions had been adequately considered theretofore. St.1937, p. 303, § 5906.

12. Workmen's compensation ⇨1800

The Industrial Commission's order denying a rehearing was valid, where it was based on report and recommendation of reviewing referee to whom application for rehearing was referred by commission after award was made for additional compensation for serious and willful misconduct of employer's managing officer proximately causing death of employee, and where, though referee's report did not include summary of evidence, it did state generally the facts and conditions of alleged violation of safety order, and ultimate fact that employee's death resulted proximately from such violation. St.1937, pp. 193, 281, 303, 309, §§ 115, 4553, 5906, 6402.

Proceeding by California Shipbuilding Corporation for a writ to review and to annul an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding $2,500 to Belle Rebecca Gaddis for the death of her husband, Jonas D. Gaddis, petitioner's employee, who was found to have met his death by reason of the willful and serious misconduct of his employer, the petitioner.

Award affirmed.

Thelen, Marrin, Johnson & Bridges and Gardiner Johnson, all of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Everett A. Corten, Atty., Industrial Accident Commission, and Fred G. Goldsworthy, Asst. Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHINN, Justice.

By this proceeding California Shipbuilding Corporation seeks annulment of an award made against it by Industrial Accident Commission in the amount of $2500 in favor of Belle Rebecca Gaddis, widow of Jonas D. Gaddis, petitioner's employee, who was found to have met his death by reason of the willful and serious misconduct of his employer, petitioner herein. The proceeding does not bring in question a separate award against the insurer of the employer of the death benefit of $6,000. The findings include the following:

"3. This Commission now finds that the said injury and death of Jonas Dulpha Gaddis was directly and proximately caused by the serious and willful misconduct of the employer herein and in support thereof specifies the following particulars:

"(a) Did knowingly and wilfully permit said employee to be in a place of employment which was patently unsafe and dangerous to life and limb in violation of Safety Order No. 6402 as the same is set forth in the Ship and Boat Building Safety Orders in full force and effect at the time of the injury and death of the deceased herein. [Corrected to read section 6402 of the Labor Code.]

"(b) Did knowingly and wilfully violate Safety Order No. 1806 of the said same Safety Orders in that in the space between the stairway, which was provided as a means of ingress and egress, and the point where the employee was required to perform his duties, there was a failure to provide sufficient planks as is and was required by said Safety Order. * * *

Safety Order 1806 specifies: "Slip staging shall be not less than thirty-six (36) inches wide. Planks not less than twenty-four (24) feet long shall be used whenever possible." Section 6402 of the Labor Code, St.1937, p. 309, reads: "No employer shall require, or permit any employee to go or be in any employment or place of employment which is not safe."

Petitioner's contention is that the Commission acted in excess of its jurisdiction, in that there was no evidence that the employee's death was directly and proximately caused by a violation of said safety order and no evidence that knowledge or notice of the alleged dangerous condition was shown to have been brought home to an "executive, managing officer, or general superintendent" of the employer (sec. 4553, Labor Code, St.1937, p. 281) so as to charge the corporation with penal liability.

[1-3] Gaddis was employed as a flanger's helper in the construction of a ship in the employer's yard at Terminal Island. He went to work at 4:30 p.m. on the day of his accident and at about 7 p.m. fell from the staging to the ground, receiving fatal injuries. The staging encircled the ship and consisted of six levels or working platforms. Completed sections of platform had three planks two inches by twelve inches by twenty-four feet, which overlapped at the ends. Gaddis and a fellow workman, Morkal, had reached the sixth level, which was approximately forty feet high, by means of a ladderway which led to a twenty-four inch wide cat walk above the sixth level, from which they had climbed down to the platform where they were working. At this point there were but two twelve-inch planks; to their right as they faced the ship there was a section that had only one plank. There is a conflict in the evidence as to the condition of the staging in the twenty-foot section next to the ladderway. Counsel for the Commission rely upon testimony that there was an open space of some twenty feet next to the ladderway, where there was no platform. Counsel for petitioner contend that the section next to the ladderway had one twelve-inch plank and there was testimony to this effect. There is nothing in the record to indicate whether the Commission found there was one plank or none at all at this point, but a specific finding was not necessary, as either condition would have been in violation of the safety order. At about 7 p. m. Gaddis announced to Morkal that he was going to get a drink of water. He started toward the ladderway, ostensibly to go to the ground where the fountain was located. A few minutes later Morkal saw him "on the end of the scaffold where there was no scaffolding any further"; when he looked again Gaddis had disappeared. He had fallen to the ground level into a bin of stanchions at a point 10 or 15 feet from the ladderway and directly beneath the unfinished section of the platform. No one saw the start of his fall and there was no direct evidence as to the cause of it. The contention of petitioner is that the finding that it was caused by the unsafe condition of the platform is based upon mere speculation and is unsupported by any logical deduction from the established facts, or, in other words, that it is based, not upon an inference drawn from proven facts, but upon a succession of inferences of questionable weight. As we view it the Commission was required to determine first whether Gaddis fell either in attempting to cross over to the ladderway on his way to the ground or while attempting to return to his work. All of the circumstantial evidence, and such direct evidence as there was, points to the conclusion that he fell from some point within 20 feet of the ladderway. In crossing that section he would have had to walk on a single plank, or if none was there, climb down five or six feet to the fifth level. It is doubtful how he was attempting to negotiate the crossing but there is no doubt that whichever course he took was made necessary by the unfinished condition of the platform. It is possible that Gaddis may have fallen from the ladderway or from the fifth level after he had reached it in safety, but the probabilities strongly support the implied finding of the Commission that he fell from a place where the platform was unfinished, and not from some place that was not unsafe or dangerous. But even if other inferences could reasonably be drawn as to the place from which he fell, we are bound to accept the inference which the Commission drew if it is a reasonable and logical one. We regard it as more reasonable than any of the other possible inferences suggested by petitioner or by the proven facts.

If it is accepted as a fact, satisfactorily established by the evidence, that Gaddis fell while attempting to cross where the sixth level platform was unfinished, it is entirely logical to conclude that the immediate cause of his fall was the absence of a completed platform. This is only to say again that it is more reasonable to believe that he fell while attempting something difficult and dangerous than to believe that he fell after he had safely reached the ladderway or the completed platform on the fifth level. We find no reason to question the soundness of the finding that the direct and proximate cause of the accident was the violation of the safety order by the employer.

[4,5] The second ground of attack is that there was no evidence of serious and willful misconduct upon the part of an "executive, managing officer, or general superintendent" of petitioner, which is required by section 4553 of the Labor Code before an exemplary award can be made against a corporate employer. There was evidence that two of petitioner's stage-rigger foremen had actual knowledge of the unfinished condition of the platform and of the fact that men were working on it. It was the duty of the foremen to take care of the general staging and to see that it was put in properly, and they determined what was required. They ordered staging material, including planking, as the staging was carried higher around the ship. They had been told that working platforms should be 36 inches wide. Unsafe conditions were reported to them by the safety inspectors and engineers when they were discovered, and it was the duty of the foremen to have the conditions corrected. There was no evidence that the actual condition of the staging where the accident occurred was known to anyone who was the superior of the foremen, nor was there evidence that anyone above the foremen superintended or directed staging construction. It was the duty of safety inspectors and engineers to inspect staging but there was no evidence that any of them was aware of the condition on the sixth level at the time and place of the accident. If the foremen were among those named in section 4553 of the Labor Code, petitioner is responsible in the amount of the penal award for their failure to observe the safety rule; otherwise it is not.

In E. Clemens Horst Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 1920, 184 Cal. 180, 190, 193 P. 105, 109, 16 A.L.R. 611, it was held that the manager of a vegetable drying plant who was entirely entrusted with its operation was a "managing officer" as that term was used in the Workmen's Compensation Act. It was said that the word "officer" was not used in a technical legal sense, but meant "a person in the corporation's employ, either elected or appointed, who is invested with the general conduct and control at a particular place of business of a corporation."

In Gordon v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 1926, 199 Cal. 420, 249 P. 849, 58 A.L.R. 1374, a foreman of a gravel pit who had full charge of excavating gravel from the pit was held to be the "managing representative" of a partnership. It was said that the use of the words "general superintendent" with "managing officer" with relation to corporations, and with "managing representative" with respect to partnerships, distinguished between those with general and those with special or limited authority and that one might be a managing officer or managing representative even though he had not the authority of a general superintendent.

In Church, etc., v. Indus. Acc. Comm., 1927, 86 Cal.App. 182, 260 P. 578, one Nowell, as architect and contractor, had contracted to build a church building. One Taylor who was subject to advice and direction of Nowell, had charge and control of the men engaged in the work. It was said that he "occupied a position in relation to the work of such description that, at least, he was foreman in charge of the work in which Barnes (the injured employee) was occupied at the time of the accident" and it was held that he was a "general superintendent" within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act.

In First Nat. Pictures, Inc. v. Indus. Acc. Comm., 1927, 87 Cal.App. 537, 262 P. 38, a foreman of the carpenter department of his employer, the petitioner, was held to be a "managing officer" of the corporation.

In General P. Corp. v. Industrial Acc. Comm. 1928, 90 Cal.App. 101, 265 P. 508, without discussion of the status of the employee, a corporation was held liable for the serious and willful misconduct of a foreman who was in charge of making a change in a gasoline line.

A safety engineer of petitioner testified as follows:

"Q. But who determines when staging should be erected? A. That more or less follows a routine procedure as far as fabrication is concerned. They are called upon to erect staging for any craft that requires it.

"Q. Who determines when it requires it? A. The stage rigger foremen, or the foremen of the other craft.

"Q. That is part of the stage-rigger foreman's job? A. That is part of his job."

[6-8] The stage-rigger foremen were undoubtedly "managing officers" within the meaning of section 4553 of the Labor Code. They had the responsibility of erecting staging to keep up with the progress of the construction work and to see that it followed a routine procedure or pattern.

They received no orders from superiors and required none. If they were not "managing officers" of their own department of the work, that department, so far as the record discloses, had no immediate managing officer. They had actual knowledge that the staging where the men were working was not constructed in accordance with the safety order and they had the primary responsibility of correcting that condition. Their acts and omissions under the circumstances were those of the corporation. It is serious and willful misconduct to allow employees to work under conditions made unsafe through the employer's violation of safety orders of the Commission. Hoffman v. Dept. of Indus. Relations, 1930, 209 Cal. 383, 287 P. 974, 68 A.L.R. 294; Pacific Emp. Ins. Co. v. Indus. Acc. Comm., 1930, 209 Cal. 412, 288 P. 66. An award against a corporation for serious and willful misconduct is proper where the unsafe condition which is the cause of injury has been created by an employee who has the independent duty of seeing that the law is complied with and that working conditions are made safe, or where an employee who is under that duty has knowledge of the unsafe condition and does nothing to correct it. Such an employee is a managing officer if his authority is complete in his own department of the work. The stage-rigger foremen had that authority.

[9-12] The award for serious and willful misconduct was signed by three members of the Commission. The return to the writ in its original form failed to disclose that the commissioners who signed the award had reviewed the record or were otherwise sufficiently informed as to the proof adduced at the hearings to enable them to decide the issue of serious and willful misconduct. Petitioner challenged the competency of the commissioners to decide that issue, since they had not heard the evidence and were not shown to have had knowledge of it. In response to an order for augmentation of the record, the Commission has filed a certified copy of the report and recommendation of a referee who reviewed the record of the hearings on the charge of serious and willful misconduct. It is the practice of the Commission to submit an application for rehearing to a referee other than the one who conducted the hearing and recommended an award, and the practice was followed in this case. The reviewing referee made a memorandum recommending denial of the petition for rehearing. It appears from this memorandum that a transcript of the evidence had been provided for his use and that points and authorities had been filed. It was stated that the evidence disclosed without serious question that there had been a violation of safety order No. 1806 and section 6402 of the Labor Code, in that the platform planking was unfinished and the platform was of insufficient width, and that there was substantial proof of notice of the existence of violations to the employer or its managing representatives. It was further stated that it was reasonable to believe that the employee fell through one of the gaps in the planking of the scaffold over which he had to pass and that it appeared that the condition of the planking was the proximate cause of death. The commissioners' order denying a rehearing was based upon this report and recommendation. While the report did not include a summary of the evidence, it did state generally the facts as to the condition of the staging and the circumstances of the accident, which were established by the evidence, and it stated as an ultimate fact that the employee's fall resulted proximately from the defective staging. The practice of submitting petitions for rehearing to a reviewing referee is not unauthorized or improper. It tends rather to lessen the chances of error in the final determination. Such work must of necessity be done by referees. It would be impossible for the commissioners themselves to review the records on petitions for rehearing and the law does not impose that duty upon them. The Commission may delegate to its referees the hearing of evidence and may act upon the findings and recommendations of the referees. Taylor v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 1940, 38 Cal.App.2d 75, 82, 100 P.2d 511. There is equal authority for such procedure in passing upon petitions for rehearing. Under section 115 of the Labor Code, St.1937, p. 193, any investigation, inquiry or hearing which the Commission may undertake or hold may be undertaken or held by a referee appointed for that purpose, and every finding, order, decision or award made by such referee pursuant to such investigation, inquiry or hearing, when approved and confirmed by the Commission and ordered filed, is the finding, order, decision or award of the Commission. The contentions relied upon in support of the petition for rehearing in the present case were the same as those urged upon the hearings. If they had been adequately considered theretofore, the Commission was authorized to deny the petition without a further hearing. Sec. 5906, Labor Code, St.1937, p. 303. The record shows that they had been so considered. The order denying a rehearing, based upon the report and recommendation of the reviewing referee was in accordance with authorized procedure and was valid.

The award is affirmed.

1. Appeal and error ☞907(3)

Where appeal is upon judgment roll alone, evidence is presumed to support findings made.

2. Divorce ☞327

In wife's divorce action, where there was a finding, presumably supported by evidence, that husband was not a bona fide resident of Nevada at time he obtained a Nevada divorce, Nevada decree was not entitled to "full faith and credit" in California.

A foreign divorce decree may be impeached collaterally by showing lack of jurisdiction over res for want of bona fide domicile by party obtaining such decree.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ruben S. Schmidt, Judge.

Suit by Edith M. Crouch against Ben E. Crouch for divorce. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

* Subsequent opinion 169 P.2d 897.

Charles C. Montgomery, Jr., of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Peters & Peters, of Chico, for respondent.

DORAN, Justice.

Appellant brought a suit for divorce against respondent in the Superior Court of the County of Los Angeles. Respondent in his answer pleaded a final decree of divorce granted to him in an action against appellant in the First Judicial Court of the State of Nevada, in and for the County of Ormsby, said decree being made and entered on the 4th day of May, 1942. The court below found that appellant's separate causes of action for divorce were each barred by the final decree of divorce obtained by respondent in the State of Nevada and gave judgment for respondent accordingly.

In the findings made below the trial court set forth in full the findings of fact, conclusions of law and decree of the Nevada court, whereby respondent was there awarded an absolute divorce from appellant. The court below then found, "That at the time of the filing of said complaint for divorce in said Nevada Court, and at the time of the rendition of the said judgment therein, the defendant herein was not a bona fide resident of the State of Nevada, nor of the County of Washoe in the State of Nevada, nor of the County of Ormsby in the State of Nevada, but was in truth and in fact a resident of the County of Butte, State of California, by reason of the facts, which the court now finds, to-wit: that said defendant herein left the State of California and entered the State of Nevada on or about the 28th day of February, 1942, solely for the purpose of obtaining a divorce from the plaintiff herein; that in so doing defendant herein abandoned plaintiff herein without cause; that defendant remained in Nevada for a period just long enough to obtain an apparent residence in Nevada and thereupon filed said action for divorce, obtained said decree, and shortly thereafter returned to Butte County, California; that service upon plaintiff herein in said Nevada divorce action was constructive service, and plaintiff herein was at all times domiciled in and a bona fide resident of Los Angeles County, State of California; that plaintiff herein never appeared in said Nevada divorce action; and that at no time while defendant was in the State of Nevada did he have any intention of becoming a resident thereof save and except for the sole purpose of obtaining a divorce from this plaintiff." Upon the findings made the trial court concluded that the defendants were entitled to judgment against plaintiff in each of the causes of action in the complaint. For the purposes of this appeal, it is not necessary to consider the position of any defendants other than respondent.

[1,2] In support of his contention, that the trial court's conclusions upon the findings and the judgment in respondent's favor were proper, respondent relies upon Williams v. North Carolina, 317 U.S. 287-324, 63 S.Ct. 207, 87 L.Ed. 279, 143 A.L.R. 1273. But the basis for the decision in that case readily distinguishes it from the present case and renders the rule of the Williams case inapplicable here. In the case on appeal herein, the evidence upon which the findings of the trial court were based is not before this court. The appeal is upon the judgment roll alone, and the evidence must be presumed to support the findings made, which included a finding that respondent was not a bona fide resident of the State of Nevada at the time he procured his divorce there from appellant. In the Williams case, supra, the decision was based upon an assumption that the petitioners there had a bona fide domicile in Nevada. In the present case the decision must be based upon an opposite assumption. In the Williams case, 317 U.S. 287, 63 S.Ct. 215, 87 L.Ed. 288, 143 A.L.R. 1273, the Supreme Court of the United States said: "We thus have no question on the present record whether a divorce decree granted by the courts of one state to a resident as distinguished from a domiciliary is entitled to full faith and credit in another state. Nor do we reach here the question as to the power of North Carolina to refuse full faith and credit to Nevada divorce decrees because, contrary to the findings of the Nevada court, North Carolina finds that no bona fide domicile was acquired in Nevada." Obviously, in the present case the situation is one wherein, contrary to the findings of the Nevada court, a California court has found that no bona fide domicile was acquired in Nevada. In deciding the Williams case, supra, the United States Supreme Court expressly pointed out that the issue there was not the same as that presented in Bell v. Bell, 181 U.S. 175, 21 S.Ct. 551, 45 L.Ed. 804,—a case in which the Supreme Court of the United States held that a decree of divorce was not entitled to full faith and credit

BANK OF PATTERSON et al.

Civ. 12542.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

June 7, 1944.

when it had been granted on constructive service by the courts of a state in which neither spouse was domiciled. Bell v. Bell, supra, sets forth the rule to be followed here upon the record presented. Respondent points out that appellant was personally served with summons and complaint in the Nevada divorce action, at her residence in Glendale, California. However, this fact does not alter the application of the rule in Bell v. Bell, supra. In Streitwolf v. Streitwolf, 181 U.S. 179, 21 S.Ct. 553, 45 L.Ed. 807, the wife was personally served in New Jersey, the state of her residence, with a copy of the summons and complaint in an action for divorce filed by her husband in the State of North Dakota. The United States Supreme Court in that case followed Bell v. Bell, supra, 181 U.S. 175, 21 S.Ct. 555, 45 L.Ed. 810, stating: "The facts in evidence warranted, and indeed required, the finding that the husband had no bona fide domicile in the state of North Dakota, when he obtained a divorce there; and it is not pretended that the wife had an independent domicile in North Dakota, or was ever in that state. The court of that state therefore had no jurisdiction." In the case here upon appeal the trial court found facts from which it must be concluded that the Nevada court had no jurisdiction over respondent's action for divorce. Upon the facts found, the Nevada decree of divorce here in question was therefore not entitled to full faith and credit in the State of California; and the facts as found by the trial court here do not support a judgment in favor of respondent.

[3] The principle upon which a decree of divorce rendered in another state may be impeached collaterally is recognized as well settled. Bruguiere v. Bruguiere, 172 Cal. 199, 202, 155 P. 988, Ann.Cas.1917E, 122; 13 P.2d 719, 86 A.L.R. 1321; Delanoy v. Delanoy, 216 Cal. 27, 34, Commonwealth v. Esenwein, 348 Pa. 455, 35 A.2d 335. That principle has not been disturbed or modified by the decision of the United States Supreme Court in Williams v. North Carolina, supra. Commonwealth v. Esenwein, supra. A bona fide domicile is still a requisite to the jurisdiction of an action for divorce.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial in accordance with the views herein expressed.

1. Chattel mortgages ⇨173(3)

In claim and delivery proceeding, the plaintiff under the general issue was entitled to produce evidence of his ownership as entruster under trust receipt without any allegation of special ownership.

2. Chattel mortgages ⇨173(4)

In claim and delivery proceeding by finance company claiming automobiles under trust receipts, bank which claimed automobiles under bill of sale executed to secure loan was required to show that its transactions were within scope of Uniform Trust Receipts Law and the transactions of finance company were not, or if both parties were within purview of the law that bank's title attached before that of the finance company. 3. Chattel mortgages ⇨3

The Uniform Trust Receipts Law having been legislatively approved by codification should be strictly construed. Civ. Code, § 3012 et seq.

4. Chattel mortgages ⇨9

Where arrangements between finance company and retail automobile dealer for financing dealer's purchase of automobiles called for transfer of title to finance company, to which dealer executed trust receipts naming finance company as entruster and dealer as trustee, and giving finance company right to repossess automobiles at its pleasure, the documents were not to be construed as unrecorded chattel mortgages, but were within purview of Uniform Trust Receipts Law. 6. Chattel mortgages ⇨143

Where retail automobile dealer had possession, but not title, to automobiles purchased by it for which trust receipts were executed to finance company, which had title and right to repossess automobiles at its pleasure, finance company's claim to automobiles was superior to that of bank from which dealer borrowed money secured by bill of sale covering the same automobiles, since dealer's possession was insufficient to give rise to valid trust receipt transaction between dealer and bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; B. C. Hawkins, Judge.

Claim and delivery proceeding by the C. I. T. Corporation against the Commercial Bank of Patterson and others. Judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendants appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

Nathan B. McVay, of Modesto, and Whitehurst & Logan, of Patterson, for appellants.

Cleary & Zeff, of Modesto, for respondent.

WARD, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff for possession of three motor vehicles delivered to it by the sheriff in a claim and delivery proceeding.

Clifford H. Knutson, a retail automobile dealer, on December 12, 1935, entered into an agreement with plaintiff C. I. T. Corporation, hereinafter referred to as C. I. T., for the financing and delivery to him under trust receipts, of automobiles for exhibition and sale. By the terms of the contract Knutson agreed that: "On receiving such merchandise or the documents therefor we will execute to you our Trust Receipts therefor, * * * and our note or acceptance for the amount of the same." The three cars involved in this action were purchased by C. I. T. from their owner, R. B. MacBride, a wholesale distributor, who immediately upon his delivery of them to Knutson, mailed to C. I. T. a time draft upon Knutson executed by him or by MacBride with his (Knutson's) authorization and consent, payable to the corporation; a bill of sale and invoice from MacBride to the corporation, showing the vehicle to have been sold to C. I. T. for the account of Knutson; and a trust receipt executed by him to the corporation. Each trust receipt particularly named C. I. T. as the owner and entruster of the vehicle and Knutson as the trustee, and gave the corporation the right to repossess the property at its pleasure.

Statements of the trust receipt financing and renewals thereof, covering the periods of the financing of the above three motor vehicles, were executed by Knutson and C. I. T., and duly filed with the Secretary of State in compliance with Civil Code, section 3016.9.

In connection with his automobile business, Knutson borrowed money from his local bank, defendant herein, from time to time, to secure which he gave the bank a bill of sale dated October 16, 1937, wherein was left a blank space for the insertion of the numbers of motor vehicles to be thereafter acquired by him. The bill of sale authorized the bank to insert such numbers of new vehicles as they were received, and the dates of loans made Knutson thereon, and as the motor vehicles were sold and the loans repaid the bank, to cancel the numbers and the dates. A notation of the engine numbers was also placed on the promissory notes as they were executed. A statement of this trust receipt financing executed by the bank and Knutson was also filed with the Secretary of State.

By reason of appellant bank's contention that under the Trust Receipts Law its security interest was prior to that of C. I. T., we here set forth the details of Knutson's financing of the three pieces of motor equipment: (1) On December 9, 1937, he procured a loan from the bank, giving his demand note therefor as of that date, and the bank added the identifying motor number of a Dodge truck to the previously executed bill of sale. The truck was not delivered to Knutson until December 10, 1937, when, under a trust receipt as of that date naming C. I. T. as owner and entruster, he received the same from MacBride. (2) On December 27, 1938, a Plymouth car sold by MacBride to C. I. T. was delivered to Knutson against his delivery to MacBride of a trust receipt naming C. I. T. as the owner and entruster and himself as the trustee. On the same day the bank made a loan to Knutson taking his note therefor and adding the identifying motor number of the Chrysler car to the bill of sale. (3) A third motor vehicle—another Dodge truck—was sold to C. I. T. by MacBride, who delivered it to Knutson the same day, February 23, 1939, against a trust receipt naming Knutson as trustee and the corporation as owner and entruster. On the same day, the bank made a further loan to Knutson, for which it took his note, and inserted the descriptive number of the third motor vehicle in the bill of sale.

The court found that the three motor vehicles in question "were purchased by the C. I. T. Corporation from R. B. MacBride as the distributor, and who had acquired said vehicles direct from the Chrysler Corporation; that said vehicles were delivered by said R. B. MacBride to Clifford Knutson, a retail dealer, after the execution, or the authorization from Knutson to MacBride to execute, a time draft drawn upon said Knutson payable to the plaintiff corporation, together with a bill of sale from the said R. B. MacBride, the true and lawful owner, to the C. I. T. Corporation, together with a trust receipt executed by said dealer, Knutson, to the C. I. T. Corporation, together with an invoice containing an itemization as to each of said vehicles showing said vehicles to have been sold to the C. I. T. Corporation for the account of said Knutson; that by the terms of said trust receipt the dealer, Knutson, acknowledged the title of said property to be in the C. I. T. Corporation; that the goods were being held in trust for the C. I. T. Corporation subject to the right of said Knutson to exhibit and sell the same for the account of the C. I. T. Corporation in the usual and ordinary course, to keep the funds derived from such sale separate from his own, to immediately remit the same and acknowledging the right of the C. I. T. Corporation to retake said property at its pleasure." The court further found "that said vehicles were never inspected or observed before said defendant advanced any moneys to Knutson."

The evidence indicates that the bank made the loans to Knutson without any independent investigation as to his possession or ownership of the cars, but that from time to time it did ascertain that the cars were in his salesroom.

On the 28th of August, 1939, the bank having discovered that Knutson had disposed of a car, not involved in this litigation but enumerated on its bill of sale, without its knowledge or consent, took possession of the three motor vehicles herein described, which were later seized by the sheriff under a writ of replevin. After obtaining possession of the cars, C. I. T. disposed of all three at private sale, obtaining prices in excess of amounts owed thereon by Knutson. This surplus was retained by it to apply on other indebtedness of Knutson.

[1] On the trial the bank objected to the admission of any evidence of C. I. T.'s ownership as entruster, on the ground that special ownership must be alleged, and cannot be proved under the general issue of replevin. Commercial Credit Co. v. Peak, 195 Cal. 27, 231 P. 340, must guide us in the determination of this question. It was there held that it is sufficient to plead the ultimate fact of ownership. See Nudd v. Thompson, 34 Cal. 39.

[2] Irrespective of the burden of proof on the trial, in order to prevail on appeal it is necessary that the bank show that its transactions are within the scope of the trust receipts law and that the transactions of C. I. T. are not. The Uniform Trust Receipts Law, Stats. 1935, p. 1930; Civil Code, Div. 3, Pt. IV, Tit. 14, Ch. III-A. If it appears that both parties are within the purview of such law, then it must be proved that in each of the transactions the bank's title attached before that of C. I. T.

A two-party trust receipts transaction, as appears in the dealings between the bank and Knutson, is provided for in the definition of "trust receipts." Civil Code, sec. 3014, subd. 1(b), (i) and (ii) and subd. 2. The bill of sale from Knutson to the bank evidenced an acknowledgment of a consideration, and an agreement to sell and convey to the bank all new automobiles and trucks "as per numbers hereafter" listed. The use of the word "hereafter" has reference to the cancellation of the numbers of the vehicles as they were sold and the addition of the numbers of new cars purchased and placed on display. The bill of sale recites that a security interest remains or will remain in the entruster. "* * * the relation of entruster and trustee may be created by the execution of a trust receipt." Bank of America N. L. & S. A. v. National F. Corp., 45 Cal.App.2d 320, 333, 114 P.2d 49, 56.

[3] In a supplemental brief filed by appellant bank subsequent to the oral argument, the contention is made that the trust receipt law has been legislatively approved by codification; that it is a creature of statute and should therefore be strictly construed. As a general principle we agree with this contention. The bank concludes therefrom that if there is an omission to recite in an instrument "a security interest" the document is to be construed as an unrecorded chattel mortgage and not as an instrument that may be considered under the Uniform Trust Receipts Law. If the construction sought by the bank be correct, then Knutson's bill of sale to the bank is not such a trust receipt as chapter 111-A contemplates. If both sets of instruments should be construed as trust receipts, pledges, conditional sale contracts or chattel mortgages, then it would still be necessary to determine their priority. If one should be placed in one class and the other in another, it would still be necessary to determine priority.

Unless the property was already encumbered, it may be assumed from what has been said before that the bank transaction comes under the Uniform Trust Receipts Law, which brings us to the question of what was the transaction between Knutson and C. I. T.

"Security interest" is defined in Civil Code, sec. 3013, subd. 12, as "a property interest in goods, documents or instruments, limited in extent to securing performance of some obligation of the trustee or of some third person to the entruster, and includes the interest of a pledgee, and title, whether or not expressed to be absolute, whenever such title is in substance taken or retained for security only." In Chichester v. Commercial Credit Co., 37 Cal.App.2d 439, 443, 99 P.2d 1083, 1085, the court said: "While the security interest afforded by a trust receipt prior to the enactment of the uniform law was somewhat similar to many other forms of chattel security, it may be distinguished from such transactions as a mortgage, pledge or conditional sale. In the case of a mortgage, a lien is given by the mortgagor to the mortgagee in order to secure the latter for the performance of an obligation by the mortgagor who retains possession of the property. The trust receipt does not conform to a pledge, since in the case of a pledge the security depends upon possession of the goods by the person secured; whereas in the case of a trust receipt, the entruster does not have possession of the goods. In the case of a conditional sale, possession may not ordinarily be retaken until there is a default in the contract; whereas under a trust receipt transaction, possession may be retaken at any time. Other distinguishing features of these various types of security interest under the former law are clearly indicated in the case of In re James, Inc., 2 Cir., 30 F.2d 555."

In Commercial Discount Co. v. Los Angeles County, 16 Cal.2d 158, 159, at page 163, 105 P.2d 115, at page 117, the differentiations set forth in the Chichester case are approved, but the court said: "Other differences might be noted. In the case of a chattel mortgage title is found in the mortgagee prior to the mortgage.

But the chapter on trust receipts, and particularly section 3014 of the Civil Code, found therein, provides: "The security interest of the entruster may be derived from the trustee or from any other persons, and by pledge or by transfer of title or otherwise."

[4] The facts as to the C. I. T. transaction, as revealed by the record, do not disclose that the documents may, as the bank contends, be construed as unrecorded chattel mortgages. The business relations of Knutson and C. I. T. started in December 1935 upon the presentation by Knutson to C. I. T. of an application for a dealer's floor plan accommodation. Therein Knutson admitted C. I. T. ownership of the merchandise as represented by invoices and bills of lading. Each document provided: "In the event that the said merchandise or the documents therefor shall be entrusted to us for the purpose of sale or otherwise, we hereby consent that your right to repossess yourselves of the same or proceeds thereof and to terminate our privilege of receiving further merchandise shall be exercised at any time in your discretion and that any private sale of merchandise to the manufacturer thereof or to a distributor or dealer or any other purchaser for value therein shall conclusively be deemed a proper sale and price. On receiving such merchandise or the documents therefor we will execute to you our Trust Receipt." "In order to expedite your delivery of merchandise to us under Trust Receipts or otherwise, instead of mailing to you the percentage of amount of invoice from time to time required by you we will, if this is approved by you, deliver such percentage to the distributor or manufacturer for your account at the time of the delivery of the merchandise to us." The application was approved by C. I. T.

Section 3014 of the Civil Code sets forth alternative methods of obtaining or deriving security interest from the trustee. It may be by delivery under subd. (a) of paragraph 1 or by the giving of new value under subd. (b). In either event it must "Be against the signing and delivery by the trustee of a writing designating the goods, documents or instruments concerned, and reciting that a security interest therein remains in or will remain in, or has passed to or will pass to, the entruster, or (ii) Be pursuant to a prior or concurrent written and signed agreement of the trustee to give such a writing." Knutson had agreed to the purchase price of the cars pursuant to the written and signed contract with C. I. T. to execute a trust receipt. MacBride sold the merchandise in controversy to C. I. T. and made delivery to Knutson against his trust receipt in favor of C. I. T. The concurrent and subsequent transactions between C. I. T., MacBride and Knutson were within the purview of chapter 111-A.

On the question of priority between C. I. T. and the bank it should be noted that neither party obtained interest in the merchandise until MacBride relinquished his right of ownership, etc. Those rights were conveyed to C. I. T. So far as Knutson was concerned, he had been given possession of the automobiles, but that possession was unaccompanied by any further right if for any reason his transaction with C. I. T. was not in accordance with their agreement and with the provisions of the statute. If the possession was without legal basis, the bank could not deal with Knutson, as the right of possession rested either in MacBride or C. I. T. If the possession by Knutson was valid it could be so only through the transaction involving MacBride, C. I. T. and Knutson, which was to terminate "at C. I. T.'s election." Knutson's right of possession was for a limited purpose.

The bank contends that the language in the C. I. T. instrument is similar to that construed in C. I. T. Corporation v. Seanev, 53 Ariz. 72, 85 P.2d 713. A uniform trust receipts law did not exist in Arizona. That case, as others cited by the bank is not controlling. The Arizona case did not decide whether the trust receipts were chattel mortgages or conditional sales contracts. In either case the instruments were subject to Arizona recording statutes. Trust receipt transactions involving motor vehicles are common. "This method enables the retail dealer to obtain advances from a financing company to pay the purchase price to the distributor and at the same time receive possession of the automobile for the purpose of placing it on the salesroom floor for exhibition and sale to a prospective customer. Title is transferred directly from the distributor to the finance company which retains such title under the trust receipt until the amount advanced as the purchase price is repaid. The validity of such trust receipts as title retention documents has been established by the courts. Subsequent to the events hereinbefore related and in 1935, Stats. 1935, p. 1930, the legislature recognized the common practice and adopted the Uniform Trust Receipts Law, which comprises sections 3012 to 3016.16 of the Civil Code." Commercial C. Co. v. Barney M. Co., 10 Cal.2d 718, 720, 76 P.2d 1181, 1182.

[5] The bank also contends that the trust receipts sent C. I. T. by MacBride after each transaction were offers which were not valid contracts until accepted and that the first evidence of acceptance is the date of setting up the transaction on the books of C. I. T. The evidence shows that C. I. T. agreed in writing to finance Knutson's purchase by means of trust receipts, requiring a separate trust receipt for each transaction. Under this method a trust receipt transaction arose upon delivery of a car by MacBride, the distributor, to Knutson, the dealer. The separate trust receipt was merely the method of identifying a particular vehicle.

We hold herein that the instruments, C. I. T. and the bank sufficiently complied with the Uniform Trust Receipts Law to be controlled by chapter III-A of the Civil Code. It is not necessary therefore to comment further upon the chattel mortgage and conditional sale contract cases cited.

[6] All of the equitable rights in this case, based upon the evidence and as appear in the instruments, establish the claim of C. I. T. over that of the bank. The bank's claim is primarily based upon Knutson's possession of the vehicles. Possession alone is insufficient to give rise to a valid trust receipts transaction. Metropolitan Finance Corp. v. Morf, 42 Cal.App. 2d 756, 109 P.2d 969.

[7] The facts of this case seem to rule out the doctrine of equitable estoppel. C. I. T.'s statement of trust receipts financing was on file with the Secretary of State, putting the bank on notice. The bank did not rely upon any act or failure to act on the part of C. I. T. at the time of the transactions with Knutson relative to the three cars. The bank made no investigation of Knutson's title. Metropolitan Finance Corp. v. Morf, supra.

[8] After default an entruster is entitled to possession. An entruster in possession may give a five day notice, sent by ordinary mail, of intention to sell. Civil Code, sec. 3016.2. Five subdivisions appear in sec. 3016.2. Reading the whole it is plain that "notice" was intended primarily as a means of protection to the trustee and not for purchasers from a defaulting trustee. The trustee in the present case, Knutson, makes no claim nor for that matter appearance, in the present proceeding. No objection has been made by him or in his behalf as to the sufficiency of the notice. The defendant bank admits that it had notice of the sale, and it was not prejudiced if there was a failure to notify Knutson, a matter which from the record seems to be in dispute.

Neither C. I. T. nor the bank had knowledge or actual notice of the activities of Knutson in obtaining money on the particular vehicles. One party must suffer—the trial court determined it should be the bank. The evidence and the law uphold the trial court's conclusion.

After judgment the bank moved for a new trial in the claim and delivery action, and the case was reopened for further testimony as to the disposition of funds received by C. I. T. from the sale of the cars. The trial court found that such sum, including the surplus, was properly used.

[9] The trustee shall receive any surplus and shall be liable to the entruster for any deficiency. The proceeds of a sale shall be applied "(i) to the payment of the expenses thereof, (ii) to the payment of the expenses of retaking, keeping and storing * * * [and] to the satisfaction of the trustees' indebtedness." Civil Code, sec. 3016.2(3) (b). At the hearing it developed that the employees' attendance and expenses in locating purchasers, together with attorneys' fees, etc., used up the surplus.

The judgment is affirmed.

ARMSTRONG v. KLINE.

Civ. 14220.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 3, California.

June 5, 1944.

Rehearing Denied June 30, 1944.

1. Executors and administrators ⇨221(7)

In action to recover reasonable value of services rendered to deceased, evidence sustained finding that deceased orally agreed to give, devise, and bequeath to plaintiff certain property in consideration of plaintiff's moving her residence, acting as deceased's housekeeper and assisting deceased in operation of his business, that plaintiff fulfilled terms of agreement, and that deceased failed to perform his part of agreement.

2. Witnesses ⇨270(2)

In action to recover reasonable value of services rendered to deceased under oral agreement of deceased allegedly made in July, 1936, to devise and bequeath property to plaintiff, question put to one of plaintiff's witnesses as to whether witness knew that in July of 1936 plaintiff was receiving relief from one of the relief agencies was not proper cross-examination and objection to question was properly sustained.

3. Appeal and error ⇨205

In action to recover reasonable value of services rendered to deceased under alleged oral agreement of deceased to devise and bequeath property to plaintiff, sustaining objection to cross-examination question put to plaintiff's witness as to whether plaintiff had told witness at any time whether plaintiff was receiving relief from one of the relief agencies was not prejudicial error where there was no offer of proof.

4. Appeal and error ⇨205

Evidence ⇨474(14)

Where witness had testified that she had seen plaintiff sign her signature, sustaining objection to questions as to whether witness was able to identify plaintiff's handwriting and as to whether witness could say signature on back of check was the signature of plaintiff was error, but the ruling was not prejudicially erroneous where no offer of proof was made. Code Civ.Proc. § 1943.

5. Executors and administrators ⇨221(3)

In action to recover reasonable value of services rendered to deceased, where it was shown that checks drawn by deceased were received by plaintiff's creditor, and that plaintiff was given credit on her indebtedness for amount of the checks, the checks were admissible as part of documentary evidence showing that plaintiff obtained a monetary benefit by reason of the issuance of the checks.

6. Evidence ⇨197

In action to recover reasonable value of services rendered to deceased, where checks drawn by deceased were received by plaintiff's creditor and plaintiff was given credit on her indebtedness for amount of checks, even though plaintiff's signature on back of checks was not shown to be genuine, the checks were admissible in view of fact that her signature on her claim was in evidence, since jury could have used claim for purpose of comparison.

7. Appeal and error ⇨1058(1)

In action for reasonable value of services rendered to deceased, where checks drawn by deceased were received by plaintiff's creditor, failure to receive the checks in evidence was not prejudicial error in view of uncontradicted evidence that payments as shown by the checks were credited to plaintiff's account.

8. Trial ⇨234(9)

In action for reasonable value of services rendered to deceased where checks drawn by deceased and received by creditor of plaintiff were erroneously excluded, but uncontradicted evidence showed that the payments made by checks were credited to plaintiff's account, instruction that jury should not consider any evidence offered and rejected or which had been stricken out was not objectionable as precluding jury from considering the uncontradicted evidence.

9. Trial ⇨114

A statement of counsel during a trial is not to be considered as evidence unless such statement is made as an admission or stipulation conceding the existence of a fact.

10. Trial ⇨133(2)

In action for reasonable value of services rendered to deceased, where check drawn by deceased and received by creditor of plaintiff who had been given credit for amount of checks had not been received in evidence, but defendant's counsel stated that check showed on its face that it was a check of deceased, admonition of court that jury should disregard statement of defendant's counsel was proper.

11. Trial $\Rightarrow$ 89

In action against administratrix of deceased's estate for reasonable value of services rendered by plaintiff to deceased, administratrix' testimony that plaintiff asked administratrix what she thought about settling was properly stricken out, where counsel for administratrix failed to inform court concerning what he intended to prove.

12. Evidence $\Rightarrow$ 213(5)

It is not permissible to show that a party to litigation has offered to compromise the case, and such rule not only excludes offer to compromise but also all negotiations with relation thereto.

13. Executors and administrators $\Rightarrow$ 210

Frauds, statute of $\Rightarrow$ 138(4)

Where deceased and plaintiff made an agreement that if plaintiff would perform certain services for deceased he would devise and bequeath property to plaintiff but deceased failed to fulfill his part of agreement, the law implied an agreement, on his death, to pay plaintiff the reasonable value of services she had rendered, and statute of frauds was not applicable. St. 1937, pp. 197, 198, 199, 200, §§ 200, 204, 205, 210, 215, 219; Civ.Code, § 1624, subd. 6.

14. Executors and administrators $\Rightarrow$ 210

Where services have been performed under an agreement that compensation would be provided for in a will, the reasonable value of such services may be recovered if no provision is made in the will for compensation for the services.

15. Limitation of actions $\Rightarrow$ 49(2)

Where services were rendered under an agreement that compensation would be made therefor in will, cause of action for reasonable value of services did not arise until death of promisor.

16. Costs $\Rightarrow$ 260(4)

In action against administratrix of deceased's estate to recover reasonable value of services rendered to deceased and to recover possession of automobile and two automobile ownership certificates, where administratrix appealed from judgments for plaintiff on both claims but did not contend on appeal that judgment that plaintiff should recover automobile and automobile certificates should be reversed, penalty for taking frivolous appeal would not be assessed in view of fact that decision that there was prejudicial error in ruling regarding admissibility of evidence would have applied to both judgments.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter S. Gates, Judge.

Action by Gladys R. Armstrong, now known as Gladys R. Wilcox, against Alma Kline, as administratrix of the estate of Andrew W. Flick, deceased, to recover reasonable value of services rendered and to recover possession of an automobile and two automobile ownership certificates. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Carson B. Hubbard, of Huntington Park, and James V. Brewer, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Paul Vallee and S. Bernard Wager, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PARKER WOOD, Justice.

This is an action to recover the reasonable value of services rendered, and to recover possession of an automobile and two automobile-ownership certificates. In a jury trial, plaintiff obtained a judgment for $7500 for services rendered and a judgment that she have and recover the automobile and the certificates. Defendant appealed from both judgments.

Although an appeal was taken from the judgment that plaintiff have and recover the automobile and the certificates, no contention is made in appellant's briefs or in her oral argument that said judgment should be reversed.

Appellant asserts on appeal that the trial court erred prejudicially in refusing to receive certain evidence offered by appellant, and that "the verdict and judgment are contrary to the law." Since no contention is made that the evidence is not sufficient to support the judgment as to services rendered (or the other judgment), it will not be necessary to state the evidence in detail.

Andrew W. Flick was the owner of a lot, store building and liquor store at 8508 South Compton Avenue in Los Angeles, and he lived in the rear of the store. He died on March 31, 1941. Plaintiff duly served and filed, in the probate proceedings in the matter of his estate, her claim as a creditor of said deceased, which claim was in substance as follows: That said deceased "about July 3, 1936, orally agreed to give, devise and bequeath to Gladys R. Armstrong [plaintiff] * * * in his Last Will, his lot, building and liquor store business * * * located at 8508 South Compton Avenue, Los Angeles, California, as stated by deceased of the value of the sum of $9500.00 * * * amply provide for claimant [plaintiff] in said Last Will of deceased, and assist claimant in opening, conducting and operating her dress shop business to be located at 8510 S. Compton Avenue, Los Angeles, * * * in consideration of claimant moving her residence to and opening, conducting and operating her said dress shop business at said location of dress shop business, of assisting deceased in operating his said premises and liquor business, acting as his housekeeper and occasionally going out with deceased to his friends' homes. That on about April 15, 1937, deceased opened his real estate office and business at 8506 S. Compton Avenue, Los Angeles * * * and at the request of deceased and as additional consideration for and as part of said agreement, claimant assisted deceased in the conducting and operating of said real estate business to about July 15, 1939. On about May 8, 1939, at the request of and with the consent of deceased, claimant opened and continued to operate her cleaning shop business * * * to March 31, 1941. In consideration of said agreement claimant on about July 3, 1936, moved her said residence to said premises and on about July 15, 1936, opened and continued to operate her said dress shop business at said location * * * assisted deceased in operating said premises and liquor business and acted as housekeeper for deceased in said premises and liquor business daily from about 6 o'clock a.m. to about 10 o'clock p.m., and occasionally went out with deceased to deceased's friends' homes, from said about July 3, 1936, to March 31, 1941, and continues to operate said dress shop business and cleaning shop business. That the reasonable value of all of said hereinabove items is the sum of $9500.00."

Said creditor's claim stated further: "That deceased failed to give, devise and bequeath to claimant in his Last Will, said premises and liquor business and amply provide for claimant thereon and failed and refused to carry out and perform the provisions of said agreement on his part to be performed; that claimant has performed all the provisions of said agreement on her part to be performed." The claim also included statements that said administratrix (defendant) was withholding from, and refusing to deliver to, plaintiff two certificates of title to two certain described automobiles, which automobiles were purchased by claimant from her personal funds and were owned by claimant; that one of the automobiles was in the possession of claimant at the time of making the claim; and that the reasonable value of the certificates and automobiles was $150.

The first amended complaint, upon which the action was tried, included allegations which were in substance the same as the statements in said creditor's claim.

The answer of defendant admitted that Flick did not make a will and that he did not give, devise, or bequeath anything to plaintiff.

[1] The evidence was sufficient to support findings that the statements in said creditor's claim as to the making of the agreement, the fulfillment of the terms thereof by plaintiff, and the failure of Flick to perform his part of the agreement, were true.

The real estate office, the liquor store, the dress shop, and the cleaning shop were located at 8506, 8508, 8510, and 8512 South Compton Avenue, respectively. The dress shop adjoined the south side of the liquor store, and the cleaning shop adjoined the south side of the dress shop. Doorways were cut through the dividing walls of those places. The real estate office was immediately north of the liquor store, but did not adjoin it. The four places were connected by a buzzer system so that when the front door of any of those places was opened a buzzer would sound in the other places. The living quarters at the rear of the liquor store consisted of a living room, bedroom, breakfast room, kitchen, and furniture. At the rear of the living quarters Flick had a garage, a garden, and places where he, at times, kept rabbits and chickens.

Upon objection having been made by defendant (under the provisions of section 1880, subdivision 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure) to the giving of testimony by plaintiff, plaintiff did not testify concerning her claim for the reasonable value of services rendered. Plaintiff called 13 witnesses concerning the issue of services rendered and the agreement to make a will. Nine of those witnesses testified that they frequently saw plaintiff working in the liquor store and doing housework in the living quarters of Flick in the rear of the liquor store. Several of those witnesses testified that such work included cooking, scrubbing floors and walls in the store and kitchen, washing windows, and waiting on customers in the liquor store from early morning to midnight. Five witnesses testified that they heard Flick say in substance that he would leave the liquor store and liquor store property to plaintiff if anything should happen to him. Two witnesses testified that Flick said he had not paid any wages to plaintiff. Four witnesses testified that they saw plaintiff take care of Flick when he was sick. He was sick on 7 or 8 occasions, each of which occasions extended over a few weeks. One witness testified that she frequently saw plaintiff iron Flick's laundry.

The testimony of plaintiff concerning the automobile and the two certificates of ownership was in substance that plaintiff purchased the two automobiles referred to in the certificates with her own money; that the certificates were issued in her name as owner; that she endorsed them and placed them in decedent's safe deposit box for safe keeping; that defendant locked the garage at the rear of the liquor store where one of the automobiles was kept and refused to permit plaintiff to have possession of that automobile; and that the other automobile was in the garage at the rear of plaintiff's dress shop and plaintiff had possession of that automobile.

[2,3] Defendant asked one of plaintiff's witnesses on cross-examination: "Did you know that in 1936, in July of 1936, Gladys [plaintiff] was receiving relief from one of the relief agencies?" Plaintiff's objection thereto upon the grounds that it called for a conclusion of the witness and was not proper cross-examination was sustained. Defendant thereupon asked the witness: "Did Gladys tell you at anytime whether she was receiving relief from one of the relief agencies?" Plaintiff's objection thereto upon the ground that it was not impeachment and not proper cross-examination was sustained. Defendant's argument, in support of her contention that said questions were proper, is that she was entitled to show that plaintiff "possessed little or nothing in the way of worldly goods" when she became associated with Flick, and then was entitled to show that she owned a dress shop and a cleaning shop at the time of Flick's death, in order that a comparison of plaintiff's status at the beginning and close of the association might be made when considering whether plaintiff accumulated sufficient property during her association with Flick to compensate her fully for her alleged services. As to the first question, it was immaterial whether the witness had knowledge of the fact implied therein that plaintiff was receiving relief, and the question was not proper cross-examination. That ruling was not erroneous.

As to the second question, an answer thereto in the affirmative would have been evidence of an admission by plaintiff that she had received relief from a relief agency, and such an admission would have been material evidence for the purpose stated in defendant's argument above mentioned. There was no offer of proof, however, that the answer would be in the affirmative and there was no offer to prove that plaintiff did receive relief in July, 1936, or at all. It was not prejudicial error to sustain the objection to that question.

Defendant contends further that the court erred in refusing to receive in evidence 13 checks, totaling $111.58, which were drawn by Andrew W. Flick, and were payable to G. R. Armstrong. A witness called by defendant testified that 6 of said checks, totaling $38.50, were received by him, a manufacturer of laundry equipment, in payment of amounts due to him as monthly installments under a written contract whereby plaintiff agreed to purchase from him certain electric equipment which had been installed in her cleaning shop. There was no testimony that plaintiff endorsed any of those checks. Defendant offered the 6 checks in evidence. Plaintiff objected to said offer upon the ground that there was no showing that plaintiff endorsed the checks or had anything to do with them. The trial judge said: "Will you connect it up further later, Mr. Hubbard [counsel for defendant]?" Counsel for defendant replied: "Yes, I think I can connect it up." The trial judge then said: "All right. * * * You may offer them later. The objection is sustained at this time." The only effort "to connect it up" later is referred to hereinafter. Said 6 checks were not offered in evidence later.

A witness called by defendant testified that 7 of said checks (other than the 6 checks just mentioned), totaling $73.08, were received by him, the credit manager of a laundry machine company, in payment of amounts due the company as monthly installments under a written contract whereby plaintiff agreed to purchase from the company a pressing machine and boiler. There was no testimony that plaintiff endorsed any of those checks. Defendant offered the 7 checks in evidence. Plaintiff objected to said offer upon the ground that there was no foundation for proof of the signature of plaintiff on any of those checks. The trial judge said: "I think you better lay a further foundation. They are already marked." Then counsel for the defendant asked said witness the following questions and the witness gave the following answers:

"Q. Do you know the signature of G. R. Armstrong? A. No, I do not.

"Q. You can't say whether or not that name G. R. Armstrong on the back of the checks was signed by her or by somebody else? A. I couldn't tell."

Thereupon counsel for defendant said: "We will leave them for identification and I will try to identify them further."

The trial judge then said: "All right. They are already marked for identification and you may try to identify them further."

[4] The only effort "to connect it [endorsements] up further later" or "to identify them [endorsements] further" was the calling of another witness by defendant and addressing questions to her concerning her qualifications to testify as to plaintiff's signature. That effort is shown by the following excerpt from the transcript:

"Q. By Mr. Hubbard: Have you seen Gladys Armstrong sign her name? A. Yes.

"Q. Have you seen that on many occasions? * * * A. No. I have seen her sign it.

"Q. How many times have you seen her sign her signature? A. There was two different occasions on which she signed three papers.

"Q. And from observing these signatures could you say you are able to identify her handwriting?

"Mr. Vallee: * * * I object to that on the ground it is calling for a conclusion and opinion of the witness. Whether she can say or not is a matter for your Honor to say, whether she can or cannot.

"The Court: The objection is sustained.

"Q. By Mr. Hubbard: I will now ask you whether or not you can say the signatures on the back of these checks are the signatures of Gladys Armstrong?

"Mr. Vallee: Exactly the same question, and it is objected to.

"The Court: Yes. The objection is sustained."

On appeal the defendant (appellant) does not assign said ruling as error. The ruling, however, was erroneous, the witness having said that she had seen plaintiff write. Section 1943, Code of Civil Procedure. Defendant made no offer of proof that the witness would testify that any of the signatures was the signature of plaintiff, and the ruling was not prejudicially erroneous.

[5-7] The second group of checks, relating to the pressing machine and boiler, were offered in evidence later, and at that time counsel for defendant said: "While it is true I have not been able to prove the signature of Gladys Armstrong, the facts in the case show—" and "This group of checks it has been testified were given in payment of the boiler and the press that were located in this place, and charged to this shop, and I think that is sufficient identification to permit them to be introduced here in evidence. I don't think it is necessary to show how the endorsement was placed on there or by whom. The check on its face shows it is a check of Andrew W. Flick." It was not shown that plaintiff endorsed any of the checks; however, it was shown that the checks drawn by Flick were received by persons to whom plaintiff was indebted for equipment in her cleaning shop and that plaintiff was given credit upon her indebtedness for the amounts of the checks. The testimony was that the amounts credited to plaintiff's accounts were the amounts shown on the checks drawn by Flick, and that said amounts were so credited by reason of the receipt of said checks issued by Flick. Plaintiff obtained a benefit to the extent of the total amount of the checks, irrespective of whether or not she endorsed the checks. The account sheet showing the payments, by reason of the checks, as to the pressing machine and boiler were offered in evidence and no objection was made to that offer; however, no ruling was made as to the offer. The checks should have been received in evidence as part of the documentary evidence showing that plaintiff obtained a monetary benefit by reason of the issuance of said checks. Furthermore, the checks should have been received in evidence for the reason an exemplar of plaintiff's signature was in evidence at the time the court sustained the objection (her signature on her creditor's claim) which the jury could have used for purposes of comparison with the endorsements on the checks in considering whether plaintiff endorsed the checks. Castor v. Bernstein, 1906, 2 Cal. App. 703, 706, 84 P. 244. It is to be noted, however, that counsel for defendant did not state to the court that he offered the checks in order that such comparison might be made. The fact that said payments were made by Flick in behalf of plaintiff was material not only on the issue as to the amount due to plaintiff for services rendered, if any, but also on the issue as to whether there was an oral agreement to devise the liquor store to plaintiff, and also on the issue as to whether plaintiff used her own money or Flick's money in purchasing the automobiles. Among other things, such payments by Flick might have been gifts from him to plaintiff, or in payment or part payment for services rendered, or in compliance with a mutual-assistance-agreement between Flick and plaintiff (as defendant asserts in her brief) whereby they were to assist each other in the operation of their places of business. Defendant made no offer of proof that the checks were drawn by Flick in payment of services rendered, or that they were drawn in compliance with such a mutual-assistance-agreement; however, such offer was not necessary. The failure to receive the checks in evidence was not prejudicial error for the reason there was uncontradicted testimony by witnesses called by defendant, and uncontradicted documentary evidence as shown by the account sheet offered in evidence by defendant (to which no objection was made by plaintiff), that payments as shown by said 7 checks were credited to plaintiff's accounts by reason of the issuance of said checks by Flick. The matter of crediting the account of plaintiff by reason of the issuance of the checks by Flick was before the jury for its consideration.

[8] Appellant asserts, however, that the court instructed the jury "that they could not regard any of the testimony given relative to the checks and they must treat such testimony as if they had never heard the same." The instruction given by the court, so referred to by appellant as an instruction embodying said assertion, was in part as follows: "You must not consider for any purpose any evidence offered and rejected, or which has been stricken out by the court; such evidence is to be treated as though you never had heard it." The evidence that was offered and rejected was the checks. The evidence that plaintiff's accounts for equipment in her shop were credited, by reason of the checks drawn by Flick, was not rejected. The instruction given by the court, so referred to by defendant, does not bear the interpretation which defendant placed upon it that the jury "could not regard any of the testimony given relative to the checks."

[9, 10] Defendant also asserts that "we find the counsel for the respondent causing the Court to admonish the jury to disregard the very evidence that respondent now claims was and is before the jury [referring to the evidence that the checks were credited to plaintiff's accounts]." Said assertion is based upon the following: "Mr. Hubbard: This group of checks it has been testified were given in payment of the boiler and the press * * * and I think that is sufficient identification to permit them to be introduced here in evidence. I don't think it is necessary to show how the endorsement was placed on there or by whom. The check on its face shows it is a check of Andrew W. Flick. Mr. Vallee: Just a minute. I charge counsel again with probably inadvertently, though he is, doing something he shouldn't do, telling what the evidence may be 'if it is introduced, to this jury. The Court: I will instruct the jury to disregard any statements made by counsel." (After further discussion, all of which does not appear in the transcript, the court said,

"I will sustain the objection.") A statement of counsel made during a trial is not to be considered as evidence unless such statement is made as an admission or stipulation conceding the existence of a fact. The admonition of the court that the jury should disregard said statement of counsel for defendant was proper.

[11,12] Defendant also contends that the court erred in refusing to receive evidence of an admission against interest made by plaintiff. The defendant was called as a witness by her counsel and was asked by her counsel whether the plaintiff had a conversation with her (defendant) relative to the filing of a claim by plaintiff against the estate of Flick. Defendant replied in the affirmative, and after other questions and answers concerning the time and place of, and the persons present at, the conversation, the following occurred:

"Q. And what was said, if anything, at that time [September, 1941] by Mrs. Armstrong [plaintiff] in your presence?

"Mr. Vallee: Just a moment. I object to that on the ground there is no evidence of any compromise—

"The Court: I don't know what it is.

"Mr. Vallee:—which is admissible in evidence.

"Mr. Hubbard: This is not any evidence of a compromise, as I understand.

"The Court: The objection is overruled, subject to a motion to strike, if not proper. You may answer.

"Q. By Mr. Hubbard: What was the conversation? A. Well, she called me out of the liquor store over into her cleaning shop and she asked me what I thought about settling, and I told her that—

"Mr. Vallee: Now,—

"The Court: That is stricken out; the jury will disregard that."

In Boyes v. Evans, 1936, 14 Cal.App.2d 472, at page 479, 58 P.2d 922, at page 926, it was said: "It is a well-established rule of law that it is not permissible to show that a party to litigation has offered to compromise the cause. The rule not only excludes the offer to compromise, but also all negotiations with relation thereto." In H. D. Taylor Co. v. J. H. Jonas & Sons, 1931, 118 Cal.App. 208, at page 211, 4 P.2d 797, at page 799, it was said: "Counsel's own question about 'trying to settle' clearly warranted the court's conclusion that he was inquiring into an offer to compromise and such evidence was inadmissible." The purported conversation was in September, 1941. The testimony of counsel for defendant (given after said testimony by defendant) showed that he had received a letter from plaintiff about May 7, 1941, wherein plaintiff claimed $912 for two years' services rendered to Flick as clerk and housekeeper. His testimony also showed that prior to receiving the letter he had told plaintiff she could not recover for services which were rendered more than two years preceding Flick's death unless she had a contract with Flick. It appears therefore that at the time of the purported conversation wherein the witness said, "she asked what I thought about settling," that a claim had been filed by plaintiff with the administratrix (the said witness). There was therefore, at the time of the purported conversation, an issue between the plaintiff and the witness which could have been the subject of a compromise. If, as appellant asserts, the statement of the witness was not to be evidence of an attempted compromise, it was the duty of counsel for defendant to have informed the court concerning what he intended to prove, but he failed to so inform the court. It was not error to exclude the answer relative to "settling."

The last contention of defendant is that "a contract in favor of the plaintiff could not be implied or enforced because prohibited by law." Her argument in support of that contention is that "the case was tried upon the theory of a long line of decisions holding that where services have been performed and accepted the law will imply a contract to pay the reasonable value of such services at the conclusion thereof," and that "in cases where the services have continued until the time of death, payment of such services was not due until the date of death"; and that "All of the aforesaid decisions are in direct conflict with the labor laws of the State of California." She cites several sections of the Labor Code (enacted in 1937, St.1937, p. 185) which, insofar as material here, provide in substance as follows: Section 200, that "'Wages' includes all amounts for labor performed by employees," and that "'Labor' includes labor, work, or service whether rendered * * * under contract * * * or other agreement if the labor * * * is performed personally by the person demanding payment"; section 204, that certain wages are "payable twice during each calendar month"; section 205, that "in household domestic service, when the employees * * * are boarded and lodged by the employer, the wages * * * shall become due and payable once in each calendar month"; section 210, that "every person who fails to pay the wages * * * as provided in sections 204 and 205, shall forfeit to the State the sum of ten dollars for each failure"; section 215, that "Any person * * * who violates any provision of sections 204, 205 * * * is guilty of a misdemeanor"; and section 219, that "no provision of this article can in anyway be contravened or set aside by a private agreement, whether written, oral, or implied." Appellant asserts that said sections of the Labor Code "are prohibitory and being for the public welfare and therefore any contract either express or implied in contravention of them is void and unenforceable." She states further that by reason of said provisions of the Labor Code that "an implied contract to pay for services rendered cannot be the basis for a suit to recover the reasonable value thereof."

[13-15] These points were not presented during the trial, but were first presented upon the motion for a new trial. Apparently it is defendant's contention that if plaintiff was entitled to wages for her alleged services and if she failed to collect the wages each month, as provided in section 204 or section 205 of the Labor Code, she forfeited the wages. It is not necessary to consider further the contention of defendant based upon said sections of the Labor Code for the reason this action is not predicated upon an agreement to pay wages. The implied finding of the jury was that there was an agreement between Flick and plaintiff that if plaintiff would perform certain services for Flick that he would devise and bequeath certain property to her. Under such an agreement, if Flick failed to fulfill his part of the agreement the law implied an agreement, upon his death, to pay plaintiff the reasonable value of the services she had rendered. This is not an action upon an express contract to pay wages or upon an express contract to pay for services rendered. The provisions of section 1624, subdivision 6, of the Civil Code (the statute of frauds) are not applicable herein. This is an action for the reasonable value of services rendered. If services have been performed under an agreement that compensation for the services would be provided for in a will, the reasonable value of such services may be recovered if no provision was made in the will for compensation for the services. Winder v. Winder, 1941, 18 Cal.2d 123, 127, 114 P.2d 347, 144 A.L.R. 935; Reeves v. Vallow, 1940, 16 Cal.2d 95, 97, 104 P.2d 1017; Long v. Rumsey, 1938, 12 Cal.2d 334, 342, 84 P.2d 146. Under such an agreement, as shown by the implied findings of the jury that plaintiff was to be compensated by will for services rendered, a cause of action for the reasonable value of services did not arise until the death of Flick and the statute of limitations did not bar any part of the period of continuous services. Lloyd v. Kleefisch, 1941, 48 Cal.App.2d 408, 412, 120 P.2d 97.

[16] Plaintiff asserts that since defendant appealed from the judgment that plaintiff have and recover the automobile and the two certificates and has not contended on appeal that said judgment should be reversed, a penalty for taking a frivolous appeal as to said judgment should be assessed. Although defendant did not contend that said judgment should be reversed, the points presented by defendant as to the judgment for the reasonable value of services rendered applied also to the judgment concerning the automobile and the certificates. A decision on appeal that there was prejudicial error in the rulings of the court as to the admissibility of evidence concerning the judgment for the reasonable value of services would have applied also to the other judgment. A penalty should not be assessed by reason of said appeal.

The judgments are affirmed.

64 Cal.App.2d 805

HYMAN v. TARPLEE et al. (WOODWARD, Intervener).

Civ. 12633.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

June 10, 1944.

1. Gifts ⇨49(5)

Evidence sustained finding that bank account in name of decedent's first wife as trustee for decedent represented money given to first wife by decedent after his divorce from her, and that no part of such funds belonged to decedent or his estate.

2. Gifts ⇨4

The essentials of a valid "gift" are competency of donor to contract; a voluntary intent of donor to make a gift; delivery, actual or symbolical, amounting to a transfer of title; acceptance, actual or imputed; a complete divestment of all control by donor; and a lack of consideration in return for gift.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Gift".

3. Gifts ⇨32(1)

A gift of donor's own note or check is not enforceable by donee against donor or his estate in absence of an estoppel, since note or check amounts to a promise to make a gift in future.

4. Gifts ⇨32(1)

Where alleged donor is payee of note or check, rule that a gift of donor's own note or check is not enforceable has no application, since title passes to note or check of which donor is payee upon physical delivery to donee even without endorsement.

5. Gifts ⇨49(5)

Evidence that donee placed money given to her by donor in bank account in her name as trustee for donor, and that donee was disturbed over possibility that donor might need hospital and medical care, authorized finding that donee unequivocally accepted gift.

6. Gifts ⇨5(3)

Donee's deposit of money given to her by donor in name of donee as trustee for donor does not necessarily create a trust in which donor has a present interest and is not necessarily inconsistent with a completed gift.

7. Trusts ⇨34(1), 59(1)

A deposit in name of depositor as trustee for third party, where depositor retains right to withdraw all money deposited and third party is entitled to balance only upon death of depositor if no other disposition has been made of fund by depositor, is a "tentative trust" revocable at will, and, in absence of agreement to contrary, third party has no right to withdraw money prior to death of depositor.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Tentative Trust".

8. Pleading ⇨236(1)

Where defendant's new attorneys, who were engaged after original attorney died, discovered that original answer incorrectly set forth facts, trial court did not abuse its discretion in permitting filing of an amended answer several weeks prior to trial.

9. Appeal and error ⇨959(1)

Pleading ⇨236(1)

The granting or refusing of leave to amend an answer is within sound discretion of trial court, which discretion will seldom be disturbed where exercised for purpose of allowing true facts to be alleged.

10. Pleading ⇨255

The rule that court should be liberal in allowing amendments when they do not seriously impair rights of opposite party is particularly applicable to answers.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Sylvain J. Lazarus, Judge.

Action by Joseph G. DeForest, as executor of the last will of George H. Woodward, also known as George Holmes Woodward, deceased, against Elizabeth K. Tarplee and Irene Woodward Troy to recover a sum deposited in a bank account in name of first-named defendant as trustee for decedent, wherein Mary G. Woodward, guardian of the persons and estates of Milo Woodward and Beverly Woodward, minors, intervened. Joseph G. DeForest died and Joseph Leo Hyman was substituted as plaintiff. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff and intervenor appeal.

Affirmed.

Fred L. Berry, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Joseph Leo Hyman, of San Francisco, for intervenor appellant.

Fabius T. Finch and Paul F. Fratossa, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

PETERS, Presiding Justice.

Joseph G. DeForest, as executor of the will of George H. Woodward, brought this action against Elizabeth K. Tarplee and her daughter, Irene Woodward Troy, to recover $4,071.26 deposited in a bank account in the name of Elizabeth K. Tarplee as trustee for George H. Woodward, on the theory that the deposit belonged to the estate of decedent. DeForest has since died and Joseph Leo Hyman substituted as plaintiff. Mary G. Woodward, as guardian of the persons and estates of her two minor daughters, was permitted to intervene. Her legal position is identical with that of the plaintiff. On the theory that Woodward, prior to his death, made a completed gift to Mrs. Tarplee of the money in question, which was accepted by her, the trial court determined that Mrs. Tarplee owned the deposit. The plaintiff and intervenor appeal. Their main contention is that there is no evidence to show a completed gift.

The evidence most favorable to respondents is as follows: The decedent, George H. Woodward, was married three times. Mrs. Tarplee was his first wife, and defendant, Mrs. Troy, is their daughter. Woodward and Mrs. Tarplee were married in 1899 and divorced in 1907. There is some evidence that during their marriage Mrs. Tarplee loaned her husband $1,000 of her own money to finance a bicycle shop, which sum was never repaid. There was no property settlement at the time of the divorce, nor any provision for alimony. After the divorce the parties remained on friendly terms, and Woodward paid his former wife for the support and education of their daughter. In 1920 the daughter left college and married. Woodward strongly disapproved of the marriage, and, as a result, became estranged from his daughter. Thereafter, for many years, he did not see her. He did remain on friendly terms with Mrs. Tarplee, and, for a period of about five years, ending about 1923, he had his mother board with her.

Woodward married a second time. This marriage lasted but a few years, terminating in a divorce. In that proceeding he paid his second wife $30,000 in cash, and gave her a life estate in some valuable property in San Francisco. In 1923 he married a third time, this time to the intervenor Mary G. Woodward. Two children were born of this marriage.

After his divorce from respondent, Woodward's new business, a machine shop, prospered. He purchased a home in Hillsborough in which he and his third wife and their two children lived. He deeded this house to his third wife, together with an adjoining piece of vacant land. By his will he left his business, appraised at $40,000, to his two children by his third wife, and also left them some insurance. During the period 1920-1937 Woodward remained estranged from his daughter by his first wife, and from 1923 to 1937 he saw Mrs. Tarplee on but one or two occasions.

By 1937 Woodward's third marriage was on the verge of collapse. At that time he was suffering from a heart ailment, and was highly nervous and excitable. He left his Hillsborough home and took a room in San Francisco. Shortly thereafter he called upon Mrs. Tarplee and became reconciled with his daughter, the respondent Irene, and her daughter, his grandchild. Irene, who had divorced her husband, was living with her mother, and was working. As time went on Woodward became very friendly with this family. He called every morning and gave his daughter a ride to work, and called for her nearly every night and rode her home. Nearly every day he returned to the Tarplee house after taking his daughter to work and had breakfast with Mrs. Tarplee, and would then rest. Mrs. Tarplee would put up his lunch and he would then go to his shop. He was too nervous to remain there any length of time, and many times he returned to the Tarplee home in the afternoon for a rest, or he would take Mrs. Tarplee for a ride. Nearly every evening he had dinner at the Tarplee house. Both he and his daughter enjoyed fighting and wrestling matches, and several nights a week he escorted her to such exhibitions. On Sunday he frequently took his granddaughter to the ball game.

During this period he stated, on many occasions, that he wanted to do something for his first wife, their daughter and granddaughter. He told them that he had a single premium five-year endowment policy for $5,000 which he had purchased with funds that were not community property of himself and his third wife, and that he wanted Mrs. Tarplee and his daughter to have this money. He was very appreciative of the care and consideration given to him by Mrs. Tarplee and their daughter, and also wanted to repay Mrs. Tarplee for the original $1,000 she had loaned him. He expressed the thought that if he left the $5,000 to them by will, that there would be considerable trouble. He expressed these feelings many times before the date of the questioned gift. In June of 1938, before the due date of the policy, he went to the insurance company, and had the policy reduced to $2,500, and cashed in the other $2,500. For this he received a check from the insurance company for $2,066.68. He brought this check to the Tarplee home, there endorsed it, and handed it to Mrs. Tarplee stating, according to her testimony: "I want you to have it, if I would leave it, there would be too much trouble. * * * Well, I have got this money and I want you to have it, that is all I can do for you," and he says, "you know," he says, "I owe you a thousand dollars, and," he says "I am going to give you a power of attorney on a thousand dollars that I have in the bank, and," he says, "if I need anything you take it out of that." After endorsing the check, he handed it to her and stated: "Here, this is yours." Mrs. Tarplee further testified that when he handed the check to her she stated: "George, you really hadn't ought to give me this, suppose you might need this yourself." He replied: "I won't need it, it is for you; that is all I can do for you and I want you to have it * * * you know, I owe you that thousand and I will try to make up for what I didn't give you and Irene." Mrs. Tarplee testified that she then suggested that the money be deposited in the bank in her name with Woodward as beneficiary; that she had such an account with her daughter and understood that if anything happened to her, the daughter would get that account; that if anything happened to her and her daughter she thought Woodward should get the money here involved.

On cross examination she testified that she took the first check "with the understanding that it was for me * * * " that when he handed her the check he stated: "That is for you. That is yours and I don't want any part of it. I will be taken care of, I have the shop. * * * This check is yours. Here, take it."

The respondent Mrs. Troy corroborated the story told by her mother in all important particulars.

After the check had thus been handed to Mrs. Tarplee, she put it in her purse and kept it for several days until she had an opportunity to go to the bank with Woodward. The check was deposited in a new account in the name of "Elizabeth K. Tarplee, trustee for George H. Woodward." Mrs. Tarplee kept possession of the bank book.

A few days after the account was opened, Woodward cashed in the balance of the insurance policy and received a check for $2,004.58. Either he or Mrs. Tarplee deposited this check in the account. Mrs. Tarplee first testified that this check was also endorsed and handed to her and that she deposited it, but later she testified that Woodward may have deposited the second check. The evidence is clear, however, that Woodward intended this second check to be part of the same transaction with the first check. After the deposit of the second check the account had a balance of $4,071.26. Mrs. Tarplee withdrew $71.26, and apparently divided it with Woodward in order that the account should have a balance of an even $4,000. Mrs. Tarplee kept the bank book, and no further money was withdrawn from the account until after Woodward's death, which occurred several weeks later. After Woodward's death she withdrew the money and opened another trust account in her name as trustee for her daughter.

As was indicated above, about the time of these transactions Woodward also gave Mrs. Tarplee a power of attorney to draw on an account of his in which there was $1,000 on deposit. This was done, according to her testimony, in order that, if he became ill, she could secure money to pay his expenses. No money was withdrawn from this account prior to Woodward's death. After his death Mrs. Woodward attempted to withdraw this money to pay his funeral expenses, but the bank, having heard of Woodward's death, properly refused payment. This money, of course, belongs to the estate.

[1,2] This is a fair summary of the evidence produced by the respondents. It seems too clear to require extended comment that such evidence supports the conclusion of the trial court that there was a completed gift of this money to Mrs. Tarplee. The essentials of a valid gift are thus summarized in 13 Cal.Jur. p. 32, § 1: "The essentials of a valid gift are (1) competency of the donor to contract, (2) a voluntary intent on the part of the donor to make a gift, (3) delivery either actual or symbolical, amounting to a transfer of title, (4) acceptance, actual or imputed, (5) a complete divestment of all control by donor, and (6), a lack of consideration in return for the gift."

[3,4] Appellants urge that the evidence fails to show a delivery by Woodward or an unequivocal acceptance by Mrs. Tarplee, and fails to show that the money was not in fact held in trust for Woodward. So far as delivery is concerned, appellants place their main reliance on the rule that a gift of the donor's own note or check is not enforceable by the donee against the donor or his estate, in the absence of an estoppel, for the reason that it only amounts to a promise to make a gift in the future, and is no more enforceable than any other promise to make a gift. That is undoubtedly the law. Coon v. Shry, 209 Cal. 612, 289 P. 815; Tracy v. Alvord, 118 Cal. 654, 50 P. 757; Wisler v. Tomb, 169 Cal. 382, 146 P. 876; Hironymous v. Hiatt, 52 Cal.App. 727, 199 P. 850. But that rule has no application to the facts of this case. That rule only applies where the alleged donor is the maker of the note or the check. It has no application at all to a case, such as the present one, where the alleged donor is the payee of the note or check. In such event, just as in the case of other choses in action given the requisite intent, title passes to the note or check upon physical delivery to the donee, even without endorsement. Edwards v. Wagner, 121 Cal. 376, 53 P. 821; Druke v. Heiken, 61 Cal. 346, 44 Am. Rep. 553; Eckstrom v. Brooks, 115 Cal. App. 727, 2 P.2d 207; see cases collected 38 C.J.S., Gifts, § 54, p. 840; 24 Am.Jur. § 83, p. 773.

[5] So far as acceptance is concerned, appellants urge that Mrs. Tarplee did not unequivocally accept the proffered gift, but insisted that Woodward retain some interest therein. It is far more reasonable to interpret the evidence as indicating that Mrs. Tarplee did unequivocally accept the gift, but wanted to assure Woodward that if anything happened to her and their daughter the money would be returned to him. She obviously was disturbed over the possibility that he might need hospital and medical care and might be unable to get ready cash to pay for them. That problem was taken care of by the $1,000 deposit.

[6,7] So far as the form of the deposit is concerned, a trust in which Woodward had a present interest was not necessarily created thereby. Such deposits are frequently used where the so-called trustee retains the right to withdraw all of the money deposited, and the so-called beneficiary is entitled to the balance only upon the death of the depositor, if no other disposition has been made of the fund by the depositor. In re Estate of Alberts, 38 Cal. App.2d 42, 100 P.2d 538. Such trusts are "tentative trusts," revocable at will, and in the absence of agreement to the contrary, the beneficiary has no right to withdraw the money prior to the death of the trustee. In re Totten, 179 N.Y. 112, 71 N.E. 748, 70 L.R.A. 711, 1 Ann.Cas. 900. For a full description of such trusts see Restatement of Law of Trusts, Vol. 1, § 58, p. 181. Such a form of deposit is not necessarily inconsistent with a completed gift to Mrs. Tarplee.

The only other point urged by appellants is that the trial court abused its discretion in permitting respondents to amend their answer upon motion prior to trial. When the original answer was filed respondents were represented by a lawyer who subsequently died. In this original answer the respondents alleged that the money was deposited for the use and benefit of Woodward during his lifetime and was to become the property of respondents only upon Woodward's death. After the death of the lawyer that had prepared this answer, the present lawyers were retained. They examined the pleadings and consulted with their clients and discovered that the original answer incorrectly set forth the facts. Several weeks prior to trial the new lawyers served and filed a notice of motion to amend the answer. That motion was supported by affidavits and by a draft of the proposed amended answer. The amendment consisted in alleging a completed absolute gift prior to the death of Woodward. The motion was opposed by appellants, and, after a hearing, permission to file the amended answer was granted by the court.

Appellants urge that in allowing this amendment the court abused its discretion in that the amended answer sets up an entirely different transaction than the one relied upon as a defense in the original answer. One case is cited, Webster-Soule Farm v. Woodmansee's Adm'r, 36 Idaho 520, 211 P. 1090, in which it was held that the court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to permit an amendment which directly contradicted an allegation of fact contained in the original pleading.

[8-10] The granting or refusing of leave to amend an answer is within the sound discretion of the court. Such discretion will seldom be disturbed where exercised for the purpose of allowing the true facts to be alleged. The rule that the court should be liberal in allowing amendments when they do not seriously impair the rights of the opposite party is particularly applicable to answers. See cases collected 21 Cal.Jur. § 140, p. 203. The allowance of this amendment was obviously within the discretion of the lower court.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

HUDSON v. ZUMWALT et al.
Civ. No. 7038.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

June 14, 1944.

Rehearing Denied July 14, 1944.

Hearing Denied Aug. 10, 1944.

1. Injunction ☞251

In action on bond, evidence supported finding that plaintiff was entitled to $1,000 damages for loss sustained in sale of his equipment and loss of profits in his business on account of defendants improperly securing a temporary restraining order in another action to terminate present plaintiff's lease of gas station.

149 P.2d—29½

2. Malicious prosecution ☞56

The burden is on one who seeks to recover damages for malicious prosecution of proving that former suit was commenced maliciously without probable cause, and that it terminated favorably to him.

3. Malicious prosecution ☞27

"Malice", as it relates to malicious prosecution, does not necessarily infer presence of anger or vindictiveness, and it is sufficient if it appears that former suit was commenced in bad faith to vex, annoy or wrong the adverse party. Pen.Code, § 7, subd. 4.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Malice".

4. Malicious prosecution ☞20

"Probable cause", as it relates to malicious prosecution, may exist when one possesses a suspicion or draws a conclusion which is founded on circumstances sufficiently strong to warrant a reasonable person to assume the truth of the charge.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Probable Cause".

5. Malicious prosecution ☞16

The mere proof of want of probable cause is not sufficient to justify a judgment for malicious prosecution, but it is necessary also to prove actual malice.

6. Malicious prosecution ☞20

The knowledge of facts which may justify the alleged malicious suit is that which is possessed at time of its commencement and not that which is subsequently acquired.

7. Malicious prosecution ☞35(1)

Although it is necessary to prove that former action was terminated favorably to party claiming injury, it need not be shown that it was finally decided on its merits, and it is sufficient if it was disposed of in such a manner as to require plaintiff to institute another action to try issues presented.

8. Landlord and tenant ☞116(5)

If purchaser of gas station desired to evict one operating the station as a tenant under a lease from month to month for failure to pay rent, purchaser's notice should have been in the alternative to pay the rent or surrender possession. Code Civ.Proc. § 1161, subd. 2; Civ.Code, § 827.

9. Malicious prosecution ⇨64(2)

Evidence was sufficient to establish case of malicious prosecution against purchaser of a gas station who brought suit against one operating the station under a lease for unlawful detention of property, where it appeared that suit was brought to vex and annoy lessee and to force him to sell his trade fixtures without probable cause. Civ.Code, § 1019.

10. Malicious prosecution ⇨21(2)

Defense of reliance upon advice of counsel was not available to defendant in malicious prosecution action, where it appeared that defendant was himself an attorney who had previously enjoyed an active practice of the law, and that defendant did not make full disclosure of all material facts to attorney with whom he consulted.

11. Appeal and error ⇨1004(1)

A verdict in a malicious prosecution action will not be disturbed as excessive unless amount is so large as to be presumptively the result of passion and prejudice.

Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; Arthur Coats, Judge.

Action by J. L. Hudson against I. G. Zumwalt, L. J. Lowry and others upon a bond furnished by named defendants upon the issuance of a temporary restraining order in another action to terminate present plaintiff's lease of a gas station for breach of covenant to pay the rent. From a judgment for plaintiff against named defendants, the named defendants alone appeal.

Affirmed.

Seth Millington, of Gridley, and C. D. McComish, of Colusa, for appellants.

E. Vayne Miller, of Sacramento, for respondent.

THOMPSON, Justice.

The defendants, I. G. Zumwalt and L. J. Lowry, have appealed from a judgment which was rendered against them pursuant to the verdict of a jury, in a suit upon a bond furnished by appellants upon the issuance of a temporary restraining order in another action to terminate plaintiff's lease of a gas station for breach of covenant to pay the rent. The judgment from which this appeal is taken also includes further damages for malicious prosecution of the suit to terminate the lease. A motion for nonsuit and a motion for new trial were denied.

The complaint in this case was couched in two counts. The first cause was for damages sustained in the sale of plaintiff's equipment and loss of profits in his business on account of the restraining order. He claims to have lost an offer of $2,500 for his business and equipment. He sold the equipment for $750. The second cause was for damages for malicious prosecution of the suit for possession of the gas station. The $1,000 bond was executed by I. G. Zumwalt, L. J. Lowry and Leon Spier. Pending the trial, Leon Spier died and the action against him was dismissed. At the close of plaintiff's evidence a nonsuit was granted as to the defendants George R. Zumwalt and Lionel R. Zumwalt. The jury returned a verdict against I. G. Zumwalt and L. J. Lowry on the first count of the complaint in the sum of $1,000. On the second count the jury returned a verdict against I. G. Zumwalt for $4,000 compensatory damages and the additional sum of $1,000 as exemplary damages. Judgment was rendered against I. G. Zumwalt and L. J. Lowry for $1,000, and against I. G. Zumwalt only for the additional sum of $4,000.

Cora Elizabeth Wickes Thornton owned a gas station lot at Willows in Glenn County. April 30, 1936, she executed a written lease of the property to J. L. Hudson for one year at $25 per month, payable in advance on the first day of each month. The lease provided that after the expiration of the year the lessee would be deemed to hold possession of the property "from month to month" on the same terms. The lease also provided that at the expiration of the term the lessee should have ten days within which to remove all of his improvements "including buried tanks but excluding all plumbing and plumbing fixtures and all sewer, water, gas and electric connections and also excluding cement or gravel walks, runways and approaches and all foundations," provided he was not then in default of any of the terms of the lease. May 1, 1936, Mr. Hudson took possession and operated the gas station until August 6, 1937. He constructed and equipped the gas station on that lot including the installation of two 500 gallon tanks, one 10,000 gallon tank, three gas pumps, one service station building, two toilets, two flood lights, water fixtures, air fixtures, one air compressor, approaches to the roads and he surfaced the yard with gravel, all at a total expense of $3,050. April 30, 1937, Mr. Hudson became ill and orally agreed with C. R. Wickes, the father of the lessor, to thereafter continue the lease from month to month for the rental of $15 per month payable on the first of each month in advance. Mr. Wickes, as the agent for his daughter, the lessor, on May 28, 1937, listed the gas station property for sale with L. J. Lowry, a real estate broker, for the sum of $2,500. He testified that he then told Lowry that "Mr. Hudson's lease had expired and that he wanted the privilege of moving off on account of his health and I told him at the time that if he would stay there I would reduce the rent to $15.00 a month with the privilege of moving his equipment off according to the original lease."

May 28, 1937, Mrs. Thornton, the owner of the property, signed a written agreement to sell the gas station lot to the I. G. Zumwalt Company for $2,500, which was subsequently fully paid and a duly executed deed therefor was delivered to the purchaser on June 8th of that year. At that time a copy of Hudson's written lease was delivered to I. G. Zumwalt. Mr. Lowry, the real estate agent, told him the lease had expired and that Mr. Hudson was holding possession of the property from month to month at $25 rental per month. Lowry testified that he did not learn of the oral agreement of Mr. Wickes for Hudson to retain possession from month to month for the reduced rental of $15 per month until after the sale to Zumwalt had been consummated. Zumwalt testified that he had no such knowledge. In May and June, 1937, Mr. Hudson paid Wickes $15 rent for each of those two months.

July 1st Hudson first learned that the property had been sold to the Zumwalt Company, and on the 6th of that month he visited Mr. I. G. Zumwalt at Colusa, and offered to pay $15 rent for July with his check on a Willows bank. Zumwalt refused to accept it, saying the amount of his rent was $25. Mr. Hudson testified that he replied, "Well, if it's going to be $25.00 I will go home and move off." Mr. Zumwalt said: "Oh, no, you can't move that equipment off from my property." Mr. Hudson further testified that: "I said 'Mr. Zumwalt, my agreement with Mr. Wickes is that I can move off. The law is on my side. I will go home and move off by the first of the month.' And he said 'I don't care what your agreement is with Mr. Wickes or what the law is, I know how to get around the law. I will throw you in court and hold you there until you will be glad to sell', so I said 'Well, I offered you my rent of $15.00 and I will give you $10.00 more and I will go home and be gone by the 1st of the month.' He said, 'Well, maybe your rent will be $75.00', and I knew there was no use of arguing further, so I got up and walked out."

July 14th, I. G. Zumwalt served Mr. Hudson with notice of the termination of his lease and to quit the premises.

During the trial of the possessory action, by agreement between respective parties, that suit was dismissed. The restraining order was dissolved. Zumwalt waived the rent which was due, and consented to the removal of the equipment by the lessee. Zumwalt bought one of the tanks from Hudson. The lessee sold his entire equipment for $750. He did not operate his gas station after August 6th, when the temporary restraining order was issued and served. It prohibited him during the pendency of the action from removing the "buildings, improvements, fixtures, including tanks buried in the ground."

This suit for malicious prosecution was commenced October 29, 1939. It is contended there is no evidence to support the judgment for damages on the undertaking bond for $1,000 based on the first count, and that there is no evidence to support the penalty of $4,000 on the second count for malicious prosecution of the possessory action.

[1] We are of the opinion the judgment for damages in the sum of $1,000 sustained on account of the sale of plaintiff's equipment and improvement is supported by the evidence. There is evidence that Mr. Hudson in June, 1937, had an agreement to sell his improvements and equipment to Clarence O. Swarner for $2,500, if he could find a suitable location to which he could remove it; that he did find such location at Live Oak, and was anxious to complete the purchase, but the injunction then prevented the sale. There is evidence that the improvements and equipment which Hudson placed on the premises cost him $3,050. He had used this property only about a year, but the deterioration and cost of removal would reduce its value considerably. It is true that the plaintiff did include in his complaint as an element of damages counsel fees incident to the vacating of the restraining order, and a loss of income on account of the suit. He testified that his income was reduced on account of the injunction from $10 a day to about $1.40 per day. But those elements of damages are of slight consequence. He operated the business only about a month after the restraining order was issued. But without the last-mentioned items the evidence is sufficient to support damages on the first count in the sum of $1,000.

A more serious question is presented as to whether there is sufficient evidence to support the judgment of $4,000 for malicious prosecution.

[2-7] It becomes necessary to determine whether the former suit was commenced maliciously without probable cause, and that it terminated favorably to J. L. Hudson. The burden is on one who seeks to recover damages for malicious prosecution to prove the foregoing issues. Griswold v. Griswold, 143 Cal. 617, 77 P. 672; Garfield v. Peoples Finance & Thrift Co., 24 Cal.App.2d 144, 157, 74 P.2d 1061; 16 Cal.Jur. 734, sec. 7. Malice does not necessarily infer the presence of anger or vindictiveness. It is sufficient if it appears that the former suit was commenced in bad faith to vex, annoy or wrong the adverse party. Sec. 7, subd. 4, Penal Code; Griswold v. Griswold, supra, 143 Cal. 617, 620, 77 P. 672; MacGruer v. Denivelle, 113 Cal.App. 49, 54, 297 P. 633; 16 Cal. Jur. 736, sec. 8. "Probable cause", as it relates to actions for malicious prosecution, may exist when one possesses a suspicion or draws a conclusion which is founded on circumstances sufficiently strong to warrant a reasonable person to assume the truth of the charge. Lee v. Levison, 173 Cal. 166, 159 P. 438; Sebastian v. Crowley, 38 Cal.App.2d 194, 101 P.2d 120; Perry v. Washington National Ins. Co., 14 Cal.App.2d 609, 58 P.2d 701, 59 P.2d 158. The mere proof of probable cause is not sufficient to justify a verdict or judgment for malicious prosecution. It is also necessary to prove actual malice. Vesper v. Crane Co., 165 Cal. 36, 130 P. 876, L.R.A. 1915A, 541. There is no distinction in that regard between civil suits and criminal actions. 16 Cal.Jur. 735, sec. 8. The knowledge of facts which may justify the alleged malicious suit is that which is possessed at the time of its commencement and not that which is subsequently acquired. Richter v. Neilson, 11 Cal.App.2d 503, 515, 54 P.2d 54. While it is necessary to prove that the former malicious action was terminated favorably to the party claiming injury, it need not be shown that it was finally decided on its merits. It is sufficient if it was disposed of in such a manner as to require the plaintiff to institute another action to try the issues presented. Hurgren v. Union Mutual Life Ins. Co., 141 Cal. 585, 75 P. 168; Jaffe v. Stone, 18 Cal.2d 146, 114 P.2d 335, 135 A.L.R. 775; 16 Cal.Jur. 734, sec. 7; 135 A.L.R. 793, note.

While there is a conflict of evidence in this case regarding the good faith or motive which prompted Mr. Zumwalt to bring the suit against Hudson for unlawful detention of the property, there is adequate proof that it was maliciously instituted to vex and annoy the lessee or to force him to sell his trade fixtures. The written lease specifically provides that if the lessee held over after the expiration of one year, for which it was executed, "such tenancy shall be from month to month." Sec. 1946, Civil Code. That tenancy required one month's notice to terminate it. After the expiration of the written lease the lessor orally agreed to reduce his rent to $15 per month and authorized him to remove his improvements and fixtures. Proof of that oral reduction of rent appears from the fact that the owner accepted two $15 payments of rent for the months of May and June. When Mr. Hudson discovered that Zumwalt had purchased the property he went to see him at Colusa on July 6th to pay his rent, which he offered to do by means of a $15 check. A dispute then occurred as to whether the rent for July was to be $25 or only $15. Hudson then told Mr. Zumwalt it had been reduced to $15, which he refused to accept. It is immaterial for the purposes of this malicious prosecution suit that Hudson failed to make his tender good by depositing the check in a bank and giving notice thereof to the creditor as provided by Section 1500 of the Civil Code, for Zumwalt positively refused to accept that sum in full payment of the rent. He did not then question the validity of the check. The statements which were then made furnish some evidence of malice on his part. When Hudson told him that if the rent was to be $25 per month "I will go home and move off", Mr. Zumwalt replied, "Oh, no, you can't move that equipment off from my property, * * *. I don't care what your agreement is with Mr. Wickes, or what the law is, I know how to get around the law, I will throw you in court and hold you there until you will be glad to sell." It is true that Mr. Zumwalt denied making those statements, but the truthfulness of those statements was a matter for the determination of the jury. With its conclusions in that regard we may not interfere.

The next question to be determined is whether there was probable cause to believe that the suit in unlawful detainer under Section 1161 of the Code of Civil Procedure was justified and brought in good faith. It was said by the Supreme Court in Paskle v. Williams, 214 Cal. 482, at page 487, 6 P.2d 505, at page 507:

"The motive, even if malicious, of defendants is unimportant if legal ground existed upon which to predicate the suit in question."

[8] Mr. Zumwalt had the written lease in his possession. He exhibited it to his attorney. He must have known that it provided for tenure "from month to month", after the expiration of the written lease. The tenancy from month to month could not be lawfully terminated for non-payment of rent for the month of July, except upon notice as provided by either Section 1161, Subdivision 2, of the Code of Civil Procedure, or Section 827 of the Civil Code. 15 Cal.Jur. 640, sec. 48. The notice which was given was for immediate possession. It did not contemplate a change of the terms of the lease then in force by increasing the rent from $15 to $25 per month, under Section 827 of the Civil Code. The owner did not then have a valid cause of action for unlawful detention and immediate possession of the property. If he desired to evict the lessee for failure to pay the rent, then his notice under Section 1161, supra, should have been in the alternative, to pay the rent or surrender possession. Colyear v. Tobriner, 7 Cal.2d 735, 742, 62 P.2d 741. In the case last cited, under similar circumstances with respect to the termination of a lease for a specified rental, the Supreme Court held that Section 827 of the Civil Code was not applicable, and that Section 1161, Subdivision 2, of the Code of Civil Procedure required notice to be given in the alternative to pay the rent demanded or surrender possession of the premises. In the present case Mr. Hudson had offered to pay $15 rent for the month of July, which was in accordance with the terms of his agreement.

Moreover, the purchaser of the property wrongfully procured the issuance of the temporary restraining order prohibiting the lessee from removing "the buildings, improvements, fixtures, including tanks buried in the ground." The lease authorized him to remove those fixtures and improvements. Section 1019 of the Civil Code authorizes the removal of trade fixtures during the continuance of the term of the lease.

[9] We are therefore impelled to assume the appellant, I. G. Zumwalt, did not have a valid cause of action for unlawful detention of the property; that there is substantial evidence of a lack of probable cause for instituting the suit, and of the existence of malice.

[10] It may be a complete defense to a suit for malicious prosecution to prove that the defendant made a full and fair statement of all the material facts involved to his attorney, and that he relied upon his advice in commencing the suit complained of, provided it also appears that he was in good faith in so doing. 16 Cal.Jur. 742, sec. 11. We are of the opinion the defense of reliance upon the advice of counsel is not available under the circumstances of this case. Mr. Zumwalt was himself an attorney who had previously enjoyed an active practice of the law. He was told by Mr. Hudson on July 6th that he was holding possession of the property from month to month on a definite oral agreement of the former owner to pay rent in the sum of $15 per month after the expiration of the written lease. That important fact was not told to Mr. Zumwalt's attorney. If he doubted the truthfulness of that statement, he could have easily confirmed it by communicating with the former owner, before he went to his lawyer to commence the action. He failed to do so. Moreover, his reply to the statement regarding the amount of rent fixed by the previous owner was "I don't care what your agreement is with Mr. Wickes, or what the law is. * * * I will throw you in court and hold you there until you will be glad to sell." That is some evidence of a lack of good faith in commencing the unlawful detainer action.

[11] It does seem that the amount of the verdict and judgment for malicious prosecution is disproportionate to the damages found to have been incurred by the plaintiff. But that amount is not challenged as excessive. In 16 California Jurisprudence, page 754, section 20, it is said that a verdict in a malicious prosecution action will not be disturbed as excessive unless the amount is so large as to be presumptively the result of passion and prejudice.

The judgment is affirmed.

ANDERSON v. NEW YORK LIFE INS. CO.
Civ. 14206.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 3, California.

June 9, 1944.

Hearing Denied Aug. 7, 1944.

Insurance ◀536

Under life policies providing for disability benefits upon insurer's receipt "before default in payment of premiums" of proof that insured "is" totally disabled and that such disability "will continue for life", insured's failure to claim disability benefits during his lifetime barred his executrix from claiming such benefits.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Georgia P. Bullock, Judge.

Action by Beulah Anderson, as executrix of the last will and testament of William L. Anderson, deceased, against the New York Life Insurance Company to recover disability benefits on life policies issued by defendant to deceased. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Harry C. Cogen, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Meserve, Mumper & Hughes, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

DESMOND, Presiding Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendant insurance company in a case tried before a jury. It is contended that the evidence submitted was insufficient to sustain the verdict and that error arose when the trial court gave to the jury an allegedly erroneous instruction on the subject of waiver by the insured.

Mrs. Beulah Anderson, as executrix of her husband's estate, brought suit to collect disability benefits provided for in five separate policies of insurance which her husband had secured from the defendant company. Before the case was submitted to the jury she voluntarily dismissed two causes of action involving two of the policies.

The disability provision upon which Mrs. Anderson sought to recover appeared as a special and additional feature in policies primarily of life insurance, and the three policies which the jury was called upon to consider were written in the respective amounts of $5,000, $25,000 and $20,000. They were all issued on February 6, 1928, and contained identical disability provisions, reading as follows:

"Total and Permanent Disability

"Disability shall be considered total whenever the Insured is so disabled by bodily injury or disease that he is wholly prevented from performing any work, from following any occupation, or from engaging in any business for remuneration or profit, provided such disability occurred after the insurance under this policy took effect and before the anniversary of the policy on which the Insured's age at nearest birthday is sixty.

"Upon receipt at the Company's Home Office, before default in payment of premium, of due proof that the insured is totally disabled as above defined, and will be continuously so totally disabled for life, or if the proof submitted is not conclusive as to the permanency of such disability, but establishes that the Insured is, and for a period of not less than three consecutive months immediately preceding receipt of proof has been, totally disabled as above defined, the following benefits will be granted:

"(a) Waiver of Premium.—The Company will waive the payment of any premium falling due during the period of continuous total disability, the premium waived to be the annual, semi-annual or quarterly premium according to the mode of payment in effect when disability occurred.

"(b) Income Payments.—The Company will pay to the Insured the monthly income stated on the first page hereof ($10 per $1,000 of the face of this policy) for each completed month from the commencement of and during the period of continuous total disability. If disability results from insanity, payment will be made to the beneficiary in lieu of the Insured.

"In event of default in payment of premium after the Insured has become totally disabled as above defined, the policy will be restored and the benefits shall be the same as if said default had not occurred, provided due proof that the Insured is and has been continuously from date of default so totally disabled and that such disability will continue for life or has continued for a period of not less than three consecutive months, is received by the Company not later than six months after said default.

"The total and irrecoverable loss of the sight of both eyes or the use of both hands or of both feet or of one hand and one foot shall constitute total disability for life.

"Before making any income payment or waiving any premium, the Company may demand due proof of the continuance of total disability, but such proof will not be required oftener than once a year after such disability has continued for two full years. Upon failure to furnish such proof, or if the Insured performs any work, or follows any occupation, or engages in any business for remuneration or profit, no further income payments shall be made nor premiums waived."

The $5,000 life insurance policy provided for waiver of premiums during disability and payments of $50 per month as disability benefit; the $25,000 policy provided for waiver of premiums and $250 per month; and the $20,000 policy provided merely for waiver of premiums. A certain stated amount of the annual premium upon each policy was applicable, by its terms, to the total and permanent disability benefits in each case.

In the appellant's opening brief, the statement is made that "the policies were in good standing up to the time of Mr. Anderson's decease and he paid all premiums falling due on each of said policies." It may be assumed, therefore, that Mrs. Anderson, who had become the beneficiary under each policy, received the full amount of the face value of each upon proof of her husband's death.

Mr. Anderson died April 9, 1941, without having made any claim for disability benefits, or notified the defendant company that he was disabled in any way, but on June 9, 1941, his wife, as executrix of his estate, made demand upon the company for payment and, failing to receive such payment, on December 6, 1941, filed this action consisting of five causes, each relating to a separate policy. She alleged "That on or about September 7th, 1938, said insured became wholly and permanently disabled and said disability was and remained continuous and permanent from the 7th day of September, 1938 to the 9th day of April, 1941, upon which latter date the said insured died at the age of forty-seven (47) years." The first and second causes of action were those as to which dismissals were filed. As to the other three policies, the sums claimed as due, because of disability during the period mentioned, approximately 2½ years, amounted to $2,318.60 on the $5,000 policy, and $10,156.75 on the $25,000 policy. On the $20,000 policy, which provided for a waiver of premiums during the period of disability but not for any cash payment, the total amount claimed as due for premiums paid was $1,731. The defendant answered, denying the disability of the insured during the period mentioned and setting up, as an affirmative defense, that no notice or proof of disability was given prior to Mr. Anderson's death and, further, that under the provisions of section 10401 of the California Insurance Code, St.1935, p. 651, the insurance company was prohibited from making or permitting any discrimination between insureds of the same class.

It appeared from the evidence produced at the trial that in September of 1938, Mr. Anderson, the insured, became ill with a serious heart ailment and his physician recommended a complete and immediate vacation from the business in which he was engaged for many years and which appellant says "could well be denominated a 'one-man business,'" consisting, as it did, of establishing facilities for the housing and feeding of workmen employed on industrial projects where such facilities were not otherwise available. The insured failed to discontinue his activities, as recommended by his doctor, although he did, in the two or three years prior to his death, turn over to a Mr. Dunham some of his work. He died suddenly at the age of 47 years of coronary thrombosis. The defendant presented no witnesses and at the conclusion of the case, and over the objections of the plaintiff, filed an amendment to its answer, setting up the affirmative defenses of waiver and estoppel.

In discussing the contention that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the verdict, the appellant says, "In order to establish a claim for disability benefits under the policies in question, we are compelled to meet three separate issues: 1. Was the insured totally disabled under the terms of said policy? II. How long did such disability exist? III. Did the insured's failure to claim disability benefits during his lifetime bar the executrix of his estate from claiming such benefits?" In our opinion, it is unnecessary to answer the first and second questions thus propounded for this reason: even if it be assumed that the insured was totally disabled under the terms of the policy within the period, September 7, 1938, to the date of death, still his failure to claim disability and offer proof thereof during his lifetime acted as a bar to such claim on the part of his executrix. As will be seen by reference to the disability provisions of the policy, the benefits will be granted "Upon receipt at the Company's Home Office, before default in payment of premium, of due proof that the insured is totally disabled as above defined, and will be continuously so totally disabled for life [etc.]" This language, by reason of the present and future tenses employed, certainly refers to a condition existing during the lifetime of the person insured, and the phrase which we have italicized, "before default in payment of premium," connotes a policy in force during the lifetime of the insured, for after the death of the insured no payment is due and therefore no default in payment of premium could arise. It may be noted, also, that the policy provides that even where a default occurs in the payment of premium after the insured has become disabled, "the policy will be restored and the benefits shall be the same as if said default had not occurred, provided due proof that the Insured is and has been continuously from date of default so totally disabled and that such disability will continue for life [etc.]" (Italics added.) This provision and the language used indicate that the policies in question contemplated the payment of benefits during the lifetime of the deceased and only after due proof of disability was made to the company. In other words, in order to realize disability payments upon any of the policies, fulfillment of a condition precedent, namely, due proof in the lifetime of insured of the disability insured against, rested upon him as one of the contracting parties. The policy also provides that "before making any income payment or waiving any premium, the Company may demand due proof of the continuance of total disability."

All these matters are discussed in Kantor v. New York Life Ins. Co., 1935, 219 Iowa 1005, 258 N.W. 759, at page 760, where the court was considering a policy identical with those involved in the instant case, so far as disability provisions are concerned, and had this to say: "It will be noted that the language of the policy above quoted provides that the appellee company is to pay the disability benefits upon receipt of due proof that the insured is totally disabled and will be continuously so disabled for life. It is further provided that, before making any payments, the company may demand proof of the continuance of total disability. It is obvious that proof furnished after the insured has died does not establish that the insured is permanently disabled and will be permanently disabled for the remainder of his life. Moreover, in such a situation, the insurer could not demand proof of the continuance of such disability. These provisions of the policy cannot be reconciled with the proposition that there is an obligation on the part of the insurer to pay disability benefits to the representatives of the estate of the insured after the death of the insured and upon proof furnished by the representatives of his estate that before his death the insured had been disabled, although no proof of such disability or even notice thereof was ever given to the insurer. The proof thus furnished by the representatives of the estate would show the death of the insured. The insurer's obligation on receipt of that character of proof was to pay the sum of $5,000 to the beneficiary. That payment it made. Its obligation to pay disability payments and waive premium depended upon receipt of proof that the insured was living, that he was in being, that 'he is permanently disabled,' and 'he will continue to be permanently disabled.' Such requirements of the contract are not met by proof that the insured is dead. * * * See Yohalem v. Columbian Nat. Life Insurance Co., 136 Misc. 748, 240 N.Y.S. 666. * * *" In the latter case, the court said, 240 N.Y.S. at page 667: "I am satisfied that both the definite language of the policy and the decisions in other jurisdictions do not sustain plaintiff's contention. The language of the insurance contract 'that he is and will be' permanently disabled has reference to a condition present during the lifetime of the insured. * * * It is fundamental in such cases that the insurer, in order to protect itself from fraud, may provide for such notice as will enable it to investigate the claim of disability. Notice of disability and indorsement of the waiver of premiums were substantial provisions of the contract and became conditions precedent to recovery." See also Hinkley v. Penn Mut. Life Ins. Co., D.C., 37 F.Supp. 1018. Also, Bergholm v. Peoria L. Ins. Co., 1931, 284 U.S. 489, 52 S.Ct. 230, 231, 76 L.Ed. 416, where the following appears: "Here the obligation of the company does not rest upon the existence of the disability; but it is the receipt by the company of proof of the disability which is definitely made a condition precedent to an assumption by it of payment of the premiums becoming due after the receipt of such proof. The provision to that effect is wholly free from the ambiguity which the court thought existed in the Marshall policy [referring to Minnesota Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Marshall, 8 Cir., 29 F.2d 977, in which it was held that disability alone established the obligation of the company to waive premiums under the policy there considered and that proof was not a condition precedent but could be furnished within a reasonable time after the occurrence of the disability]. It is true that where the terms of a policy are of doubtful meaning, that construction most favorable to the insured will be adopted. (Cases) This canon of construction is both reasonable and just, since the words of the policy are chosen by the insurance company; but it furnishes no warrant for avoiding hard consequences by importing into a contract an ambiguity which otherwise would not exist, or, under the guise of construction, by forcing from plain words unusual and unnatural meanings. Contracts of insurance, like other contracts, must be construed according to the terms which the parties have used, to be taken and understood, in the absence of ambiguity, in their plain, ordinary, and popular sense." The court, in Morris v. New York Life Ins. Co., 1935, 6 Cal.App.2d 30, 43 P.2d 572, quotes this language, and in Cochens v. Prudential Ins. Co. of America, 1935, 4 Cal.App.2d 172, 175, 40 P.2d 902, 903, is found an additional quotation from the Bergholm case, as follows: "The pertinent provisions of the policy there [i. e. Minnesota Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Marshall], however, differ from those found in the policy here under consideration." Our comment in the instant case is the same.

Appellant calls attention to the fact that the language used in the disability provisions of the 1928 policies here involved differs, in some respects, from the language employed in the disability provisions of the two policies as to which a dismissal was entered in this trial and which were written in 1920. We have examined all the policies and are not persuaded that the difference in language means a difference in meaning. We are still convinced that the language employed in the 1928 policies imposed a condition precedent upon the insured to make proof of his disability during his lifetime.

Our conclusion that the jury in this case rendered the only verdict consonant with legal principles makes unnecessary consideration of the claim that the jury was erroneously instructed.

Judgment affirmed.

MOORE, Presiding Justice.

The question for decision is whether a beneficiary of a trust is vested with an indefeasible equitable title to a share of the income and corpus where the decree creating the trust directed payment to be made to a class consisting of a nephew and his surviving lawful issue, the perpetuity of the interest of each of the three in any installment of income or principal being conditioned upon the survival of himself or of his lawful issue to the time of such payment.

The trust estate of J. Ross Clark was by decree of final distribution distributed to the testamentary trustees on January 7, 1929. The chief beneficiaries of the trust were Miriam Clark and J. Ross Clark, II, widow and grandson of the testator. The trust was to continue until J. Ross Clark, II, should attain the age of 40 years, or until the death of both Miriam and the grandson, if both events should occur before the boy should attain the age of 40 years. Having authorized the payment of 75 per cent of the income of the trust to the widow and the grandson, section 1(c) of the decree of distribution provides that after making certain designated expenditures the remaining 25 per cent of the net income of the estate shall be divided into five shares, five per cent for each of testator's three living sisters and five per cent for the children of his deceased sister, Margaret Miller, and five per cent for the grand children of his deceased sister, Sarah Bonner. Margaret's five children included Walter C. Miller, who during his lifetime received the income from one per cent of the entire trust estate. The same section, anticipating the possible death of any one of the collateral kin, provided that if any of those named should be deceased at the time such income shall be payable, then the share of such deceased "shall be paid to the surviving lawful issue of such deceased. * * * If any of said sisters, nephews, niece, grandnephew or grandniece shall be deceased at the time such income would be payable to her or to him, leaving no lawful issue, then the portion of said income which would be payable to such sister, nephew, niece, grandnephew or grandniece, shall be held and paid by said trustees to the then survivors of the beneficiaries named in this section, in the proportions specified therein calculated as between such survivors, and excluding from such calculation the beneficiary dying without lawful issue."

Walter C. Miller deceased on October 31, 1935, leaving as his lawful issue one son and two daughters, to wit, Walter C. Miller, Jr., Margaret Miller Jackson, and Laura Miller Waldsmith. Each of these children became entitled to, and did, receive one third of the portion of the income from the trust that had gone to their father. On July 4, 1942, Mrs. Jackson, who had become Mrs. Dorstewitz, died without leaving issue of her body. However, both her brother Walter and her sister Laura survived her. Also, she left as her legal heirs her husband and two adopted children, Robert and Sue Jackson, who were not in existence at the date of the Clark will. Neither were they in contemplation at that time, nor had they been adopted by Margaret at the date of the decree of final distribution.

Such was the situation that confronted the trustees when they petitioned the court below for instructions as to (1) whether the interest of Margaret was forfeited at her death which had occurred prior to the termination of the trust; (2) whether the adopted children of Margaret should receive the share of the income from, and principal of, the trust estate which would have gone to Margaret but for her death; or (3) whether it should now go to Walter C., Jr., and Laura who, by their answer, claimed that as "sole surviving lawful issue" of Walter C. Miller they are entitled to receive the entire income from the one per cent of the trust estate formerly enjoyed by their father. The Jackson children and the personal representative of Margaret as contestants alleged in their answers that upon the death of Mr. Miller the corpus and the income of the trust estate vested indefeasibly in his three children and that upon Margaret's death her interest in the corpus and income became an asset of her estate and vested in her "heirs at law," subject to administration.

Following a hearing the court made its findings that both Walter C. Miller, Jr., and Laura Miller Waldsmith, surviving issue of nephew Walter C. Miller, are now living and that both have children of their own; that Margaret Miller Dorstewitz died on July 4, 1942, leaving no issue of her body, but only her two adopted children and a husband, Robert J. Dorstewitz; that the gift of the income and principal of the trust to surviving lawful issue of Walter C. Miller was a class gift, "conditioned upon survivorship between the members of the class"; that the interest of each member of such class in the share of Walter C. Miller "was and is conditioned upon his or her survival until the time for payment of each future installment of income and of principal * * *"; that the equitable estate of each child of Walter C. Miller is not an indefeasible fee; that the estate or interest of Margaret terminated at her death, whereupon Walter C., Jr., and Laura as the surviving lawful issue of their father became entitled to receive in equal shares the entirety of each installment of income and of principal of the trust so long as they live. The judgment ordered payment accordingly.

On this appeal appellants make the same contentions as in the court below. They insist that Margaret, on the death of her father, was vested with an equitable title to a share in the corpus of the trust estate to be inalienable by her and inheritable by her heirs, and that such equitable title was a fee estate because it had all the characteristics of an estate of inheritance. Citing Title Insurance & Trust Co. v. Duffill, 191 Cal. 629, 218 P. 14, which is inapplicable.

[1-10] The judgment is abundantly fortified. It is a paramount rule of construction that if the intent of the testator can be ascertained its effect must be enforced. Sec. 101, Probate Code. From the decree of distribution and the authorities it is clear that such intent was contrary to the contention of the appellant. Another rule is that if a testamentary provision is capable of two interpretations, that is to be preferred which passes the inheritance to the legatees of the blood of the testator rather than to a stranger. Estate of Hartson, 218 Cal. 536, 540, 24 P.2d 171. Moreover, each bequest to the collateral kin was a gift to a class. Section 1(c) of the decree of distribution awards one per cent of the trust estate to a class consisting of Walter C. Miller and his "surviving lawful issue." A gift to a class is a gift of an aggregate sum to a body of persons uncertain in number to be ascertained at a future time, all to take in some definite proportions, the amount of the share of each being dependent upon the ultimate number of the class. 6 Jarman on Wills, Sec. 232; Rest. Law of Property, p. 1451. When members of a class pass on, the surviving members take to the exclusion of the devisees or heirs at law of such deceased member. 3 Page on Wills, Lifetime Edition, Sec. 1058. Thereby, the share of a deceased member increases the share of the survivors of the group. In re Wood's Estate, 321 Pa. 497, 184 A. 13. The fact that there will probably be a fluctuation in the number of the beneficiaries differentiates the class gift from a bequest to individuals. Rest. Law of Property, p. 1453. In the case of a gift of income the recipients thereof must be determined at each periodic distribution by applying the formula prescribed by the testator. Rowland's Estate, 151 Pa. 25, 24 A. 1091. If he has required that deceased distributees be represented by their living issue, the interest of each member of the class is a life estate with remainder to go to his surviving lawful issue; if no issue survive, then the share of such deceased goes to the surviving distributees, per stirpes. The class is to be ascertained when the duty arises to convey and deliver, and survivorship at that time is one of the conditions of the gift. Helvering v. Hallock, 309 U.S. 106, 117, 60 S.Ct. 444, 84 L.Ed. 604, 125 A.L.R. 1368. A gift to "surviving lawful issue" is not to individuals named but to a class of designated persons the members of which are to be ascertained either at the death of the specified beneficiary or at the time of distribution. In re Leverich's Will, 125 Misc. 130, 210 N.Y.S. 605, 607. A bequest to "the legal heirs of a deceased child" is a bequest to a class. Estate of Hartson, supra [218 Cal. 536, 24 P.2d 173]. So, also, is a bequest to "the then survivors of the beneficiaries named."

In order more securely to keep the legacy where it would serve only those of the class to which the gift was made, the Clark decree of distribution declares that if a nephew shall be deceased at the time such income shall be payable to him, then his share must be paid to his surviving lawful issue; but if he be deceased "at the time such income would have been payable to him, leaving no lawful issue," then the portion of income payable to him shall be held and paid by the trustees "to the then survivors of the beneficiaries named in this section * * * in the proportions specified therein, calculated as between such survivors, and excluding from such calculation the beneficiary dying without lawful issue." The italicized language appears in two other sections of the decree, viz., 1(d), in disposing of his widow's share should she die prior to a designated date during the continuance of the trust, and 1(f) in disposing of the share of the grandson should the latter decease prior to the termination of the trust. The share of income or of the corpus set aside for Walter C. Miller could be vested in his "surviving lawful issue" only in the event such issue should be living at the date of payment of any installment of the income or at the date of the termination of the trust. The decree is equally emphatic that if any of the three children of Walter C. Miller should die leaving no issue, in that event those of his children then surviving should take his entire share to the exclusion of the lawful heirs of such deceased child.

[11] When Margaret failed to survive to the time when payment of the next installment of income was due, and left no lawful issue surviving her right to receive it perished with her. The portion of the income she had received must be paid to the surviving members of the class, viz., "the surviving lawful issue" of Walter C. Miller. Rest. Law of Property, p. 1607. When possession of a legacy is postponed to a future period it includes not only every person answering the description at the testator's death, but also all persons coming within the description before the time to which possession is postponed. Sec. 123, Probate Code. In the Winter case, 114 Cal. 186, 45 P. 1063, the widow took only a life estate in the ranch which at her death was to be sold and the proceeds divided among her testator's brothers and sisters then surviving. It was held that survivorship referred to the "period of division," the date of the widow's death. In the Hartson Estate payment of a share of the income from a trust estate was payable to a son, Ephriam, and his daughter, Ethel, during the lifetime of the children of testatrix, provided that on the death of the son his share be paid to his legal heirs, if any, and if not, then to be "divided between the remaining living children." After the son's decease, his widow, Elizabeth, received the income from his share until her own death. It was held that Elizabeth's sisters were excluded from inheriting her share because (1) she was not of the blood of the testatrix and (2)

the decree of distribution had ordered payment to the "legal heirs of her said deceased child," which could only mean Ethel. In the Estate of Easter, Cal.Sup., 148 P.2d 601, 602, by decree of distribution Catherine, the widow, received a monthly income from the trust estate, the balance to three daughters and a daughter in law, with a provision that upon the death of Catherine the trust terminate and the corpus "vest in the heirs at law" of the testator in accordance with a specified statute of succession. Upon the death of the widow, her administrator and that of the son who had died childless undertook to obtain a share. The claims of both were rejected. Only the two daughters surviving and the two grandchildren by a deceased daughter could inherit. Not more than a contingent interest had been distributed to the children, "the contingency being their survivorship of the testator's wife upon whose death the trust terminated."

Under these decisions, Mrs. Dorstewitz could not have been vested with an "indefeasible estate," for the reason that she had died before the termination of the trust. Hence her estate could not pass to her adopted children. Under the rule of those cases the legatee class at Margaret's death included only the surviving, consanguineal posterity of Walter C. Miller. 33 C.J. p. 817; 1 Bouv. Law Dict., Rawle's Third Revision, p. 1686. Section 1(c) makes survival of such issue to the date of payment of income or principal the guiding rule by which to determine the members of the legatee class.

[12] If possession of an inheritance is by the will postponed to a designated time, all reference to death or survivorship must be referred to the time of possession. Sec. 122, Probate Code. Under any reasonable view the time for determining the rights of Walter's successors is the time at which the income becomes payable, and certainly no sooner than the death of Walter's daughter who left no lawful issue.

[13] Other sections of the decree justify the interpretation we have given. Any ambiguous or doubtful part of a will may be explained by reference to another portion of the same document. Sec. 103, Probate Code. Not only is the language of section 1(c) used in 1(d) and 1(f), but section 1(g) prescribes the formula for disposing of the grandson's share of the income should he die before attaining his majority and during the continuance of the trust. It is there provided that if J. Ross Clark, II, leave no widow or child, then such income shall go to the same collateral kin before named and in the same manner and order as prescribed in section 1(c). When Margaret passed on leaving no issue such event thrust the entire share of the trust estate enjoyed by Walter C. Miller upon his then two surviving children: Walter C., Jr., and Laura. This conclusion is further borne out by section 2(b) which provides for distribution of a share of the corpus upon the grandson's attaining the age of 35 years, and 3(b) which makes provision for the distribution of the entire estate upon the termination of the trust. Both contain the same contingent bequest to Walter C. Miller, and the restrictions against the gifts' passing to strangers to the blood are identical with those in sections 1(c) and 1(g).

[14] It follows that the court below has correctly interpreted the decree of final distribution in ordering the distribution of all income and principal of the Walter C. Miller share to Walter C. Miller, Jr., and Laura or to the lawful issue of them surviving on the dates of distribution.

Having assumed that at her father's death Margaret was vested with an equitable title to one third of his share, appellants present an elaborate argument and cite innumerable authorities to support the propositions (1) that the decree of distribution makes no provision for a forfeiture by Margaret of her portion; (2) that it contains no provision for divesting an interest once acquired. Margaret having deceased without lawful issue, the right to the income from her father's share was vested in her brother and sister. She was not deprived of it by "forfeiture." Her estate merely terminated at her death.

In support of the contention that Margaret owned an indefeasible right upon the death of her father and was entitled promptly to be vested therewith, appellants cite numerous authorities. Miller v. Oliver, 54 Cal.App. 495, 202 P. 168; In re De Vries, 17 Cal.App. 184, 119 P. 109; Estate of Washburn, 11 Cal.App. 735, 106 P. 415; Estate of Lawrence, 17 Cal.2d 1, 108 P.2d 893; Williams v. Williams, 73 Cal. 99, 14 P. 394; Estate of Rider, 199 Cal. 724, 738, 251 P. 799; Litten v. Warren, 11 Cal.App.2d 635, 637, 54 P.2d 39; In re Shoemaker, 211 Cal. 457, 295 P 830; Estate of Newman, 68 Cal.App. 420, 424, 229 P. 898; Estate of Whitney, 176 Cal. 12, 167 P. 399; Rest. Law of Property, pp. 1217, 1218, 1219. Except for the fact that they contain statements of general principles, "very little aid can be procured from adjudged cases on the construction of wills." Estate of Wilson, 184 Cal. 63, 68, 193 P. 581, 583. The cited cases are merely illustrative of the rule (Sec. 140, Probate Code) that where it is the clear intention of the testator that property should pass to legatees or devisees named upon the happening of a specified occurrence, intervening events do not defeat such intention of the testator. Neither "indefeasible vesting" nor "early vesting" can be involved unless it be first determined that the testator intended some sort of vesting. We have shown by the decree of distribution that his clear intent was that Margaret should hold a life estate only, with a perpetual ownership in her surviving lawful issue, and if none, her share to go to her brother and sister subject to the same limitation with respect to their surviving lawful issue.

Had all three of the Miller children survived until the termination of the trust, each would have been vested with a fee in one third of the corpus of the trust. But when Margaret died pending the trust without surviving lawful issue, all payments of income thereafter must go to the "surviving lawful issue" of Walter C. Miller. When the testator, in order to prevent strangers to his blood from enjoying his estate, provided that if any of Mr. Miller's children should die without lawful issue surviving the share that might have gone to such issue must "be held and paid to the then surviving issue of Walter C. Miller," he exercised a prerogative of ownership which cannot under law be denied him.

It follows that since Mrs. Dorstewitz never had more than a life estate in the portion she enjoyed, nothing passed to her husband and adopted children. Her "lawful heirs" cannot be substituted for "surviving lawful issue" as a device for perpetuating in her heirs the enjoyment of the estate which had been restricted by the hand of the benefactor to those of his own blood.

Orders affirmed.

HUNTON et al. v. CALIFORNIA PORTLAND CEMENT CO. et al.
Civ. No. 3315.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.
June 14, 1944.

1. Trial $\hookrightarrow$ 296(3)

In action for damages resulting from a collision between defendant's truck and truck operated by plaintiff's son, where two instructions relative to contributory negligence of plaintiff which omitted any reference to contributory negligence of son were corrected by more specific instruction, failure to similarly correct a third instruction was not reversible error, where instruction was only a part of a general instruction and was followed by specific instructions covering the issues.

2. New trial $\hookrightarrow$ 143(1)

Where jury was recalled for purpose of correcting instruction which referred to contributory negligence of plaintiff alone and not of plaintiff's deceased son, and upon returning to jury room the vote was ten to two for plaintiff, as it had been before corrected instructions were given, affidavits of two jurors voting against plaintiff and of one juror voting for plaintiff stating that verdict was reached without regard to corrected instructions were properly stricken.

3. New trial $\hookrightarrow$ 144

Where jury reached a verdict for plaintiff on a ten to two vote which was not changed after court had corrected erroneous instruction, affidavits of the two jurors voting against plaintiff and of one other juror were insufficient to establish that verdict was reached without regard to corrected instruction.

4. Death $\hookrightarrow$ 81

Recovery for death of a minor must be limited to the financial loss occasioned by the death and includes the value of services during minority, above any living expenses furnished, and some allowance for the pecuniary loss of the comfort, society, and protection of minor.

5. Death $\hookrightarrow$ 77

In assessing amount of pecuniary loss for death of a minor, some discretion must be left to the fact-finding body, but the discretion must not be abused and the amount allowed must be reasonably supported by the evidence.

6. Damages $\hookrightarrow$ 127

A judgment can be held excessive only when it appears so as a matter of law, as being unsupported by evidence, or when it is such as to suggest passion, prejudice or corruption on part of jury.

7. Death $\hookrightarrow$ 99(3)

A verdict of $18,000, as reduced by the court from jury's verdict of $40,000, for a father 39 years old engaged in an established business, for the death of a 17 year old son, who assisted the father, was still excessive and reduced to $10,000.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Robert B. Burch, Judge.

Action by G. M. Hunton and G. M. Hunton, doing business as Valencia Truck Company, against California Portland Cement Company and another for the death of plaintiff's minor son and for damages to a truck resulting from a collision with defendant's truck and truck driven by plaintiff's minor son. The jury returned a verdict of $40,000 for the death of the son and $1,592.78 for damage to the truck, and in connection with a motion for new trial, the court reduced the $40,000 item to $18,000, which reduction was accepted by plaintiff, and defendants appeal from the judgment thereon.

Affirmed on condition.

Gray, Cary, Ames & Driscoll and John M. Cranston, all of San Diego, for appellants.

Nottbusch & Nottbusch, of San Diego, and Head, Wellington & Jacobs, of Santa Ana, for respondent.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

This is an action for damages. A heavily loaded truck, owned by the plaintiff and driven by his minor son, collided with another heavily loaded truck owned and driven by the defendants, respectively, when the latter truck was stopped on a paved highway which was being widened. The death of the plaintiff's son resulted from this collision. On a former appeal, a jury having returned a verdict for $6,500 in favor of the plaintiff, it was held that the question of negligence on the part of the defendants was one of fact for the jury. Hunton v. California Portland Cement Co., 50 Cal.App.2d 684, 123 P.2d 947. The general facts are stated in that opinion and need not be here repeated. On a retrial of the action a jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $41,592.78, being $40,000 for the death of the son and $1,592.78 on a second cause of action for damage to the truck. In connection with a motion for a new trial the court reduced the $40,000 item to $18,000, which reduction was accepted by the plaintiff, and the defendants have appealed from the judgment which followed.

It is first contended that the court gave three erroneous instructions, that while the court corrected two of these instructions before a verdict was returned it failed to correct the third, and that this left a conflict between the third instruction and the two corrected instructions. It is then argued that this judgment must be reversed on the general rule that the giving of contradictory instructions is reversible error where it cannot be told which was followed by the jury. See, Westberg v. Wilde, 14 Cal.2d 360, 94 P.2d 590; Anderson v. Mothershead, 19 Cal.App.2d 97, 64 P.2d 995; Alcamisi v. Market St. R. Co., 67 Cal.App. 710, 228 P. 410; Ferguson v. Nakahara, 43 Cal.App.2d 435, 110 P.2d 1091; Van Fleet v. Heyler, 51 Cal. App.2d 719, 125 P.2d 586.

In the trial of this case an issue was presented as to contributory negligence on the part of the deceased, and a further issue as to such negligence on the part of the respondent himself, involving the condition of the truck and the manner in which it was loaded. In the first of the three instructions referred to, so far as material here, the jury was told, in effect, that if it found contributory negligence on the part of the "plaintiff" its verdict must be for the defendants, but all reference to contributory negligence on the part of the deceased was omitted. The second of these instructions told the jury that under certain conditions "the defense of contributory negligence is good as against the father and shall not constitute a bar to recovery by him, * * *."

Before a verdict was returned the error in these two instructions was called to the attention of the court. The judge recalled the jury and ordered the jury to disregard them. In lieu thereof, he then gave two new or correcting instructions, directing the jury to consider these along with all the other instructions previously given. No contention is made that the corrected instructions thus given were erroneous.

[1] It is argued, however, that a third erroneous instruction was not corrected and that contradictory instructions thus appear. The language complained of reads as follows:

"To establish the defence of contributory negligence, the burden is upon the defendant to prove by a preponderance of evidence that the plaintiff was negligent and that such negligence contributed in some degree as a proximate cause of the injury."

It is argued that this was erroneous here because it failed to cover the further issue as to contributory negligence on the part of the deceased. The language thus used was a part of a general instruction on the burden of proof resting upon the plaintiff and the defendants, respectively. After that instruction was given the court gave more specific instructions relating to the various issues raised, including the issues as to contributory negligence, among which were the two erroneous instructions above mentioned which were corrected in the manner described. Thereafter, the court gave some half dozen specific instructions mentioning the deceased by name, in which the jury was clearly and definitely told that if it found that either the plaintiff or the deceased was guilty of any negligence, however slight, which proximately contributed to the happening of the accident its verdict must be for the defendants, notwithstanding any finding of negligence on their part.

We are unable to agree with appellant's contentions that this portion of an instruction so conflicts with the other instructions that it cannot be told which was followed by the jury, or that instead of being merely incomplete it is so erroneous and conflicting that it cannot be reconciled with the others. It was in no sense a "formula" instruction, and it did not purport to cover all matters necessary to a verdict. It was a part of a general instruction and was followed by specific instructions covering the issues in question, and the two were supplemental rather than contradictory. When the instructions are considered as a whole, as they should be under the circumstances here appearing, neither conflict nor prejudice appears. Westover v. City of Los Angeles, 20 Cal.2d 635, 128 P.2d 350; Los Angeles County F. C. Dist. v. Abbot, 24 Cal.App.2d 728, 76 P.2d 188; Barlow v. Crome, 44 Cal.App.2d 356, 112 P.2d 303.

[2,3] It is next contended that, in any event, the jury paid no attention to the court's attempted correction of the instructions. In support of this contention it is argued that the court committed prejudicial error in striking the affidavits of three jurors which were offered in support of a motion for a new trial; that these affidavits should have been admitted and considered; and that they establish the fact that the jury based its verdict entirely upon the prior erroneous instructions and refused to consider the corrected instructions later given by the court.

It appears that after the two instructions were corrected, as above indicated, the jury was sent back to the jury room and that it returned a verdict 26 minutes later. The jurors were polled and in response to an inquiry as to whether this was their verdict ten of the jurors responded "Yes" and two responded "No". Two of these affidavits, being those of the two jurors who thus responded "No" are identical and read as follows:

"That she was a juror before whom the above entitled case was tried; that prior to the Court reinstructing the jury and correcting the errors in the instructions, the jury had reached its verdict and had notified the Clerk of the Court that they had so reached a verdict; that subsequent to the reinstruction of the jury by the Court and upon their retirement to the jury room your affiant and several other jurors attempted to reopen the deliberations of the jury and reconsider the case in the light of the new instructions; that the foreman of the jury and others refused to permit the reopening of their deliberations or any discussion of the case in the light of the new and corrected instructions. That no vote was taken on any issue or phase of the case subsequent to the Court's new instructions and your affiant was afforded no opportunity to reconsider her decision or verdict."

The third affidavit, being that of a juror who responded "Yes" when the jury was polled, reads practically the same, but adds the statement "That your affiant's views of the case were changed to some degree by the Court's new instructions but your affiant was afforded no opportunity to reconsider her decision or verdict." While the appellants concede the general rule that affidavits of jurors cannot be considered to show misconduct of the jury it is argued that these affidavits were offered to show an irregularity in the proceedings of the jury, as distinguished from misconduct, and that they were admissible and should have been considered.

The verdict of the jury as rendered was ten to two in favor of the respondent. The effect of the third affidavit was plainly to impeach the verdict of that juror as she had voted in favor of the verdict when the jury was polled. She then had an opportunity to reconsider and change her decision or verdict, and the statement to the contrary in her affidavit is entirely without foundation in fact. A similar situation appears in lesser degree in connection with the other two affidavits. Apparently these two jurors neither changed their minds nor desired to do so after the new instructions were given although they had an opportunity to do so when the jury was polled. The fact that no further vote was taken after the correction of the instructions is not controlling and the affidavits are entirely insufficient to show, as claimed by the appellants, that the jury paid no attention to the corrected instructions or refused to consider the case in the light thereof. The jury was then out 26 minutes. It is not alleged in any of the affidavits that during any discussion which occurred any juror announced a change of mind, or even a doubt, as a result of the new instructions. Even the juror who made the third affidavit, in which she alleged that her views were changed "to some degree" does not allege that she informed the other jurors of this fact, and she refrains from alleging that her views were sufficiently changed to have had any effect upon her verdict. Her vote when the jury was polled would indicate the contrary. It would appear from the affidavits that ten of the jurors had agreed upon a verdict in favor of the respondent before the instructions were corrected. If a verdict had then been returned, in view of the original instructions, there would have been a doubt as to whether it might have been rendered in spite of the fact that it may have been found that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence. But this error in the instructions was corrected and the jury then returned the same verdict as previously agreed upon. The only reasonable inference from this is that a sufficient number of the jurors remained of the same opinion in the light of the new instructions. In other words, it now appears that these jurors were of the opinion that neither the deceased nor the respondent was guilty of contributory negligence. It cannot be presumed that the jurors would deliberately fail to consider and follow the instructions given by the court, and there is nothing in these affidavits which establishes, or even indicates, that this occurred. Rather than indicating a failure to consider the evidence in the light of the corrected instructions these affidavits indicate that a sufficient number of the jurors had not changed their minds in the light of the new instructions, and that they did not consider it necessary to further argue the matter or to take another vote. This is confirmed by the response made when the jury was polled.

While we think all three affidavits were properly stricken, under rules well established in this state (People v. Gidney, 10 Cal.2d 138, 73 P.2d 1186; Roselle v. Beach, 51 Cal.App.2d 579, 125 P.2d 77; Crabtree v. Western Pac. R. Co., 33 Cal. App.2d 35, 90 P.2d 835), it would not affect the result if they were to be considered, since they are insufficient to show that the jury paid no attention to the court's correction of the instructions.

The last point raised is that the amount of the judgment is excessive with respect to the allowance for the death of the respondent's son. In this regard, the verdict was for $40,000, which was reduced by the court to $18,000, which amount is here claimed to be excessive. The respondent was 39 years old at the time of the accident and the deceased was 17 years and eight months old. The respondent was engaged in the trucking business and the deceased had quit school without graduating, about two months before the accident. He was assisting his father as "a general utility man" and although he received no salary he was given irregular amounts whenever he needed money. It also appears that the deceased had assisted his father, to a certain extent and at intervals, before he quit school. The respondent states that his pecuniary loss cannot be more forcibly presented than by the remarks of the trial judge after hearing the motion for a new trial. The judge there remarked that this boy was doing work for his parents of the value of $200 a month; that they were reimbursing him, roughly, $80 to $100 a month; that his present employment was of a value to them of about $1,200 a year; and that his minority would have continued for four years, which would amount to $4,800 "assuming those conditions went on". The court then said:

"With gold now at $35.00 an ounce, in place of $17.50 or $18.00, money is worth half of what it was when most of these cases were decided. So this boy was a very unique loss. Considering those various elements, I think that the verdict for general damages should be reduced to $18,000.00."

In thus reasoning, the court jumped from $4,800 to $18,000 because of changed monetary conditions. It may be observed that this change in the value of money not only has a bearing upon the amount of the judgment but is also reflected in the $200 a month valuation placed upon the services of the deceased.

[4] It is well settled that in such a case the recovery must be limited to the financial loss occasioned by the death of the minor. This has usually been held to include the value of services during minority, above any living expense furnished, and some allowance for the pecuniary loss, if any, "of the comfort, society and protection of a deceased child." In proper cases there has also been included some allowance for contributions during the old age of the parents, where the evidence shows that such could have been reasonably expected. Possibly this latter element is becoming more questionable and less extensive in view of certain well known modern social theories.

[5,6] The cases involving the death of a minor recognize that the available means for assessing the amount of pecuniary loss are somewhat inadequate and indefinite and that some discretion must be left to the fact-finding body. But it has been universally held in this state that this discretion must not be abused and that the amount allowed must be reasonably supported by the evidence. A judgment can be held excessive only when it appears so as a matter of law, as being unsupported by the evidence, or when it is such as to suggest at first blush passion, prejudice or corruption on the part of the jury. In recent years, for well known reasons, somewhat larger judgments have been sustained than was formerly the case. In Wiezorek v. Ferris, 176 Cal. 353, 167 P. 234, 236, a judgment for $10,000 was reversed as lacking evidentiary support. The court there said:

"We are of the opinion that the award of $10,000 in this case is excessive. There was no averment or proof of special damage, nor anything to show that the pecuniary value of the child to his parents would have been any greater than that of the ordinary boy of his age. For a number of years to come he would have been a source of expense to them; his pecuniary value to his parents after that could by no permissible rule of compensation have equaled the award made by the jury. Even conceding that the child would have been of help to his parents after minority, which is only conjectural, the verdict is still excessive."

In O'Meara v. Haiden, 204 Cal. 354, 268 P. 334, 60 A.L.R. 1381, such a judgment was sustained largely on the ground of a change in conditions over those prevailing ten or fifteen years earlier. Since that decision, judgments around $10,000 have been sustained in several such cases. In at least two such cases a judgment for $12,000 has been affirmed, upon the evidence there appearing. House v. Pacific Greyhound Lines, 35 Cal.App.2d 336, 95 P.2d 465; Rocca v. Tuolumne County Elec., etc., Co., 76 Cal.App. 569, 245 P. 468. In Wheeler v. Brown, 47 Cal.App.2d 239, 117 P.2d 707, a verdict for $20,000, reduced by the court to $15,000, was held not excessive under the circumstances there appearing. While the facts in this regard are not fully stated it would seem from the opinion that some evidence was received not only as to the age and needs of the mother of the deceased, but also as to contributions made by the son and the possibility and probability of their continuance.

[7] In the instant case, there can be no question that the allowance of $40,000 made by the jury was excessive both as not supported by the evidence and as indicating passion or prejudice. A former jury appraised the same loss, including the value of the truck, at $6,500. The question before us now is whether the court, in reducing this improper verdict, reduced it to an amount which may reasonably be said to be supported by the evidence. There is no definite evidence of pecuniary damage other than with respect to the value of deceased's services during the remainder of his minority, a little over three years. There is no evidence of other pecuniary loss any greater than would be the case with the ordinary boy of that age. An allowance of $3,000 or $4,000 for the services of the deceased during the remainder of his minority would have been liberal. The allowance for the value of his comfort, society and protection must bear a reasonable relation to such pecuniary loss as is shown by the evidence, and could not be very large. Zeller v. Reid, 38 Cal.App. 2d 622, 101 P.2d 730. The respondent was 39 years old and engaged in a long established business, and any contributions from the deceased for support in his old age were not only remote and problematical but an allowance therefor in excess of $3,000 or $4,000 would hardly be supported by any evidence. Taking all of these things into consideration we are of the opinion that the amount to which the verdict was reduced by the court is still excessive, and that the largest amount which could be held to find any support in the evidence is $10,000.

It is therefore ordered that: (1) With respect to the second cause of action the judgment is affirmed. (2) If within thirty days after the filing of this opinion the respondent files with the clerk of this court a written agreement to the reduction of the amount of the damage awarded him on the first cause of action, involving the death of his son, to the sum of $10,000 the judgment therefor will be reduced to that amount and will be affirmed. (3) If no such written agreement be filed within said thirty days that part of the judgment will be reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial on the question of damages alone, with instructions to the trial court to enter judgment for the plaintiff for the amount found on a retrial of that issue.

One occupying a place in a de facto capacity is not, in absence of a statutory provision to the contrary, entitled to a writ of mandate to collect salary provided for the office or position.

4. Mandamus $\Rightarrow$ 107

A de facto phonographic reporter of Superior Court was not entitled to a writ of mandate to compel payment of salary in absence of any statute authorizing issuance of a writ under such circumstances. Code Civ.Proc. § 261b, enacted by St.1943, p. 2968.

Original application for a writ of mandate by G. J. Kennelly against J. M. Lowery, Auditor of the County of Los Angeles, State of California, to compel the respondent to issue a warrant in favor of the petitioner for salary allegedly due the petitioner as an official phonographic reporter of the Superior Court.

Writ of mandate denied.

Cantillon & Glover, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

J. H. O'Connor, Co. Counsel, and S. V. O. Prichard, Asst. Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

McCOMB, Justice.

This is an original application for a writ of mandate by which petitioner seeks to compel respondent to issue a warrant in his favor in the sum of $400, less legal deductions, for salary, alleged to be due petitioner as an official phonographic reporter of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County for the month of October, 1943.

These material facts alleged in the petition are admitted by the answer:

That pursuant to a resolution and order adopted by a majority of the judges of the superior court, July 27, 1943, petitioner was appointed, effective as of October 1, 1943, a regular official phonographic reporter for said court; and that under the terms of section 261b* of the Code of Civil Procedure petitioner is entitled to receive a salary of $400 for the month of October, 1943.

It is only necessary for us to decide two questions which will be stated and answered hereunder seriatim:

First: Was petitioner a de jure official phonographic reporter for the superior court during the month of October, 1943?

[1] This question must be answered in the negative. The law is established in California that a statute has no force whatever until the date it takes effect; that until the time arrives when it is to become effective the statute is inoperative for any purpose and all acts purporting to have been done under it prior to its effective date are void. (People v. Righthouse, 10 Cal.2d 86, 88, 72 P.2d 867; County of Fresno v. Brix Estate Co., 194 Cal. 85, 92, 226 P. 77; Harrison v. Colgan, 148 Cal. 69, 76, 82 P. 674; Miller v. Kister, 68 Cal. 142, 145, 8 P. 813; People v. Johnston, 6 Cal. 673, 674; Bayside Fish Flour Co. v. Zellerbach, 109 Cal.App. 707, 710, 293 P. 834; Gilmore v. Pearson, 71 Cal.App. 284, 287, 235 P. 665 et seq.)

[2] Applying the foregoing rules to the facts admitted by the pleadings in the present case, since the statute (section 261b of the Code of Civil Procedure) under which petitioner claims to be an official phonographic reporter of the Superior

* Section 261b of the Code of Civil Procedure became effective August 4, 1943. (Statutes and Amendments to the Codes of 1943, Chapter 1031, page 2968.)

Court of Los Angeles County did not become effective until August 4, 1943, his purported appointment as an official reporter by a majority of the judges of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County on July 27, 1943, was a nullity and of no effect.

Petitioner was not a de jure phonographic reporter of the court; he at best was a de facto reporter.

Second: May a de facto phonographic reporter compel the payment of salary by obtaining a writ of mandate?

[3] This question must likewise be answered in the negative. The law is settled in this state that one who occupies a place merely in a de facto capacity is not, in the absence of a statutory provision to the contrary, entitled to a writ of mandate to collect the salary provided for the office or position. Lopez v. Payne, 51 Cal.App. 447, 449, 196 P. 919; Legerton v. Chambers, 32 Cal.App. 601, 604, 163 P. 678.

[4] As petitioner was merely a de facto phonographic reporter of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, and there is no statute authorizing the issuance of a writ of mandate to assist him in collecting salary which he alleges is due him, he is not entitled to a writ of mandate.

In view of our conclusions it is unnecessary to discuss other questions urged by counsel.

For the foregoing reasons the alternative writ heretofore issued is discharged and a writ of mandate is denied.

MOORE, Presiding Justice (concurring).

I concur. However, I think that the nature and importance of the case require a treatment of its merits rather than its disposition on account of the oversight of a technicality in the appointment of petitioner. Because the statute whereunder the position was created is new and because a similar situation may recur at any time, it is imperative that the status of the official phonographic court reporter under the new statute, Secs. 261b, Code Civil Proc., Chap. 1031, Statutes 1943, be established by a decision upon the contentions presented by this case.

Prior to October, 1943, petitioner had been duly appointed by the judges of the Superior Court as one of its phonographic reporters who serve its fifty departments and he had been assigned to a particular judge "to work in the department to which that judge is assigned, so long as that department is in session." Rule 5, Rules of Superior Court, Los Angeles County. On a regular court day of that month, when his department was not in session, petitioner was not employed, and so reported to the presiding judge. On the same day a department of the same court sitting in Long Beach was engaged in the conduct of a judicial proceeding and the services of a reporter were required, whereupon the presiding judge pursuant to the same rule made an order directing petitioner to serve the Long Beach department. Petitioner refused the assignment, ignored the order and defied the court. Here we have rebellion—rebellion in a quarter where it should be least expected—resistance by an officer of a court against the very court that employed him. Whether he was serving de jure or de facto, he was a veteran court reporter, was familiar with the technique of court procedure and knew the paramountcy of obedience to judicial orders. He was familiar with Rule 5 whereby the presiding judge is free to assign a reporter to another department where his services are required, when "the particular judge" to which he has been assigned is holding no session. Frustration of the court's orderly procedure must not be tolerated. No relationship however intimate, no personality, however winsome, may with impunity mock the authority of a court in its effort to maintain the mechanics for the administration of justice.

Rule 5 was adopted by the entire court and was designed for the guidance and the governance of the presiding judge in the administration of the court's business. It cannot by him be lightly set aside to accommodate the whim of one, or the pleasure of all, of the reporters of the court. In making assignments of reporters the presiding judge exercises the power of the whole court. White v. Superior Court, 110 Cal. 60, 42 P. 480; Brown v. Campbell, 110 Cal. 644, 648, 43 P. 12; Haines v. Commercial Mortgage Co., 206 Cal. 10, 12, 273 P. 35. While it is true, as petitioner contends, that he was appointed by a majority of the judges, it is equally true that all the judges had adopted the rule conferring upon their presiding judge authority to act for the court in assigning unemployed reporters to busy departments. Hence the order assigning petitioner was valid.

Notwithstanding that every court has power to control the conduct of its ministerial officers and to compel obedience to its orders, Sec. 128, Code Civil Proc., and although petitioner had scorned the authority which had placed him in a position of honor and responsibility, he invokes the power of this court to reinforce him in his contumacious behavior. We dare not do so. There is no equity in his bill. While he stands in contempt of a valid order of the Superior Court he is in no position to demand from us relief from such order. El Camino Land Corporation v. Board of Sup'rs, 43 Cal.App.2d 351, 354, 110 P.2d 1076; Bashore v. Superior Court, 152 Cal. 1, 4, 91 P. 801. Where it appears that with reference to the very question at issue the conduct of a petitioner has been such as to render it inequitable to grant him relief by mandamus, the court may properly deny the writ. Bashore v. Superior Court, supra. Even though petitioner had clearly shown a legal right for which mandamus would be an appropriate remedy the court is not obliged to allow it. El Camino, etc., v. Board of Sup'rs, supra. Petitioner has taken no steps to exculpate himself; has done no penance for his contempt. Having himself done no equity he seeks it in vain. El Camino, etc., v. Board of Sup'rs, supra. To grant his petition would "result in grievous public wrong" (18 R.C.L. p. 138); would impair the prestige of the courts; would exalt the behavior of him who would enjoy the distinction and profit of a reporter's position but condemn the court at his pleasure or caprice.

Petitioner bases his claim upon the assumption that he holds a public office. That assumption has no legal basis. To him no part of the sovereign power is delegated. The performance of his duties is no part of the governmental function. His tenure is transient and incidental. Sharpe v. City of Los Angeles, 136 Cal.App. 732, 737, 29 P.2d 797; Barry v. County of Glenn, 42 Cal.App.2d 76, 108 P.2d 81. The reporter is an "adjunct of the court"; a part of its machinery; a ministerial officer. Stevens v. Truman, 127 Cal. 155, 161, 59 P. 397. He is not enumerated as a county officer. Pol. Code, § 4103 [now § 4013]. The reference in the code to the reporter as occupying an "office" is to be attributed to the poverty of our language and not to an intent on the part of the legislature to invest him with the rights and prerogatives of one who exercises a part of sovereignty.

In view of these sentiments I think the decision of this court upon the facts of this case should serve as a warning to these officers of courts who would disdain order duly made in the administration of the court's business as well as those made in the conduct of judicial proceedings.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edward R. Brand, Judge.

Action by N. E. Druley against J. A. Peyton to recover a sum of money alleged to be due pursuant to an agreement between plaintiff and defendant. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying defendant's motion to vacate and set aside the judgment and to enter another and different judgment, the defendant appeals.

Judgment and order affirmed.

McLaughlin & McGinley, of Los Angeles, for plaintiff and respondent.

George F. Cook and L. E. Dadmum, both of Los Angeles, for defendant and appellant.

McCOMB, Justice.

From a judgment in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $939.49, after trial before the court without a jury, in an action to recover a sum of money alleged to be due pursuant to an agreement between plaintiff and defendant, defendant appeals.

There is also an appeal from the trial court's order denying defendant's motion to vacate and set aside the judgment and to enter another and different judgment.

The essential allegations in the complaint are that:

(1) On or about April 18, 1940, plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement whereby defendant agreed to acquire, on behalf of himself and plaintiff, a one-fourth interest in a business known as the "Automotive Sales" for the sum of $3,500; each of the parties to pay one-half of the purchase price; plaintiff to pay $1,000 at the time the agreement was made and the balance of $750 when and after defendant had paid $1,000 of his share of the purchase price to the vendor of the Automotive Sales business; all profits and moneys derived from the one-fourth interest in the business to be paid to the vendor of the business until the purchase price of the one-fourth interest, to wit, $3,500, had been paid, and thereafter all moneys derived from their share in the business to be divided equally between plaintiff and defendant.

(2) Plaintiff paid to defendant the sum of $1,000.*

(3) Defendant purchased a one-fourth interest in the automotive business from Ed Hale and applied the $1,000 received from plaintiff on account of the purchase price of the interest in said business.

(4) Defendant did not advance or pay any additional amount on account of the purchase price of said interest in the automotive business.

(5) $2,500 due as earnings upon the one-fourth interest in the business was applied by the vendor in payment of the balance of the purchase price, and an additional amount exceeding the sum of $5,400, representing earnings on the one-fourth interest, was paid by Ed Hale to defendant; and

(6) Defendant has not paid to plaintiff any moneys received by him from Ed. Hale on account of the one-fourth interest in the automotive business excepting the sum of $1,000, leaving a balance due and unpaid from defendant to plaintiff in a sum exceeding $2,000.

There are three questions necessary for us to determine which will be stated and answered hereunder seriatim:

First: Was the amount in controversy sufficient to confer jurisdiction upon the superior court?

This question must be answered in the affirmative and is governed by the following pertinent rules:

(1) The Superior Court of Los Angeles County has jurisdiction in all actions to

* Defendant gave plaintiff a receipt that read as follows:

"Received of N. E. Druley the sum of One Thousand dollars. Said one thousand dollars as payment on one eight interest in Automotive Sales. Said interest in Automotive Sales to cost seventeen hundred and fifty dollars. It is agreed that J. A. Peyton will pay Ed Hale the next thousand dollars before Druley is to pay the balance of seven hundred and fifty dollars. It is agreed between Druley and Peyton that all principal and profits derived from Automotive Sales will go to Ed Hale till the entire quarter interest is paid.

"After that all moneys derived from said quarter interest in Automotive Sales will be divided equally between Peyton and Druley.

"J. A. Peyton."

recover damages for breach of the terms of a contract where the amount involved exceeds $2,000. Constitution of California, Art. VI, sec. 5; Sec. 89(a) of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] (2) If under the allegations of a complaint plaintiff is entitled to an amount equal to or in excess of the superior court's jurisdictional minimum, that court has jurisdiction of the cause even though the judgment is for an amount less than the jurisdictional amount of the superior court. (Sellery v. Ward, 21 Cal.2d 300, 305, 131 P.2d 550; Hammell v. Superior Court, 217 Cal. 5, 7, 17 P.2d 101; Warfield v. Basso, 62 Cal.App. 47, 50, 216 P. 48. See also Consolidated, etc., Co. v. Superior Court, 189 Cal. 92, 94, 207 P. 552; Frost v. Mighetto, 22 Cal.App.2d 612, 614, 71 P.2d 932.)

It appears that the account between plaintiff and defendant was as follows:

Charge defendant:

Received from plaintiff.....	$1,000
Received from Ed Hale on ac- of profits on $\frac{1}{4}$ interest in au- tomotive business	\$5,400
Amount agreed to be paid to Ed Hale by defendant	1,000
Total	$7,400

Credit plaintiff:

Amount due from plaintiff to defendant under contract.....	$ 750
Amount paid to Ed Hale.....	1,000
Amount paid to plaintiff.....	1,000
Total	$2,750

Balance of profit	$4,650
Half of profit to which plaintiff was entitled according to his agreement with defendant	$2,325.

[2] Therefore, since the allegations of the complaint showed that plaintiff was entitled to $2,325, the complaint stated a cause of action within the jurisdictional amount of the superior court even though the trial court gave a judgment for less than the amount plaintiff sought to recover.

[3,4] Second: Was there substantial evidence to sustain the trial court's findings of fact?

This question must be answered in the affirmative. The evidence being viewed according to the rules set forth in Kling v. Crown Finance Corp., 63 Cal.App.2d 33, 146 P.2d 54, 56, supports the trial court's findings of fact. For example, Mr. Ed Hale testified that he gave defendant a check for $1,835.62, which plus certain credits defendant was allowed made a total of $6,003.37, representing the profits which defendant received from the Automotive Sales business. One-half of this total is $1,503.19. Plaintiff admitted receiving $1,000 on account of the profits which left a balance due him of $503.19. In addition to this later sum plaintiff was entitled to $875. This sum equals the amount plaintiff's share in the profits would have been increased had defendant abided by the terms of his agreement and paid $1,750 to Mr. Ed Hale on account of the purchase price of the interest which he purchased in the Automotive Sales business. The amount due plaintiff thus appears to be $1,378.19, and since the judgment was only for $939.-49, the error being favorable to defendant may not be urged by him as grounds for a reversal.

[5] Third: Did the trial court err in ruling upon the admissibility of evidence during the cross-examination of plaintiff's witness, Mr. Ed Hale?

This question must be answered in the negative. The questions, objections, and rulings under consideration are as follows:

"Q. Then the total amount that Mr. Peyton received from you for the two years' supervision of the Automotive Sales was only $3006.37?

"Mr. McLaughlin: I want to make an objection to that on the ground that it calls for a conclusion of the witness, and is immaterial.

"Mr. Dadmun: I don't think it calls for a conclusion at all.

"The Court: What it was for would be a conclusion; the total amount he received would not. The total amount received by Mr. Peyton from the Automotive Sales was $3,006.37. That part will remain.

"A. Correct.

"Q. And that sum of $3006.37 which Mr. Peyton received for his two years' labor as supervisor of the Automotive Sales in Los Angeles in your behalf would have been paid him regardless of the fourth interest or not in the business, would it not?

"Mr. McLaughlin: Now, I want to object to that on the ground that it calls for a conclusion of the witness, first, that this was received for his labor, and further asking for a conclusion as to whether or not he would have paid it had he not had the fourth interest in the business.

"The Court: It is immaterial and the objection will be sustained.

"Q. If there hadn't been any discussion between you and Peyton relative to the purchase of the one-fourth interest, he still would have received the same amount, wouldn't he; isn't that right?

"Mr. McLaughlin: That is objected to as immaterial and calling for a conclusion of the witness, and as being the same question.

"The Court: The objection will be sustained."

In our opinion the questions were vulnerable to the objections stated by plaintiff and the trial court's rulings were correct.

In view of our conclusions, it is unnecessary to discuss other points urged by defendant.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment and order are and each is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Emmet H. Wilson, Judge.

Action by the People of the State of California against Marshall B. Roath, doing business as Cascade Oil & Refining Company, and others on a bond for unpaid motor vehicle fuel license taxes, penalties, and other obligations. From a judgment denying certain relief, plaintiff appeals.

Portion of judgment from which appeal was taken reversed and cause remanded with directions.

Paul Nourse and Jennings & Belcher, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WHITE, Justice.

The people of the State of California commenced this action upon bonds conditioned for the payment by defendant Roath "of all license taxes, penalties and other obligations of said principal arising out of" the State Motor Vehicle Fuel License Tax Act, Stats. 1923, p. 571, as amended. This cause was before us once before in a proceeding wherein respondents sought a dismissal of the appeal and which motion was denied. People v. Roath, 62 Cal.App. 2d 241, 144 P.2d 648. Reference is hereby made to such decision for a detailed statement of the factual background surrounding this litigation. In so far as this appeal is concerned, suffice it to say that by their complaint herein the people sought to recover upon the aforesaid bonds for accrued delinquent taxes and penalties in the amount of $25,118.76 and also, in the same action, to recover expense items totaling $2,262.60 incurred by the State Controller in seizing defendant Roath's distributing plant; preserving and advertising the same for sale as authorized by section 4 of the above mentioned act, but which sale was not consummated for reasons set forth in People v. Roath, supra.

Paragraph VI of plaintiff's complaint, which had to do with the attempted collection of the expense items last referred to, was stricken and the cause proceeded to trial upon the sole issue of the delinquent taxes and penalties, resulting in a judgment in favor of plaintiff for the full amount thereof. This judgment was satisfied of record.

This appeal is prosecuted by plaintiff from the aforesaid judgment, and "specifically from that portion of said judgment which, by limiting plaintiff's recovery to the sum of $25,118.76, denied plaintiff's recovery of the additional sum of $2,262.60 prayed for in its complaint".

Paragraph VI of plaintiff's complaint, with which we are solely concerned, reads as follows:

"That said taxes and penalties not being paid, the Controller of the State of California, as required by and pursuant to the provisions of said Act, endeavored to collect the same by seizure and sale of assets of said defendant Marshall B. Roath, but that said efforts were unavailing and said Controller was thereafter ordered and required by the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of California, Central Division, in the Matter of Marshall Roath, Bankrupt, No. 35,760-C, to turn over to Hubert F. Laugharn, as trustee in bankruptcy of said estate, all property both real and personal theretofore seized or levied upon by him and it was further ordered by said Court that all of such assets be administered in the above entitled estate under and in accordance with the terms of the National Bankruptcy Act [11 U.S.C.A. § 1 et seq.].

"That said Controller in seizing said assets, as aforesaid and in advertising the same for sale as authorized by said Act incurred costs and expenses in the amount of $2,262.60, no part of which has been repaid to plaintiff. That pursuant to the provisions of said Act there is now due and owing from defendant Marshall B. Roath to plaintiff, in addition to all other amounts herein mentioned, the said sum of $2,262.60."

The pertinent language of the aforesaid section 4 of the Act, as amended by St. 1941, p. 2684, reads:

"The Controller shall seize any property, real or personal, used by such distributor in the operation of his business, and thereafter sell at public auction such property so seized, or a sufficient portion thereof, to pay the tax due hereunder, together with any penalty or penalties imposed hereby for such delinquency, and any and all costs that may have been incurred on account of such seizure and sale. * * *" (Emphasis supplied.)

Said section also contains the following provisions:

"The Controller must also immediately transmit notice of such delinquency to the Attorney General who shall at once proceed to collect all sums due to the State from any such distributor hereunder by bringing suit against the necessary parties to effect forfeiture of the bond or bonds of the distributor or of the money or securities deposited by the distributor with the State Treasurer in accordance with the terms of Section 2 of this act, reducing any deficiency to judgment against the distributor.

"It is expressly provided that the foregoing remedies of the State shall be cumulative and that no action taken by the Controller or the Attorney General shall be or be construed to be an election on the part of the State or any of its officers to pursue any remedy hereunder to the exclusion of any other remedy for which provision is made in this act. In any suit brought to enforce the rights of the State hereunder the assessment roll prepared by the State Board of Equalization pursuant to Section 6 of this act, or a copy of so much thereof as is applicable in such suit, duly certified by the Controller showing unpaid license taxes assessed against any distributor, shall be prima facie evidence of the assessment of the license tax, the delinquency thereof, the amount of the license tax, penalties and costs due and unpaid to the State, that the distributor is indebted to the people of the State of California in the amount of such license tax and penalties therein appearing unpaid and that all the forms of law in relation to the assessment and levy of such license tax have been fully complied with by all persons required to perform administrative duties under this act." (Emphasis supplied.)

[1] It must be conceded as a matter of law that respondents, as sureties on defendant Roath's bond, cannot be held liable for any amount for which their principal Roath is not legally liable. Therefore, the sole question presented for determination upon this appeal may be thus stated: Was Roath, the principal on the bonds sued upon, liable, other than from the proceeds of a sale of his distributing plant, for the costs of seizing, preserving and attempting to sell such property; or in other words, were such costs payable only out of proceeds realized from a sale of the seized property? The bonds here in question were executed pursuant to the provisions of section 2 of the Motor Vehicle Fuel License Tax Act, wherein it is provided that, prior to the granting of any license authorizing a person, firm, association or corporation to engage in business as a distributor, the State Board of Equalization must require the filing of a bond conditioned upon faithful performance of all the requirements of the Act and "expressly providing for the payment of all license taxes, penalties and other obligations of such person * * * arising out of this act." (Emphasis added.) Thus we find in the bonds here under consideration the following provision:

"If the above bounden principal shall well and truly comply with all the provisions of said Act and amendments thereto, and in particular pay all license taxes, penalties and other obligations of said principal arising out of said Act, then this obligation shall be null and void; otherwise to remain in full force and effect". (Emphasis added.)

We are persuaded that with reference to the liability of defendant's sureties it may fairly be stated that such liability is dependent upon whether the cost of seizure incurred by the State Controller in pursuing the remedy provided by section 4 of the Act is an "obligation" of the taxpayer "arising out of said Act". If the seizure cost is such an "obligation", then, according to the very terms of the bonds, the sureties thereon must be held liable.

In support of their claims that the costs incurred by the State Controller in seizing, preserving and selling the distributor's property may be satisfied only out of the proceeds of such sale, respondents urge that section 4 of the Act confers upon the State two cumulative remedies.

First: The right to enforce its lien upon the taxpayer's property by seizing such property and selling it at public auction. Then after such sale the State may apply the proceeds thereof to the payment of "the tax due * * * together with any penalty or penalties * * * and any and all costs that may have been incurred on account of such seizure and sale. * * *".

Second: To bring a suit against the distributor and the sureties upon his bond to collect all sums due to the State from such distributor.

In further support of their contention that in the event of a sale respondent sureties are not liable, our attention is directed by them to the fact that section 4 provides that in any such suit brought by the State, the assessment roll "prepared by the State Board of Equalization shall be prima facie evidence of three things: (1) 'of the assessment of the license tax, the delinquency thereof, the amount of license tax, penalties and costs due and unpaid to the State'; (2) 'that the distributor is indebted to the people of the State of California in the amount of such license tax and penalties therein appearing unpaid'; and (3) that all forms of law have been complied with". Respondents argue that the portion of section 4 just quoted indicates that the legislature did not intend to create any liability whatsoever upon the part of the distributor, but thereby intended only to prescribe the procedure through which the liability of the taxpayer created by other portions of the Act might be enforced. Respondents' argument in this regard is thus epitomized by them in their brief:

"Two remedies are given to the State to enforce payment of the tax and penalties. It may pursue either or both of these remedies, but each remedy is separate and apart from the other.

"If the State chooses to enforce its remedy of seizure and sale it must, in addition to seizing the property, sell it; and upon the sale may recover out of the proceeds thereof its cost of pursuing that remedy, and the portion of the statute granting this remedy is not rendered inoperative by the failure to impose upon the taxpayer personal liability for costs incurred in an abortive attempt to pursue this remedy, that is, an attempt to pursue it which does not result in a sale through which the State can be reimbursed for costs incurred by it in partially pursuing this remedy. The remedy given is seizure and sale, and not seizure without sale or sale without seizure. The purpose of this first remedy was to facilitate foreclosure of the lien for taxes and penalties granted to the State and the imposition of that lien did not, in itself, create any personal obligation on the part of the taxpayer to pay anything which he was not otherwise liable to pay. (Civil Code, Sec. 2890.)"

However, we are impressed that respondents' argument is effectively and completely answered by the 6th paragraph of section 4, Deering's General Laws 1937, Act 2964, p. 1409, which, after stating that the remedies afforded the State shall be cumulative, provides:

"That no action taken by the controller or the attorney general shall be or be construed to be an election on the part of the state or any of its officers to pursue any remedy hereunder to the exclusion of any other remedy for which provision is made in this act." (Emphasis added.)

[2] It seems to us, from a reading of paragraph 2 of section 4 of the Act, which directs the Controller to seize any property, real or personal, used by the distributor in the operation of his business, sell the same, and out of the proceeds of such sale pay the taxes and penalties due "and any and all costs that may have been incurred on account of such seizure and sale" that thereby there arose an "obligation" upon the part of the distributor to pay such costs. And certainly such "obligation" arises out of the Motor Vehicle Fuel Tax Act and is brought into existence because of tax delinquencies on the part of the distributor under the Act. To us the conclusion seems inescapable that the "obligation" to pay costs of seizure, whether such seizure proceeds to sale or not is an obligation of the taxpayer and that it arises out of the Act. Such being the case, manifestly, under the terms of the bonds herein, the defendant sureties are liable.

[3,4] We are not unmindful of the rules of statutory interpretation which prescribe that taxing statutes must be strictly construed in favor of the taxpayer, and that where the language of the statute is susceptible of two constructions, one of which would render it reasonable, fair and harmonious with its manifest purpose, and another which would be productive of absurd or unjust consequences, the reasonable construction will be adopted. To us, however, it seems clear that the intention of the legislature, as evidenced by the language of the statute, was to make the costs of the seizure and sale of a delinquent taxpayer's property an "obligation" of such taxpayer to be borne by him. To hold otherwise would mean that in the event a sale of the seized property did not for any reason take place, the costs incurred in proceeding against the delinquent taxpayer, who is himself at fault because of his own conduct in failing to discharge his duty to pay taxes, would be thrust upon the taxpaying public. That such a situation was contemplated by the legislature does not seem reasonable to us, and to give the statute such a construction would serve to defeat the tax plan provided for in the Act. On the other hand, to hold that the costs incurred by the State Controller in pursuing the remedy of seizure is an "obligation" of the distributor taxpayer "arising out of this act" would, in our judgment, make the application of the tax act practicable, fair and reasonable; and such construction should therefore be adopted.

From what we have herein said, it follows that the trial court erred in granting the motion to strike paragraph VI of appellant's complaint which contained allegations relating to the seizure of the distributor's property and the costs incurred by the State Controller in pursuing such remedy.

That portion of the judgment from which this appeal was specifically taken is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the views herein expressed.

Division 3, California.

June 8, 1944.

As Modified June 12, 1944.

1. Appeal and error §989

The appellate function, in reviewing findings of fact, is to consider not the relative weight of conflicting evidence, but only the legal sufficiency of evidence to support the findings.

2. Wills §667

Evidence sustained finding that testatrix' husband fraudulently destroyed or withheld and concealed testatrix' last will, as regards whether husband's acts constituted a contest of such will within provision revoking the share of any legatee contesting the will.

3. Wills §651

A provision in will for forfeiture of legacy if will is contested by legatee is valid, and must be effectuated according to testator's intent.

4. Wills §660

Whether there has been a contest of will within provision for forfeiture of legacy in event of contest by legatee must be determined according to particular circumstances.

5. Wills §665

A proceeding to probate a revoked will need not be carried to unsuccessful conclusion in order to constitute a "contest" within provision forfeiting bequest to any legatee contesting the will.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Contest".

6. Wills §665

A legatee's acts in bad faith in filing petition for letters of administration, for probate of revoked will, for a homestead alleging that property was community property, and fraudulently destroying or concealing testatrix' latest will constituted a "contest" within provision forfeiting bequest to any legatee contesting the will.

7. Wills §858(1)

Ineffectual legacies and devises pass into residuum unless will shows contrary intention.

8. Executors and administrators §289

Testatrix' debts and expenses of last illness and burial were required by law to be paid irrespective of provisions in will.

9. Wills §587(1)

A testamentary provision bequeathing "all the rest, residue and remainder" of testatrix' estate, after directing payment of all debts and expenses of last illness and burial, was not a "residuary clause".

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Residuary Clause".

10. Wills §865(1)

Where there was no residuary legacy or devise, testatrix died intestate as to portion of estate which her husband would have received under will if he had not contested it, unless that portion was otherwise disposed of by the will.

11. Wills §665

Under will bequeathing estate in equal shares to testatrix' husband and daughter subject to revocation if a legatee contested the will, the provision that except as "otherwise in this will specified" testatrix intentionally omitted to provide for her heirs did not prohibit the husband who contested the will from receiving any portion of estate as an heir.

12. Wills §849

Where will bequeathed entire estate in equal shares to testatrix' husband and daughter subject to revocation of "share" bequeathed if a legatee contested the will, daughter was not entitled to receive the portion which husband would have received if he had not contested the will on ground that will provided that no heir other than the two mentioned should receive any part of estate so that daughter was only remaining eligible heir since court cannot add to or change provisions of the will.

13. Wills §849

Where will bequeathed entire estate to testatrix' husband and daughter subject to revocation of "share" bequeathed if a legatee contested the will, and will contained no residuary clause but provided that except as "otherwise in this will specified" testatrix intentionally omitted to provide for her heirs, testatrix died intestate as to portion bequeathed to husband which he could not receive because of his contest.

14. Appeal and error ☞714(5)

Points and authorities appended to appellant's brief did not constitute part of record on appeal.

15. Appeal and error ☞653(1)

The appellate court could not on its own motion order that record be augmented to include points and authorities allegedly attached to appellant's notice of intention to move for new trial. Rules on Appeal, rule 12(a).

16. Appeal and error ☞175

Where ultimate question before trial court was interpretation of will which provided for forfeiture of bequest if legatee contested the will, question as to how estate should be distributed under finding that a legatee contested the will was properly before appellate court irrespective of whether matter of distributing portion of estate under laws of succession was presented to trial court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Henry M. Willis, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Eloisa S. Mathie, deceased, wherein the Farmers & Merchants National Bank of Los Angeles, a national banking association, was executor of the last will and testament of deceased. From an order for ratable distribution decreeing that Edward Mathie, deceased's husband, contested the will and therefore forfeited all right to have any portion of the estate distributed to him, but that all of the estate should be distributed to deceased's daughter Serenita Gutierrez Schwarze, Edward Mathie appeals.

Modified and as modified affirmed.

Horace E. Vedder and David A. Sondel, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Avery M. Blount, of Los Angeles, for respondent Serenita Gutierrez Schwarze.

George I. Devor, of Los Angeles, for respondent bank.

PARKER WOOD, Justice.

Under a will, dated June 15, 1939, and admitted to probate as a lost or destroyed will, decedent gave her property in equal shares to her husband and daughter, and provided therein that should "any devisee or legatee" contest said will his "share" should be revoked. This is an appeal by the husband from an order for "Ratable Distribution" decreeing that he contested said will; that he forfeited all right to have any portion of the estate distributed to him; and that all of the estate (except a certain sum retained for taxes and costs) be distributed to decedent's daughter, subject only to the probate homestead which had been set aside to the husband for his lifetime. He also appeals from a judgment of "Determination of Heirship" that the daughter was the only person entitled to take under the will, and that the whole of the estate be distributed to the daughter. The approximate value of the estate is $34,000.

Decedent and appellant were married in 1914, when appellant was 50 years of age and decedent was 56 years of age. Appellant had not been married previously, but decedent had been married. The daughter referred to herein was decedent's daughter by such previous marriage. Appellant and decedent lived together until the time of her death on May 21, 1941.

On May 26, 1941, appellant filed a petition for letters of administration on decedent's estate. At a hearing on said petition on June 19, 1941, the petition was granted. Later that same day the clerk of the court telephoned to appellant's attorney and stated that the Farmers & Merchants Bank had sent a letter to the county clerk, dated June 3, 1941, enclosing a copy of a will executed by decedent on February 18, 1927; that the will had been filed in the office of the county clerk on June 5, 1941, but it had just been sent over to the courtroom, and for that reason the hearing on the petition for letters of administration was being continued. (It appears that the order of June 19, 1941, granting said petition was vacated and not entered—the matter having been continued.) No attempt was made to probate the will of February 18, 1927.

On June 24, 1941, the appellant filed a petition for probate of a will dated August 16, 1938, and alleged that he had found the will after making a search of his home. That will gave $100 to decedent's brother; $50 a month for life to decedent's sister; $100 a month for life to decedent's daughter (the last two bequests to be paid from oil royalties, and to decrease in proportion to any decreases in said income); and the residue to appellant.

After said petitions had been filed, an attorney, who had prepared a will for decedent which had been executed at the Farmers & Merchants Bank on June 15, 1939, asked appellant's attorney whether he had a copy of said will. The bank did not have a copy of that will. Thereafter appellant allegedly made another search for a will and found a copy of the 1939 will. He delivered said copy to his attorney, who delivered it to the attorney who had prepared the will.

On July 11, 1941, the bank filed its petition for probate of the will of June 15, 1939, as a lost or destroyed will, and attached said copy of the will to the petition. On September 30, 1941, the bank filed an amended petition for probate of said will. In said amended petition it was alleged: that on the day said will was executed the appellant took the will into his possession; that said will was never revoked or cancelled, and it had been lost or destroyed; and that said will expressly revoked the will dated August 16, 1938, and named the bank as executor.

The three aforesaid petitions—for letters of administration, for probate of the will of August 16, 1938, and for probate of the lost or destroyed will of June 15, 1939—came on for hearing on October 27, 1941, at which time appellant dismissed his petition for probate of the will of August 16, 1938. The court, upon the hearing on the petition for probate of a lost or destroyed will, found: that the will of June 15, 1939, was decedent's last will and testament; that immediately after the execution of said will appellant took it into his possession; and that it "was lost or destroyed subsequent to the death of said decedent or it was destroyed fraudulently in the lifetime of the decedent without her knowledge." The court admitted the will of June 15, 1939, to probate as a lost or destroyed will, and dismissed the petition for letters of administration.

On June 2, 1942, appellant filed a petition for an order setting apart to him a probate homestead of five lots and a house thereon, where he resided, and alleged therein that the property selected for a homestead was community property of decedent and appellant. The daughter filed objections to the petition for a homestead, and the bank filed an answer to said petition. The daughter and the bank denied that the property was community property, and alleged it was separate property of decedent. On July 21, 1942, appellant stipulated, and the court found, that the property was separate property of decedent; and the court made an order setting aside two and one-half of said lots, and the house thereon, as a homestead for appellant for the period of his life.

The executor filed its first account, and petitioned for ratable distribution. The daughter filed objections to said petition, and also filed a petition to determine who was entitled to distribution of the estate. She alleged, in part, in said petition: that appellant took possession of the original will (the will dated June 15, 1939, and admitted to probate as a lost or destroyed will) on the day of its execution and without the consent of decedent; that thereafter he fraudulently destroyed it, or fraudulently withheld and concealed it; that his subsequent acts in petitioning for letters of administration, in petitioning for probate of the 1938 will, and in inducing a witness to testify in opposition to the probate of the will of June 15, 1939, "with reference to the burning of said will," were fraudulent and in bad faith; that decedent did not have any conversation with appellant about burning the will as detailed by him in his testimony (referring to testimony given at the hearing on the petition for probate of a lost will); that appellant's petition for a homestead was false in that it stated said property was community property when he knew it was separate property of decedent; that by reason of all of said acts appellant contested the will of 1939 and attempted to defeat its provisions; and that appellant had forfeited all right to any of the estate, and petitioner (daughter) was entitled to the whole thereof. Appellant in his answer to said petition denied said allegations and alleged that he had searched in good faith for a will before he filed his petition for letters of administration, and that said petition "was permitted to remain on file pending the determination of the court as to the said lost or destroyed Will." The court, upon the hearing concerning distribution, found: that the will dated June 15, 1939, was decedent's valid and existing last will; that appellant had taken possession of it immediately after its execution without the consent of decedent, and thereafter fraudulently destroyed or concealed it; and that the daughter's allegations in her said petition were true. (Said allegations, as above shown, included an allegation that appellant contested the will of 1939.) In the conclusions of law the trial court stated that appellant "contested the last Will * * * of * * * decedent." The court decreed that the whole of said estate be distributed to the daughter, subject only to the probate homestead previously set aside to appellant for the period of his life.

Appellant's contentions on appeal are: that he did not contest the will; and that even if he did contest the will, thereby revoking the "share" provided for him in said will, that he was entitled to receive, under the laws of succession as one of the two heirs of decedent, one-half of the "share" so revoked, since the will contained no provision for the disposition of ineffectual bequests or devises.

There is no contention on this appeal that the property listed in the inventory of the estate was community property. Appellant, as above stated, filed a petition for a probate homestead in which he sought to have five lots and a house thereon, where he resided, set apart to him as a homestead. He alleged that said property was community property. At the hearing on said petition it was stipulated by appellant and found by the court that said property was separate property of decedent, and that there was no community property of appellant and decedent. No appeal was taken from that order, in which the court found that the estate property was the separate property of decedent, and the order has become final. The property set apart to appellant as a homestead was the house and one-half of the five lots, and was for the period of his life. Apparently it was appellant's intention, in alleging that the property was community property, to obtain it absolutely and in fee instead of obtaining the use of it, as separate property, for a limited time.

A question arises as to whether there was sufficient evidence to support the trial court's finding that appellant fraudulently destroyed or withheld and concealed the original will dated June 15, 1939. The evidence shows that: appellant and decedent went to the bank in an automobile driven by appellant, but at that time he did not know her purpose in going there was to sign a will; decedent alighted from the automobile in front of the bank, and entered the bank; appellant then drove about one block farther, parked the automobile, and returned to the bank; he entered the office of a trust officer of the bank where decedent, the trust officer and two other employees of the bank (the two subscribing witnesses) were assembled.

The three bank employees testified that as appellant entered the room he asked what was going on; that the trust officer told him that Mrs. Mathie had just executed a will; that appellant walked over to the desk, took the will, and that was the last they saw of it. Two of the said employees testified that appellant put the will in his pocket; that he appeared excited or angry, and that he stated he did not want decedent doing anything he didn't know about. The third bank employee testified that when the trust officer "informed Mr. Mathie that Mrs. Mathie had just executed her will," the appellant said, "I will take that out, she doesn't know what she is doing."

There were many inconsistencies in the testimony of appellant as to his demeanor and as to other happenings when, and after, he learned that his wife had made the 1939 will. Appellant testified that when he entered the trust officer's office he (appellant) said, "Boys, you are rushing things here. What are you doing?" and that the trust officer said, "Your wife just signed a will here, gives you and the daughter 50-50"; that he (appellant) said he "didn't like the idea," and, as far as he could remember, he said the will "didn't suit" him, that it "left out her sister and her brother"; that he "opened the will and then read the part of the 50-50"; that his wife "sat there just like she was stunned" and "didn't have nothing to say at all that day"; that, if he did put the will in his pocket, he later took it out and gave it to decedent and she put it in her purse; that he did not see the will again "until the next morning" when he saw decedent go out in the yard with the will in one hand and matches in the other, whereupon he said, "What are you doing there, Pet?" and she replied, "I am burning the will,"—"I don't like it"; and that she burned it "and when she got through stamped on it." He also testified that he never saw the will again after decedent put it in her purse; that they did not discuss it on the way home from the bank; that after they reached home he "looked it over, but she simply put it away." Some of the testimony was as follows:

"Q. When you got home, on that occasion, did you see that will in your home? A. I must have seen it because I knew what was in it. * * *

"The Court: At home, you said, 'Yes, I looked it over.' Now, did you? A. Yes. I seen the section in there about anybody contesting that will. It did nothing. It left it out, you see. * * *

"By the Court: Then you did read it after you got home? A. Yes".

"Q. [by counsel for daughter] Well, now, when after you got home did you talk—did you read that will? A. Well, after we got home.

"Q. That night or the next day or when? * * * A. I had time all day to do it, and the night.

"Q. You did what? A. I read it at home at certain times.

"Q. Well, what time did you read it at home? A. What time? I don't remember that. * * *

"The Court: He wants to know what those certain times are. A. Oh, I don't remember that. * * *

"Q. [by counsel for daughter] You don't remember? A. No.

"Q. Well, do you remember in what room you were when you read it? A. Yes. * * * In the kitchen. * * *

"Q. But you don't remember whether it was at night or next day or when it was that you read it? A. I certainly read it. I didn't wait until the next day. I read it that day."

Appellant testified that he "wanted to see if there was anything after the 50-50, who was going to get the property," and as soon as they got home, about noon, he asked her for the will and "She got it. She always hid everything." He also testified that he did not like the will because it left out "the sister and brother." When asked if he told her what he did not like about the will, he answered, "The poor woman at that time was in a bad mental condition and I didn't argue with her much, either way. I was thinking of the old will." Further testimony was:

"Q. I am asking you, and when you say you talked with her, did you object to it because the sister and brother were left out? A. I can't answer you things that are so strange for you to understand. * * *

"The Court: Did you talk it over with her? A. No, I didn't talk about it at all with her."

Appellant's petition for letters of administration stated that "due search and inquiry have been made to ascertain if said deceased left any Will and Testament, but none has been found, and according to the best knowledge, information and belief of your petitioner said deceased died intestate." He did not make inquiry, however, of the daughter or at the bank where the 1939 will was executed. His testimony indicates he had knowledge of the existence of the 1938 will at the time he filed his petition for letters of administration. He first testified that he did not know of the execution of the 1938 will until he found it in a drawer after the petition for letters of administration had been filed, that "She done that alone," and "She never told me about it." He testified also that he found the 1938 will before his wife's death, "months before, I think." He testified also that he "couldn't say," when he found it; that he did not remember when he found it; that "she must have been dead" when he found it; that he had "never" seen it before she died; and that he "only found it once" before she died. He testified also: "Well, I might find somebody that was there when I found it and told him, I might look him up. * * *

"Q. You don't know, then, whether there was any person present when you found it or not? A. I don't know that, no, but I have had nurses there time and again.

"Q. But the nurse wasn't there after your wife died? A. No, she died in the hospital."

He testified also: that when his wife executed the 1939 will at the bank, he (appellant) knew about the 1938 will; that his recollection was entirely clear on the 1938 will, and that he did not see it until after his wife's death; that he didn't know she had made a previous will in which her brother and sister had been provided for, "she seemed to keep that as a secret." A witness, who was a real estate broker, called by appellant, testified that he had known decedent about 40 years and appellant about 35 years; that he had drawn many documents for decedent, including a will in 1936 and one in 1938, both of which he witnessed; that he thought appellant was the one who telephoned him to come to the Mathie home to make the 1936 will, but there "was nobody present" when the will was drawn except decedent and the witnesses; that he was "satisfied" that appellant was not present when he drew the 1938 will; that decedent called him later to come to her home to draw some other documents for her and the witness asked her if it was another will, and she answered "No," that she had "burned the will." (It does not appear which will was so referred to.) The other witness to the 1936 and 1938 wills testified that on one of the occasions, when she witnessed decedent's will, she went to the Mathie home to be such a witness, and appellant was present; that on the other occasion decedent and the other witness (the broker) brought the will to the home of the witness, but she could not remember whether it was the 1936 or the 1938 will which they brought to her home.

[1,2] The trial court had the benefit of personal observation of the witnesses. The appellate function, in reviewing findings of fact, is to consider not the relative weight of conflicting evidence, but only the legal sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings. Dell v. Hjorth, 1942, 51 Cal. App.2d 576, 578, 125 P.2d 505. The trial court found, by necessary implication from the findings of fact that were made, that the testimony of appellant that decedent burned the 1939 will was untrue. The evidence was sufficient to support the trial court's findings that appellant took possession of the original 1939 will on the day of its execution, without the consent of decedent, and thereafter fraudulently destroyed or concealed it; that he was acting in bad faith when he filed his petitions for letters of administration, for probate of the 1938 will, and for a homestead—alleging that the property was community property. It is to be noted that the judge, who presided at the hearing of the petition for probate of the 1939 will as a lost or destroyed will, made findings which were similar to the findings of the trial court herein with respect to the loss or destruction of the 1939 will.

[3-6] It is next to be determined whether appellant's acts constituted a contest of the 1939 will. Appellant contends that he did not contest the will. The provision of that will with reference to a "contest" is: "If any devisee or legatee here- under contest this Will, or any part or provision hereof, any share given to such devisee or legatee is hereby revoked and shall become void." (Italics added.) Such a provision in a will is valid, and is to be given effect according to the intent of the testator. Lobb v. Brown, 1929, 208 Cal. 476, 484, 485, 281 P. 1010. Whether there has been a contest within the meaning of the language used in a will is to be determined according to the circumstances in each particular case. In the Estate of Hite, 1909, 155 Cal. 436, at page 441, 101 P. 443, at page 445, 21 L.R.A.,N.S., 953, 17 Ann. Cas. 993, it was said that the word "contest," as used in a will therein, was not to be "construed according to its popular and primary meanings—to oppose, dispute, contend, or controvert," but was to be given legal significance, and (page 442 of 155 Cal., at page 445 of 101 P.) "there are various legal significations in which the word may be employed." It was further stated in that case, at page 442 of 155 Cal., at page 445 of 101 P.: "The basic question for determination is the meaning of the word as employed by the testator, and that determination is to be arrived at from a consideration of his purpose, and the end which he sought to attain. * * * [and at page 443 of 155 Cal., at page 445 of 101 P.] What, then, was the real purpose which the testator sought to effectuate by the simple and understandable word which he employed? For, having found that meaning, the law will give it due effect. That purpose, it seems to us, is plainly to be discerned. It was, as said by the supreme Court of the United States in the Smithsonian Institution case, supra [Smithsonian Institution v. Meech, 169 U.S. 398, 18 S.Ct. 396, 42 L.Ed. 793], to prevent the invocation of any of the technical rules of law to be employed to thwart his expressed wishes. It was to prevent all attacks upon his character, reputation, or sanity by dragging into publicity his private life; and it was equally to secure to the beneficiaries whom he named the fruits of his bounty. When it appears that the effect of the legal action which a contestant has taken has been to thwart the testator in any of these most obvious purposes, can the party, who has deliberately and designedly taken such action, be heard to say that he has not contested? We think not." In the present case the will provided that all of decedent's estate was to be distributed to appellant and her daughter "in equal shares," and further that she had "intentionally" omitted to provide for her heirs except as provided for in the will. The testatrix desired that her entire estate be divided equally between her daughter and the appellant only. The effect of the 1938 will, had it been admitted to probate, would have been to defeat those intentions of the testatrix and would have placed appellant in a more favorable position with respect to the estate. If the probate homestead had been awarded to appellant absolutely, on the basis that the property was community property, the intention of testatrix that her estate should be divided equally between her daughter and appellant would have been defeated. It is to be noted that if appellant's petition for letters of administration had been granted and the estate distributed under the rules of succession, that appellant and the daughter, being the only heirs, would have received the same proportions of the estate as provided for them in the 1939 will. In either event each would have received one-half. Appellant asserts that he filed his petition for probate of the 1938 will before the bank filed its petition for probate of the 1939 will, and that "when it had become apparent that such will had been revoked by the later will of June 15, 1939," appellant voluntarily dismissed his petition for probate of the 1938 will, and therefore such petition did not amount to a contest. It was not necessary that the proceeding be carried to an unsuccessful conclusion in order to constitute a contest. In the Estate of Bergland, 1919, 180 Cal. 629, 182 P. 277, 5 A.L.R. 1363, a will contained a clause revoking the legacy of any legatee who should contest the will. A daughter of the testator, who was a legatee in that will, petitioned for the probate of an alleged later will, but she did not know it was a spurious will. She dismissed her petition when it came on for hearing. The court held (page 636 of 180 Cal., page 280 of 182 P., 5 A.L.R. 1363) that "an attempt in good faith to probate a later purported will, spurious in fact, but believed to be genuine by the party seeking its probate, does not fall within the forfeiture clause [regarding a contest]," and that the daughter had not contested the will. Further, in response to a contention that in order to amount to a contest "the proceedings must have been carried to the point of a hearing and trial," the court said at page 635 of 180 Cal., at page 280 of 182 P., 5 A.L.R. 1363: "The attempt was there, manifested by overt acts designed, and taken for the purpose of bringing about a different disposition of the estate, assuming that the instrument was known to the daughter not to be genuine. The fact that she desisted from her attempt before actually going to trial is immaterial. The attempt was made, and that is enough." Although appellant dismissed his petition for probate of the 1938 will, the evidence was sufficient to support the finding of the trial court that appellant had acted in bad faith in filing that petition and in other respects as above stated. The combination of the acts of appellant in filing petitions for letters of administration, for probate of the 1938 will, for a homestead on five lots alleging the property was community property, which acts were committed in bad faith as found by the trial court upon sufficient evidence, and the act of appellant in fraudulently destroying or concealing the 1939 will as found by the trial court upon sufficient evidence, constituted a contest of the 1939 will within the meaning of the word "contest" as used therein. In addition to this appellant testified that he had seen his wife burn the will. Had he succeeded in convincing the court that it had been so destroyed he would have accomplished a direct and effective contest of the will within the meaning of the contest clause.

Appellant contends further, as above stated, that even if he did contest the will, thereby revoking the "share" provided for him in the will, he was entitled to receive, under the laws of succession as one of the two heirs of decedent, one-half of the "share" so revoked, since the will contained no provision for the disposition of ineffectual bequests or devises.

The 1939 will provided in part:

"I, Eloisa S. Mathie * * * do make, publish and declare this my last Will and Testament and hereby revoke all former Wills and Codicils:

"First: I direct my Executor to pay my just debts and expenses of last illness and burial.

"Second: "I give, devise and bequeath all the rest, residue and remainder of my estate, real and personal, of whatsoever consisting and wheresoever situate, in equal shares, to my daughter, Serineta Gutierrez

Schwarze, and my husband, Edward Mathie.

"Third: I have, except as otherwise in this Will specified, intentionally and with full knowledge omitted to provide for my heirs living at the time of my decease.

"Fourth: If any devisee or legatee hereunder contest this Will, or any part or provision hereof, any share given to such devisee or legatee is hereby revoked and shall become void.

"Fifth: I appoint as Executor hereof The Farmers and Merchants National Bank of Los Angeles. * * *

[7-9] The "Fourth" paragraph of the will provides that any share given to a legatee or devisee who contests the will shall be revoked and become void. but it does not provide that such legatee or devisee shall not receive any part of the estate. Ineffectual legacies and devises pass into the residuum unless a contrary intention is shown by the will. Estate of Walker, 1925, 196 Cal. 323, 327, 237 P. 1070. In considering whether there is a residuary legacy or devise in the will, it is to be noted that the "Second" paragraph which refers to "all the rest, residue and remainder" is the only provision in the will which makes any disposition of the estate. That provision disposes of her entire estate. The "First" paragraph merely directs the payment of debts and expenses of last illness and burial, which were required by law to be paid irrespective of the provisions in the will. In Childs v. Gross, 1940, 41 Cal.App.2d 680, at page 684, 107 P.2d 424, at page 426, it was said: "The debts and funeral expenses are charges against the estate, and could not constitute bequests. A 'residuary clause' has been defined to be the clause in a will by which that part of the property is disposed of which remains after satisfying bequests and devises. 69 C.J., p. 413, sec. 1472. As there were no bequests or devises other than the trust provision which disposed of the entire estate, there was no 'residue' involved." See Estate of Moorehouse, Cal. App., 1944, 148 P.2d 385. There is no residuary legacy or devise in the present will.

[10-13] Since there is no residuary legacy or devise, the decedent died intestate as to the portion of the estate which appellant would have received under the will, unless that portion was otherwise disposed of by the will. There is no provision in the will directing what disposition shall be made of a "share" which is "revoked" and becomes "void," as a result of a contest of the will. It was argued by the daughter that paragraph "Third" of the will prohibits appellant, after a contest of the will by him, from receiving a portion of the estate as an heir. That paragraph states: "I have, except as otherwise in this Will specified, intentionally * * * omitted to provide for my heirs * * *" Appellant is one of the two heirs, and provision for him was "otherwise in this Will specified," in that, it was provided in another paragraph of the will he should receive one-half of the estate, subject to the revocation of such provision if he should contest the will. The testator, therefore, did not omit to provide for appellant, who was an heir. Even if a proper construction of said paragraph "Third" is that the testatrix did not intend that appellant should receive any part of her estate if he contested the will; nevertheless, the testatrix did not direct what disposition should be made of the portion appellant would have taken if he had not made a contest. Paragraph "Fourth" merely provides that "any share" of a beneficiary shall be revoked and "become void" in the event of a contest by such beneficiary. Said paragraph does not include the provision that is frequently in a contest clause that if a beneficiary contests the will he shall not receive any part of the estate. Even if said paragraph "Fourth" had included such a provision that the beneficiary should not receive anything if he contested the will, there was no provision therein directing what disposition should be made of the portion appellant would have received if he had not contested. It was also argued by the daughter that the other heir mentioned as a beneficiary in the will, the daughter, would be entitled to receive the portion which appellant would have received, since the will provided that no heir other than the two mentioned should receive any part of the estate, and since the appellant could not receive his portion that the daughter is the only remaining heir not prohibited by the will from receiving a part of the estate. The will provided, however, that the daughter should receive only one-half of the estate, and did not provide that she should receive the portion which appellant would have received if he had not contested the will. The court cannot add to or change the provisions of the will, and therefore cannot order that the ineffectual legacy or devise, the portion provided for appellant, be distributed to the daughter. A provision, allegedly disinheriting heirs, and similar to paragraph three of testatrix' will, was involved in the Estate of Fritze, 1927, 85 Cal.App. 500, 259 P. 992, 993, wherein testatrix made several bequests, including two to charitable institutions and one to one of her three sisters, and further provided: "It is my will and intent that not any of my relatives or heirs, other than as hereinbefore set forth, shall take or receive any share or portion of my estate. I do not leave anything to my sisters, Margaret and Catherine, of Malden, Massachusetts, as each of them has plenty of this life's possessions." There was no residuary clause, and a portion of the charitable bequests lapsed because the bequests were in excess of the amount allowed by law to be left to such institutions. The trial court awarded the entire lapsed portion to the sister who was a legatee under the will, and decreed that Margaret and Catherine were not entitled to share in the distribution of such lapsed legacy. In reversing the trial court, the District Court of Appeal stated (page 505 of 85 Cal.App., page 994 of 259 P.): "A testator must do more than merely evince an intention to disinherit before the heir's right of succession can be cut off—he must make a valid disposition of his property. Estate of Walkerly, 108 Cal. 627, 41 P. 772, 49 Am.St.Rep. 97; Campbell-Kawannanaka v. Campbell, 152 Cal. 201, 207, 92 P. 184. The rules of construction to be applied in cases of this character are well settled. The primary purpose of all such rules is to ascertain the testator's intention (section 1317, Civ.Code), not some undeclared purpose which may be supposed to have been in his mind, but the intention disclosed by the words he has used. If the plan adopted by the testatrix cannot be given effect because it violates the rules of law, the court is not authorized to substitute for the illegal provisions some other which it may suppose would have been adopted by her if she had known that the directions actually given could not be carried out; in other words, the court cannot, under the guise of construction, make a will for the testatrix in place of the one she has made. * * * As in the case of innumerable wills, the testatrix did not anticipate the invalidity of her gift to charity and did not provide for the disposition of the lapsed gift in the event of such invalidity, which she could easily have done if she so desired. What her actual intent may have been in the event of the invalidity of such gift to charity we have no means of knowing. It cannot be assumed that she would have given all of this excess to her sister Mary Malone [the legatee]. * * * she might have divided it equally among all of the legatees, or given it to other persons not mentioned in her will at all * * *. The situation is one where, as in the Estate of Hittell, 141 Cal. 432, 75 P. 53, the testatrix did not anticipate every contingency. That she so failed furnishes no excuse for the execution of a will by judicial construction." The portion provided for appellant which he could not receive by reason of the contest was not disposed of by will, and decedent died intestate as to that portion of her estate.

[14-16] Respondent contends that the matter of intestacy as to the portion provided for appellant in the will could not be raised for the first time on appeal. The reporter's transcript includes appellant's notice of intention to move for a new trial, but does not include his points and authorities which appellant asserts were attached thereto. Appellant's reply brief includes a copy of the points and authorities which appellant asserts were attached to his said notice of intention to move for a new trial. Those points and authorities show that appellant made the same contention, regarding intestacy, on the motion for a new trial that he has made on this appeal. Said points and authorities, being appended to appellant's brief, do not constitute part of the record herein. This court could, on its own motion, order that the record be augmented to include said points and authorities (Rules on Appeal, rule 12(a)). It appears that if the record were so augmented, it would then show that the question concerning the distribution of one-half of the estate under the laws of succession was not raised for the first time on appeal. The ultimate question before the trial court, after determining the question of fact as to whether there was a contest, was a question of law as to the interpretation of the will. It is not necessary to augment the record, in the respect above mentioned, for the reason that the question before this court, after the facts necessary for a proper interpretation of the will have been determined by the trial court upon sufficient evidence to support such determination, is a question of law as to the interpretation of the will. The question of law as to how the estate should be distributed, under the facts found by the trial court, is properly before this court, irrespective of whether the matter of distributing a portion of the estate under the laws of succession was presented to the trial court.

The order and judgment are modified by directing that one-half of said estate be distributed according to the laws of succession; and, except as so modified, the said order and judgment are affirmed. Appellant to recover costs on appeal.

In Bank.

Proceeding in habeas corpus to secure release of Albert M. Stewart from custody.

Writ denied.

Albert M. Stewart, in pro. per.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., and David K. Lener, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

CURTIS, Justice.

Petitioner herein is an inmate of the State Prison at Folsom, California. He is now, and has been ever since the 7th day of June, 1928, in the custody of the warden under and by virtue of a warrant issued out of the Superior Court of Sacramento. By said warrant the warden of said State Prison was commanded to cause petitioner to be put to death in the manner and by the means then provided by the laws of this state for the execution of the death sentence.

Upon application of petitioner and on March 11, 1931, Hon. James Rolph, Jr., as Governor of the State of California, commuted "the sentence of death imposed on Albert M. Stewart on condition that he be imprisoned during the term of his natural life in the State Prison at Folsom." At a later date, after petitioner had served a considerable period of time beyond seven years of his life sentence, he applied for parole under the Parole Law of 1913, St. 1913, p. 1048, and section 1168 of the Penal Code. The parole law or statute was incorporated into the Penal Code in 1941, and section 3046 of said Code provides as did the Parole Law of 1913 that "no prisoner imprisoned under a life sentence may be paroled until he has served at least seven calendar years." Section 1168 provides for the indeterminate sentence. In response to petitioner's application for parole, the Board of Prison Terms and Paroles informed him that "due to the particular wording of your commutation of sentence, which said in effect 'for your natural life,' * * * no action can be taken on a parole application in your case by the Board of Prison Terms and Paroles until such time as this provision is removed from the record."

On February 21, 1944, petitioner filed herein his petition for a writ of habeas corpus for the purpose of testing his right to a hearing before the board upon his application for parole, and to "be restored to his lawful rights." Respondents do not question the applicability of the remedy now sought by petitioner to determine his right to a hearing upon said application before the board. This court granted the writ. The respondents have filed their return thereto. The facts are not in dispute and are substantially as set out above. The only problem before us is to determine the meaning of the words "during the term of his natural life" as used by Governor Rolph in his order commuting petitioner's sentence.

Petitioner contends that there is no difference between a term of imprisonment for life and one for the natural life of the prisoner; that if a prisoner is sentenced to prison for life he must serve during his entire natural life, unless sooner pardoned or placed on parole; and that had Governor Rolph intended that petitioner should serve his life sentence without parole, it would have been a simple matter for him to have inserted in his order the words "without parole" or words of similar import. On the other hand, the Board of Prison Terms and Paroles, as its members are advised by the Attorney General, contends that some effect must be given to the word "natural" as used in Governor Rolph's order of commutation; that had the Governor intended that petitioner should serve only an ordinary life sentence, as that term is usually used in criminal judgments, he would not have taken the pains to definitely state that petitioner "should be imprisoned during the term of his natural life"; and that had the Governor intended that petitioner's term of imprisonment was to be subject to parole, he could easily have, and no doubt would have, so stated in his order.

Our attention has been directed to but a single instance in which the words "imprisonment during his natural life" have been used in our Penal Code, and that is in section 671, which reads as follows:

"Imprisonment for life: Whenever any person is declared punishable for a crime by imprisonment in the state prison for a term not less than any specified number of years, and no limit to the duration of such imprisonment is declared, the court authorized to pronounce judgment upon such conviction may, in its discretion, sentence such offender to imprisonment during his natural life, or for any number of years not less than that prescribed."

Evidently the term "natural life," as used in this section of the Code, cannot be given the meaning claimed for it by the Board of Prison Terms and Paroles, and it is just as evident that it is used in this section as synonymous with the word "life." No one, we think, would contend for a moment that a prisoner sentenced under this provision of the Code would not be entitled to the benefit of the parole law of the state.

There has been received in evidence at this hearing a certified copy of an order by Governor Rolph of date July 12, 1932, commuting a death sentence to life imprisonment, which in part reads as follows:

"I, James Rolph, Jr., Governor of the State of California, by virtue of the authority conferred upon me, do hereby commute the sentence of Raymond C. West to imprisonment for life, provided, however, this commutation is made upon the following conditions: His imprisonment shall be for the term of his natural life. During his imprisonment, he will faithfully comply with all the rules and regulations governing the penitentiary wherein he may be imprisoned. He will not hereafter be released from imprisonment and will not apply for parole to the Board of Prison Terms and Paroles or to any Board, Commission or officer authorized by law to grant parole, nor will he during his imprisonment accept parole from any such Board, Commission or Officer."

While each of the two orders of Governor Rolph provide for imprisonment for the natural life of the prisoner, we think it would be unreasonable to hold that they mean one and the same thing and that they each provide for life imprisonment without parole. On the other hand, as the West order expressly provides for imprisonment for natural life without parole and the order here in question provides simply for imprisonment for natural life, and says nothing about parole, a reasonable construction to be given to the latter order would be that the limitation as to parole was expressly omitted therefrom. The order of Governor Rolph in the West application expressly and meticulously, and we might add laboriously, imposed as a condition upon which the order was made that the prisoner will neither apply for nor accept parole. Had he any intention to impose like limitations upon the order commuting petitioner's sentence, it is only reasonable to expect that he would have used, if not the same language that is found in the West order, at least some word or words which would indicate that a similar condition was intended to be imposed upon petitioner. Finding none, we think it is apparent that it was not the intention of Governor Rolph, in commuting petitioner's sentence, to impose as a condition of his order of commutation that petitioner should not be subject to the parole law of the state.

[1, 2] It might further be observed that if the order of commutation in petitioner's case is ambiguous or uncertain, and is really capable of two constructions equally reasonable, a construction should be given it which would be favorable to the prisoner. The parole law is humanitarian in character and its purpose and object is to mitigate the rigor of the old penitentiary system. Roberts v. Duffy, 167 Cal. 629, 634, 140 P. 260.

[3] It is a fundamental rule of law that no citizen should be deprived of his liberty for the violation of a law which is uncertain and ambiguous (In re Peppers, 189 Cal. 682, 209 P. 896; People v. Pace, 73 Cal.App. 548, 238 P. 1089) and the same situation exists where one's liberty is questioned by an order or judgment which is not plain and certain in its terms. 8 Cal.Jur. 465, § 482; Ex parte Harrison, 63 Cal. 299. This is especially true where the questioned order or judgment is susceptible of two interpretations, one of which is favorable and the other is adverse to the rights and privileges of the person affected thereby.

[4] It is our opinion, and we therefore hold, that petitioner is entitled to all the benefits and privileges of the parole law of the state and that it is the duty of the Board of Prison Terms and Paroles to grant him a hearing under his application filed with said board. However, this does not entitle petitioner to be released from his present custody by the respondent warden of the State Prison at Folsom, California, and he is therefore hereby remanded to the custody of said warden.

GIBSON, C. J., and SHENK, CARTER, and TRAYNOR, JJ., concur.

SCHAUER, Justice.

I dissent. The majority opinion does not even mention the controlling question in this case. It assumes, without benefit of factual or legal basis, that, unless otherwise expressly provided in the order of commutation, the petitioner has a legal status no more restricted than that of a prisoner (twice convicted of felony) who has been sentenced to a term of imprisonment for life. Having made such assumption it declares, "The only problem before us is to determine the meaning of the words 'during the term of his natural life' as used by Governor Rolph in his order commuting petitioner's sentence." Such statement of the problem is wholly inadequate to this case.

If it were the function or prerogative of a Governor, in commuting a death sentence, to vacate the sentence which the court had imposed and to pronounce a new sentence and issue a new commitment, and if in this case those things had been done, then the discussion of law in the majority opinion might be pertinent to the matter in hand. But no such matter is before this court.

This petitioner was convicted in the superior court of murder in the first degree. Pursuant to the law enacted by the people of this state, through their chosen representatives, the petitioner was sentenced to death. The court duly issued a commitment which contains the following language: "Now, Therefore, this warrant is to command you, the said Sheriff of the County of Sacramento, State of California, to take into your custody the said Albert M. Stewart, alias Zephic Saunders, who answers his true name to be Albert M. Stewart, and to keep him safely and in close confinement, and within ten days from the time of this judgment, to-wit, June seventh, A.D. 1928, deliver him into the custody of the Warden of the State Prison at Folsom, in the State of California, and at the same time deliver this warrant to the said Warden.

"And You, the Warden of the State Prison at Folsom, State of California, are hereby ordered and commanded to execute the said judgment by receiving into your custody the said Albert M. Stewart, alias Zephic Saunders, who answers his true name to be Albert M. Stewart, and keeping him safely and in close confinement until Friday, the 17th day of August, A. D. 1928, upon which day, between the hours of Nine (9) o'clock a.m. and Six (6) o'clock p.m., you will take him, the said Albert M. Stewart, alias Zephic Saunders, who answers his true name to be Albert M. Stewart, to a place of execution within the walls of the said State Prison at Folsom, State of California, and then and there hang him by the neck until he be dead."

The above-quoted provisions of the commitment truly follow and, in effect, constitute the judgment which was pronounced. It was that judgment which Governor Rolph commuted. He did not vacate or set aside that judgment; he did not pronounce a new and different sentence. His only power in the premises was that given him by section 1 of article VII of the state Constitution; i. e., "the power to grant reprieves, pardons, and commutations of sentence, after conviction."

Petitioner still remains in prison under the sentence imposed by the superior court and the commitment issued by that court. It is only by the force of the court's judgment and the authority evidenced by the commitment that petitioner is held in custody; the only force of the commutation is that he has not been hanged. The commutation of sentence operates, in effect, as a mere stay of execution of that portion of the sentence which required petitioner be put to death. The language employed by Governor Rolph in effecting the commutation seems not ambiguous or uncertain to any degree. It is, in fact, a clear and concise statement. It was executed by the Governor on recommendation of four associate justices of this court. It reads as follows: "As the Honorable Justices who signed the letter are familiar with the facts of the case as disclosed by the record, I consider myself bound to act favorably upon their recommendation and do, therefore, commute the sentence of death imposed upon Albert M. Stewart on condition that he be imprisoned during the term of his natural life in the State Prison at Folsom."

The above-quoted commutation is characterized as much by language which is not used as by that which is used. The Governor says, "I * * * commute the sentence of death imposed upon Albert M. Stewart." He does not say, "I commute to life imprisonment the sentence of death." He says merely, "I * * * commute the sentence of death imposed upon Albert M. Stewart on condition that he be imprisoned during the term of his natural life in the State Prison at Folsom." The word "commute" in legal proceedings in criminal cases is ordinarily used with context to express the substitution for one penalty of another which is lighter. Here, it is obvious that Governor Rolph used it to denote a suspension of execution of that portion of the sentence which otherwise required—and, save for the continuing suspension, still requires—that the petitioner be put to death. But this suspension is expressly made subject to the "condition that he be imprisoned during the term of his natural life in the State Prison at Folsom." The controlling point in the case is that the provision for imprisonment "during the term of his natural life" is not a sentence which the Governor imposes; it is a condition concurrent and continuing on which the commutation of "the sentence of death imposed upon Albert M. Stewart" by the court is dependent. The moment that Albert M. Stewart ceases to be "imprisoned during the term of his natural life in the State Prison at Folsom," that moment the commutation ceases and petitioner then remains subject to the whole of the penalty specified in the judgment pronounced by the superior court, under which judgment he is detained in prison awaiting execution except as stayed and suspended by the commutation.

The reference in the majority opinion to the language used in a commutation assertedly issued by Governor Rolph to one Raymond C. West is apparently an attempt to justify the conclusion reached in the instant case by a comparison of the language used in this commutation with the language used in that one. The West case has not the slightest relevancy or materiality to the case at bar. Neither the language used in that case nor that used in any other case can alter the plain import of the simple words used in this case or add words which are not used.

Before the commutation was issued the petitioner was under sentence to pay the extreme penalty. The law required that he be held in custody until he was put to death. This was actually imprisonment for life without power of parole. The commutation is in the nature of a bounty or charity from the Governor. The majority opinion treats the matter as though it were the function of the commutation to take away or limit some rights which the petitioner would otherwise have and construes the commutation as giving him all rights which are not unequivocally negated. That is not at all its function nor is the basis of construction tenable.

The commutation starts operating on a man against whom the sentence of death has become final. It merely grants some privilege or substitutes some lesser penalty or releases the subject from some part of the penalty which has been imposed. The petitioner was being held in custody which was to endure until his death. That was life imprisonment without right of parole but it was not imprisonment for the "term of his natural life" because his natural life term was to be cut short by his execution. All that Governor Rolph's commutation purports to do is to conditionally relieve the petitioner of the cutting short of his natural life. It still leaves the petitioner in custody for life without the right of parole but, by operation of the commutation, that custody is made to perdure for "the term of his natural life" instead of until the term of his natural life is cut short by execution. The commutation as written does not purport to, and cannot legitimately be construed to, substitute a sentence of life imprisonment subject to parole in place of the sentence of death with its concomitant of imprisonment without parole until death.

The burden is not on the State to show that the commutation deprived the petitioner of the right of parole or of any other right. The burden, rather, is on the petitioner to show what rights or privileges the commutation conferred on him. Before the commutation was issued, did the petitioner have the right to be held eligible for parole? If he did not have that right then he does not possess it now unless the commutation granted it to him. And obviously the commutation did not grant it to him: the Governor declared, "I * * * commute the sentence of death * * * on condition that he be imprisoned during the term of his natural life in the State Prison at Folsom." Since the sentence which the Governor was commuting carried with it imprisonment without parole for the full term of petitioner's life until that life was to have been cut short by execution, if the only effect contemplated by the Governor was to relieve the petitioner of the cutting short of the term of his natural life by execution, it is difficult to conceive of any form of expression, not offending tautologically, which would be more apt to accomplish precisely that effect than the language which was used. Governor Rolph was relieving the petitioner from execution on an appointed day; i. e., he was permitting petitioner to live out "the term of his natural life." If that was the full extent of the bounty the Governor intended to confer it necessarily meant that the imprisonment of petitioner would perdure for the full term of his natural life instead of only for that portion of such term as would have elapsed prior to the execution. That—no more, no less—is the import of the words which were used.

I do not imply herein any view whatever as to whether the petitioner should or should not be granted a commutation which would entitle him to be considered as eligible for parole. That is not, at least at this time, a problem for this court. The Constitution of California vests the pardoning and commutation powers exclusively in the Governor subject only to the recommendation of a majority of the justices of this court in cases "where the convict has been twice convicted of felony." (Cal.Const., art. VII, § 1.) This court should be as zealous in protecting the executive and legislative branches of government against encroachments by the judicial as it is in guarding its own field against the trespass of others.

The petitioner in this case may apply to the Governor for a new and different commutation giving him the privilege he wants and the Governor, by the constitutional provision above mentioned, is vested with the power to determine such application subject to the recommendation of a majority of the justices of this court. But this court should not invade the province of the Governor by reading into the commutation issued by Governor Rolph a privilege which he did not write.

The writ should be discharged and the petitioner remanded to the custody of the warden of the State Prison at Folsom to be there held "during the term of his natural life" under the sentence of death as conditionally commuted, and not under any assumed new and different sentence of so-called life imprisonment subject to the right of parole.

On February 2, 1942, Frank Egan, on behalf of himself and Albert Tinnin, filed in this court a petition for writs of habeas corpus. Egan is confined in the State Prison at San Quentin, and Tinnin in the State Prison at Folsom. The wardens of those prisons are the respondents. Egan and Tinnin are under sentences of life imprisonment for the murder of Mrs. Jessie Scott Hughes in April 1932. Also implicated in the homicide was Verne Doran, a confessed accomplice, who turned state's evidence, and whose case was brought on for trial after the conviction of Egan and Tinnin. On the joint trial of Egan and Tinnin, Doran was examined under oath. This evidence, together with evidence of other circumstances connecting Egan and Tinnin was the commission of the crime, was, on the appeal of Tinnin, held sufficient to support the verdict. People v. Tinnin, 136 Cal.App. 301, 28 P.2d 951. The appeal of Egan was dismissed for failure to prosecute. People v. Egan, 135 Cal.App. 479, 27 P.2d 412. The opinion of the District Court of Appeal in the case of People v. Tinnin, supra, is referred to for a more extended recital of the facts leading to the trial and conviction of Egan and Tinnin, who will be referred to as the petitioners. A very brief résumé of the facts shown therein will suffice for the purposes of this proceeding.

In 1932 Frank Egan had been public defender of the city and county of San Francisco for a number of years. Acting as her attorney and business adviser, Egan managed the financial affairs of Mrs. Jessie Scott Hughes, who was a widow of 57 years at the time of her death. She had been the friend and benefactress of Egan since his youth. Egan had defended and befriended Tinnin and Doran, both of whom had criminal records, had served time for commission of felonies, and in 1932 were on parole. Egan became involved in his own and Mrs. Hughes' financial affairs. The three men connived and Tinnin and Doran executed a plan to dispose of Mrs. Hughes by attacking her in the basement of her home, running a heavy automobile over her body until she was dead, and then throwing the body into the street to make it appear that she had been the victim of a "hit and run" accident.

The petitioners were convicted and were committed on October 1, 1932. Doran pleaded guilty to manslaughter and was sentenced to San Quentin to serve the term prescribed by law. He was released on parole in November 1934.

In August 1938 Egan filed a petition for the writ of habeas corpus based in part on the alleged perjured testimony of Doran. The petition was denied by this court on September 15, 1938.

The petitioners now assert that on their trial for the murder of Jessie Scott Hughes they were denied due process of law, first, in that their convictions were obtained by the perjured testimony of Verne Doran and others, the falsity of whose testimony was known to the prosecuting officials; and, second, in that the petitioner Frank Egan was unlawfully deprived of the assistance of counsel during the prosecution's closing argument to the jury.

On February 26, 1942, this court issued writs of habeas corpus returnable on March 5th following. On the return date the attorney general filed returns to the writs. By stipulation the petition was deemed a traverse to the returns. On March 9, 1942, this court made an order appointing the Honorable Edward I. Butler, judge of the Superior Court in and for the County of Marin, as referee to hear and record the testimony of witnesses to be examined, the examination, and findings and conclusions to be made and filed, to be directed to the issues involved in the proceeding, as follows:

1. Did any witness who testified against Frank Egan or Albert Tinnin in the trial which led to their convictions on the charges for which they are now deprived of their liberty, commit perjury as defined in section 118 of the Penal Code of the State of California, that is, did such witness testify to any material matter which he knew to be false?

2. In the event that such witness or witnesses did commit perjury, as so defined, did the representatives of the State of California, the district attorney, or any of his deputies or assistants cause or suffer such testimony to be introduced knowing that such testimony as given was perjured?

3. Was the petitioner, Frank Egan, deprived of the assistance of counsel for his defense during the trial which led to his conviction on the charge for which he is now deprived of his liberty?

[1,2] The referee entered upon the discharge of his duties and held numerous hearings commencing on March 20, 1942, and concluding on May 26, 1943. On the last hearing time was allowed for the submission of briefs. During the hearings numerous witnesses were examined, including Egan, Tinnin and Doran, in person. The transcript of the oral testimony taken before the referee comprises 555 pages. By stipulation and order the deposition of Herbert Emerson Wilson was taken on oral interrogatories at London, Ontario, before the Registrar of the Supreme Court of Ontario, Dominion of Canada, during May 18, 1942, and subsequent days. Present at and participating in the taking of that deposition were David K. Lener, deputy attorney general of this state, Leslie C. Gillen, assistant district attorney of the city and county of San Francisco, and John Clare Jury, counsel then of record for the petitioners. That deposition comprises 96 thirty-line pages, and if transcribed under our rules would comprise approximately 130 pages. Reference to this record is made for the purpose of indicating the extent to which the issues involved in the proceeding have been explored by the parties before the referee, and also the task of the referee in preparing and making his report. On March 29, 1943, Egan dismissed in writing his attorney of record, John Clare Jury. On May 24, 1943, Egan, in propria persona, filed with the clerk of this court a document entitled, "Motion to Terminate This Continuing Miscarriage of Justice and Suspension of Writ of Habeas Corpus and Denial of Due Process of Law." The grounds of the motion are not stated, but it is gleaned from the recitals in the document that this petitioner was convinced that the proceeding before the referee had been unduly prolonged; that the referee entertained bias toward him, and that counsel for the State were guilty of conduct prejudicial to his interest. The prayer for relief was that this court immediately set aside the reference and resume exclusive charge of the proceeding. Tinnin did not join in this proposed motion but under date of December 8, 1943, his new counsel, Elizabeth Cassidy, filed an affidavit and request to have the briefs and other documents filed on behalf of Egan considered also on behalf of Tinnin so far as applicable. The request was granted; but the motion to terminate may not prevail for the reason that the court, upon the filing of the record and the report of the referee, assumed exclusive control of the proceeding and set the same for hearing on December 9, 1943; and for the further reason that the record does not support the charge of bias on the part of the referee or the charge of misconduct on the part of the attorneys representing the respondents.

[3] The referee filed his report on September 13, 1943. Before its content is further noted, another motion of the petitioner Egan, filed October 18, 1943, should be disposed of. The document is entitled, "Motion to Strike 'Answers and Returns to Writ of Habeas Corpus' and 'Affidavits in Opposition to said Petition.'" It was filed by Egan on his own behalf and on behalf of Tinnin. The respondents object to the consideration of the motion in so far as it applies to Tinnin on the ground that it was not signed by Tinnin, that Egan has been disbarred (December 29, 1933), and therefore has no authority to appear for him. The objections may be disregarded for two reasons, first, the document may properly be included among those documents filed by Egan and deemed to be filed also on behalf of Tinnin; and secondly, the proceeding may be maintained either by the person for whose interest it is intended or by some person in his behalf. Pen.Code, § 1474. In filing the petition in behalf of Tinnin as well as himself, Egan did not purport to represent Tinnin as his counsel but, it must be assumed, under the authority of the Penal Code section.

The motion is 39 pages long, specifies 15 grounds in its support and is accompanied by a brief of 81 additional pages. Many of the grounds need not be separately discussed. They are answered briefly by the following conclusions which they elicit.

The answer and return of the respondents was filed on March 5, 1942. It contained a statement of the commitments of Egan and Tinnin, with copies of the judgments and commitments. It also contained affidavits of numerous persons, including Verne L. Doran, Charles W. Dullea, Matthew Brady, John R. Golden, William J. Quinn, Theodore J. Roche, Gerald J. Kenney, Walter McGovern, members of the public defender's office and police department, and other individuals. Under the stipulation, the petition was a traverse to the return.

[4] The action which the petitioners may take upon the filing of the return is specified in section 1484 of the Penal Code. They may deny or controvert any of the material facts or matters set forth in the return, or except to the sufficiency thereof, or allege any facts to show either that their imprisonment or detention is unlawful, or that they are entitled to their discharge. The section further provides that the court or judge must thereupon proceed in a summary way to hear such proof as may be produced against the imprisonment or detention, or in favor of the same, and to dispose of the party as the justice of the case requires, with full power and authority to require and compel the attendance of witnesses, and to do and perform all other acts and things necessary to a full and fair hearing and determination of the case. The only step taken by the petitioners upon the filing of the return was to stipulate that their petition be considered a denial of the matters set up in the return. The petitioners did not make the present objections to the return until full hearings had been had before the referee and more than a month after the filing of the referee's report. Objection to the return made at such time is not in accordance with the requirements of the Code and comes too late.

[5-7] Assuming timeliness, however, it also appears that an objection that the general denial in the return was insufficient to meet the issues tendered by the petition may not be made. The function of the petition is to obtain the issuance of the writ. The return is not to the petition, but to the writ. Issues are thereupon joined by denial or other controversion of the material matters set forth in the return, Pen.Code, § 1484, and were so joined in this case by the petition, considered as a traverse to the return pursuant to the stipulation. Thereupon the petition being considered the answer, allegations as to any new matter therein are deemed denied. By analogy, the return is the complaint and the traverse (the petition) is the answer. New matter set up in the answer is deemed denied and must be proved by the parties alleging it, namely the petitioners. In re Collins, 151 Cal. 340, 342, 343, 90 P. 827, 91 P. 397, 129 Am.St.Rep. 122.

[8] By the motion it was sought to strike the affidavits appended to the return, either in whole or in part, for various stated reasons. It is a further sufficient answer to such a motion made at this time to note that this court did not proceed upon the affidavits filed, but appointed a referee to take testimony and report his findings. The report of the referee and the determination of the issues of fact by this court were and are based, not on the affidavits on file, but on the facts appearing from the testimony taken pursuant to the reference.

[9, 10] No merit attaches to the objection that the copies of the commitments of Egan and Tinnin included in the return were not certified by the proper official or were not certified at all. Subdivision 3 of section 1480 of the Penal Code requires that a copy of the commitment must be annexed to the return and the original produced and exhibited to the court or judge on the hearing. A copy of each commitment was also included in the petition of Egan and Tinnin. The petitioners thereby admitted authenticity, and no objection is made that evidence of the authority by which the petitioners were held was improper. Furthermore, Mark E. Noon, then secretary of the Board of Prison Terms and Paroles at San Quentin, who certified the copy of Egan's commitment, was the official custodian of the prison records of which the commitment was a part, and was therefore a proper person to certify to the correctness of a copy thereof pursuant to section 969b of the Penal Code.

[11, 12] As a further ground of the motion the petitioners appear to claim some infringement of their rights by reason of the fact that they or their counsel were not present at certain proceedings before the referee. At a session called for August 14, 1942, neither Egan nor Tinnin was present. Their presence was waived by their counsel and that waiver was accepted by the referee. All that transpired was a reading of the deposition of Herbert Emerson Wilson and the interposition of objections of counsel and the referee's rulings thereon. No good purpose could have been subserved by the presence of the petitioners on that day under the circumstances, and in the absence of prejudice to their rights, and none is shown, the agreement of their counsel to proceed without their presence, acted on by the referee, must be deemed binding upon them. See 29 C.J. p. 160, § 183, 39 C.J.S., Habeas Corpus, § 93, and cases cited. On Saturday, January 23, 1943, the petitioners were not present. However, no hearing was had on that day. The referee declined to go on with the hearing without the presence of the petitioners. The transcript shows that all that occurred was a discussion between the referee and counsel as to possible means of obtaining the reappearance for further interrogation of Verne L. Doran who had journeyed to Ogden, Utah, in the course of his employment in defense construction, and the postponement of the hearing until February 8, 1943. It was of no moment that the petitioners were not present. Their presence was not necessary for the mere purpose of a postponement. The petitioners appeared on February 8 following, but their respective counsel were absent. No hearing was had on that day. The referee merely informed the petitioners that their counsel had telephoned the message that Verne L. Doran had not yet arrived, and as the date of his arrival appeared to be uncertain, further hearing would be postponed until February 18th.

There is no substantial merit in any of the grounds of the motion to strike and the motion is therefore denied.

In his report the referee found against the contentions of the petitioners on all issues. The petitioners in person filed their objections to the report, and their counsel have filed briefs with particular reference to the issue whether Egan was deprived of the assistance of counsel during the trial. The report and findings of the referee and the objections thereto have been considered but the findings and conclusions hereinafter expressed are based on an independent examination of the evidence.

The Issues Relating to False Testimony.

The basis of the petitioner's allegations that false testimony was given on their trial is an unsigned forty-four page statement annexed to the petition as Exhibit "J," which purports to have been drafted between the latter part of 1933 and November 1934 by an inmate of San Quentin named Herbert Emerson Wilson from data claimed to have been written on sheets of paper and handed to him by Doran.

When Doran, a young man, arrived at San Quentin, he was assigned to Dormitory No. 2, designated the "old man's dormitory," and placed under "protection," that is, apart from the inmates of the prison who might molest him for having turned state's evidence. Dormitory No. 2 and its yard were separated from the other premises by an iron gate, usually kept locked, and a screen door. However, Doran could have entered the other yard, where Egan was detained. Wilson testified that he observed Egan and Doran conversing together frequently, and that the captain had given them permission to talk. Egan testified that he talked to Doran almost daily after the first meeting with him in the latter part of 1933 when he said Doran told him he had something to disclose. Subsequently, so Egan asserts, Doran informed him that he was going to make a statement to the effect that his (Doran's) testimony at the trial was perjured, and that he was forced into giving the false testimony by the prosecuting officials.

Egan admittedly took this apparently sensational news calmly, did not report it, and merely said to Doran, "It is your story—let your conscience be your guide." Wilson testified that he discussed the statement ten or more times with Egan, but that he received all the information concerning the facts from longhand or typewritten notes prepared by Doran which he, Wilson, embodied in the story with his own phraseology and composition. Egan states that he helped Doran only to the extent of identifying some of the dates and the figures involved in the proposed narrative.

At the time Wilson's deposition was taken he was past sixty-one years of age. In his youth he attended the public grammar schools in London, Ontario. He studied theology in that city, worked as an evangelist and as superintendent of a city mission which he founded. He then came to the United States where he continued his theological studies in Portland, Oregon. He also studied law for one year in Los Angeles. When he was about seventeen and living in London, Ontario, he was convicted of taking money from a grocery store, a felony, and served six months in a juvenile institution. In 1922, in Los Angeles County, he was convicted of the murder of one Cox, sentenced to life imprisonment, and committed to San Quentin where he served twelve years. In June 1935 he was paroled for deportation in consideration of having given information concerning the perpetration of mail robberies in the United States and as to which he, with others, had been informed against. In 1935 he returned to London, Ontario, where subsequently he was convicted of defrauding a finance company in a matter involving approximately $100,000, and served time in the penitentiary in Ontario.

Doran first met Wilson in the fall of 1933 when the latter was assigned to "take charge" of Dormitory No. 2. According to Wilson's own testimony, he has been a prolific writer of books, short stories, articles, poems, and essays. He testified that Doran knew of his activities in that respect, had read one or two of his book-length manuscripts, and was impressed by his style and his "ability to give expression to things in a lucid way"; that Doran, in October 1933, approached him on the subject of the preparation of a statement; that Doran said he felt a little depressed at times because of his part in the conviction of Frank Egan; that he wanted to make a statement; that he "requested me to help him to get his story in shape"; that at the request of Doran he prepared the statement, Exhibit "J," for future publication in an American periodical, Wilson and Doran to share equally in the royalties; that Doran said as soon as he was released he would take a boat, enter Canada by way of Boston, and sign the statement after he was out of the jurisdiction of the United States.

Wilson testified that Doran stated on at least a dozen different occasions, at some of which Egan was present, that both Egan and Tinnin were innocent of any connection with the crime and that he alone was responsible for the death of Mrs. Jessie Scott Hughes. The statement, Exhibit "J," does not contain the details of the crime, but it was Wilson's testimony that Doran said he would annex them to the proposed publication when he was safely domiciled in Canada.

Wilson also testified that he completed the statement and had it in shape for publication in May 1934. The statement purports to set forth a dramatic conspiracy on the part of the prosecuting officials and the judge presiding at the trial to implicate Egan and Tinnin in the commission of the crime. It contains recitals of day and night "third degree" torture and threats of personal harm and death by hanging, all designed to compel Doran to "play ball" with the police department and the district attorney's office. It states that as a consequence Doran gave false testimony at the trial of Egan and Tinnin; that the falsity of his and others' testimony was known to the prosecution; that the wrong done by him was at the demand and insistence of Mr. Golden, Mr. Dullea, Mr. Brady, and Superior Judge Frank H. Dunne who presided at the trial.

After his release on parole Doran made a trip on a boat through the Panama Canal. He communicated with Wilson while the latter was still in San Quentin. But Doran did not enter Canada, apparently did not see Wilson again, and the statement, Exhibit "J," was neither signed nor published. In December 1938 Doran submitted to an interview with one of the attorneys for Egan and Tinnin in the presence of Captain (now Chief) Dullea in which he was informed that the statute of limitations would prevent prosecution on any charge of perjury growing out of his testimony at the trial, but Doran then stated that his testimony at the trial was true. In his appearances before the referee under oath Doran denied that he had had any conversations with Wilson or Egan in regard to any such purported disclosure or any connection with the statement, and reaffirmed the truth of his testimony at the trial. There is therefore in the record of this proceeding no evidence whatsoever that the statement, Exhibit "J," was the statement of Doran, except the oral testimony of Wilson and Egan. Wilson could not produce even a scrap of paper showing any notes prepared by Doran. Although he said Doran made numerous alterations in the daily drafts composed by Wilson, the latter was unable to point to a single place in the forty-four pages where such a correction or alteration had been made. Wilson and Egan testified that Doran was given a copy of the statement and that he took it with him when he left the prison. It was the custom to have a prisoner's effects packed by others, but there is no evidence that the statement was seen by any one, except the assertion by Wilson that he saw it when he carried Doran's effects into the lieutenant's office. Egan testified that he was in the lieutenant's office and handled the effects after Wilson's part in handling them, but he was unable to say that he saw the statement.

[13] In short, there is no evidence confirming Wilson's or Egan's declaration that the unsigned statement proceeded from Doran. Doran denies any participation in its preparation, and he and others deny the truth of any of the charges of falsity or knowledge of falsity included therein. On such a record there is no basis whatsoever for a tenable conclusion that the petitioners or either of them were convicted on testimony as to any material matter which was false, or that the prosecuting officials or any other representatives of the State suffered the introduction of false testimony knowing it to be false. See Mooney v. Holohan, 294 U.S. 103, 55 S.Ct. 340, 79 L.Ed. 791, 98 A.L.R. 406; In re Mooney, 10 Cal.2d 1, 73 P.2d 554.

The Issue Relating to Deprivation of Counsel.

The joint trial of Egan and Tinnin was commenced on August 8, 1932, before the court and jury, the Honorable Frank H. Dunne presiding. Egan was represented by Vincent Hallinan and Tinnin by Nathan Coghlan. About 4 o'clock on the afternoon of September 2, 1932, Isadore M.

Golden, Assistant District Attorney in charge of the prosecution, was engaged in the last few minutes of his closing argument when the court declared Egan's attorney, Hallinan, in contempt of court for "extremely and unduly loud, boisterous, harsh, offensive and contemptuous" interruptions, for breaching the peace of the judicial proceeding, and for conduct interfering with the course of the trial. The judgment of contempt was upheld in Re Hallinan, 126 Cal.App. 121, 14 P.2d 797, wherein it is set forth in full. Prior to the adjudication of contempt and during the closing argument of the prosecution, Hallinan had entered into a stipulation with the district attorney that the defendant Egan would be entitled to reserve and have the benefit of any and all possible exceptions and objections to the argument of the prosecuting attorney which could be lawfully made during the course of the argument, and that the defendant Egan would be deemed to have objected and excepted to any and all portions of the closing argument. Hallinan was sentenced to serve twenty-four hours in the county jail, and Tinnin's attorney, Nathan Coghlan, who was then present in the courtroom, was appointed by the court also to represent Egan. Both Coghlan and Egan objected to the appointment, Egan asserting that he desired to represent himself.

Mr. Golden closed his argument at 4:20 on the same afternoon. The court inquired whether written instructions were waived. Mr. Coghlan asked for written instructions. The court recessed until 8 o'clock that night. At that hour and again at 9 the court announced that the instructions were not completed, and adjourned until 10 o'clock the following morning. At the latter hour Hallinan, who in the meantime had been released upon a writ of habeas corpus, sought to resume his duties as defense counsel, but was denied admittance to the courtroom. Defendant Egan personally made a motion that the court permit Hallinan to re-enter the proceedings. The motion was denied. The court expressly recognized Egan's desire to represent himself during the instruction of the jury. Upon the completion of the charge the jury retired for deliberations. On the morning of Tuesday, September 6th, the jury announced that it was ready to return its verdict. The court reconvened. Egan again asked that his counsel Hallinan, who was outside, be permitted to return, but permission was denied. Acting Public Defender Gerald Kenny was appointed to represent Egan in the proceeding to receive the jury's verdicts. Mr. Kenny was sent for, entered the courtroom and remained while the verdicts were read, the jury polled, and a date set for judgment, which was a date personally agreed to by Egan. Those proceedings were completed in about ten minutes. Thereafter Hallinan was permitted to and did appear and resume his representation of Egan. He made and argued a motion for a new trial on behalf of Egan. On September 14, 1932, a date agreed upon, he also appeared with Egan when judgment and sentence were pronounced. Also on behalf of Egan he gave notice of appeal.

The petitioner Egan contends that because of the enforced absence of Hallinan from the courtroom during the last twenty minutes of the closing argument of the prosecuting attorney and until his reappearance, he was deprived of counsel of his own choosing, was compelled to accept codefendant's counsel, and was thereby denied rights vouchsafed him by section 13 of article I of the state Constitution and the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution. Among other cases he relies on Glasser v. United States, 315 U.S. 60, 62 S.Ct. 457, 86 L.Ed. 680, and People v. Lanigan, 22 Cal.2d 569, 140 P.2d 24, 148 A.L.R. 176, wherein, on appeals from the judgments, it was held that the appointment, over objection, of counsel of one codefendant to serve as counsel for the other codefendant, where a conflict of interests was manifest, was a denial of a fundamental right.

The respondents rely on In re Connor, 16 Cal.2d 701, 108 P.2d 10, and Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458, 58 S.Ct. 1019, 82 L. Ed. 1461, 146 A.L.R. 357, as support for their contention that the petitioner's point may not be raised on a proceeding in habeas corpus, but was reviewable only on appeal.

[14] It may be assumed that a petitioner would be entitled to release on habeas corpus if he could show that deprivation of counsel resulted in an unfair trial or in substance in no trial at all. A deprivation leading to such a result would be a violation of his right to counsel under the Constitution of this state, and a failure of due process under the Fourteenth Amendment. But the conclusion may not properly be drawn from the record before us that the petitioner Egan has met the burden in this collateral proceeding of presenting such a case or of showing that there has been any substantial violation of his constitutional rights. It is noted that in each of the joint trials involved in the Glasser and Lanigan cases the attorney for one codefendant, who was appointed by the court to represent the other, acted for both defendants throughout the entire trial. The decisions on the appeals in those cases that the appointment, made over timely objection, resulted in a deprivation of the constitutional right to counsel, were based upon the presence of a conflict between the interests of the codefendants which prevented a fair trial and the protection of one if unwillingly represented by the attorney for the other. It was indicated in the Lanigan case that, pursuant to decisions such as in Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45, 53 S.Ct. 55, 77 L.Ed. 158, 84 A.L.R. 527, the appointment and compulsory representation of both defendants by the counsel of one would be a failure by the trial court to make an effective appointment of counsel so as to amount to a denial of due process and would justify the release of a petitioner in a habeas corpus proceeding. See, also, Moore v. Dempsey, 261 U.S. 86, 43 S.Ct. 265, 67 L.Ed. 543; Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458, 58 S.Ct. 1019, 82 L.Ed. 1461, 146 A.L.R. 357; Walker v. Johnston, 312 U.S. 275, 61 S.Ct. 574, 85 L.Ed. 830; cf. Betts v. Brady, 316 U.S. 455, 62 S.Ct. 1252, 86 L.Ed. 1595.

It is assumed that the interests of Egan and Tinnin on their joint trial for the murder of Mrs. Hughes were conflicting. Throughout the trial and until the few minutes before the completion of the People's closing argument, Hallinan, counsel of Egan's own choosing, had represented him and given undivided and full personal attention to his defense. The trial commenced on August 8, 1932, and the jury's verdict was returned on the following September 6th. Even during the twenty minutes of the closing argument when Hallinan was absent, Egan's rights were protected by the stipulation theretofore entered into by his own chosen counsel. The petitioner places great reliance on language appearing in the Glasser case, and applied in the Lanigan case, that the right under consideration was a fundamental right and that courts should not indulge in nice calculations as to the amount of prejudice arising from its denial. So here also we are not concerned with nice questions of prejudice. A showing of a substantial deprivation of the right is essential. Unless the petitioner has established such a deprivation he may not prevail in this proceeding.

[15] Tinnin's counsel objected to his appointment as counsel for Egan, but neither he, Egan, nor any one else, either on the trial, on Tinnin's appeal, or on the previous application for the writ of habeas corpus, considered it necessary or appropriate to raise the objection of conflict of interest. It was not until after the decision in the Glasser case on January 19, 1942, that the question was raised in this proceeding. Lapse of time in itself would not of course foreclose relief under a proper showing. But here there is an absence of any substantial showing that Egan was denied the benefits of due process. To epitomize: Throughout the trial and until twenty minutes before the end of the closing argument Egan had been represented by counsel of his choice. All of the evidence had been received and his counsel's argument had been made to the jury. The jury had heard all of the arguments except a portion of the People's closing argument. Nothing occurred thereafter to render the appointment of other counsel ineffective. During the short period of Coghlan's service as the appointed counsel for Egan, the latter's rights were protected by the stipulation entered into by Hallinan. The only service Coghlan was called upon to render was his refusal to waive written instructions. Egan's request to represent himself was recognized during the period the instructions were read to the jury. The appointment of Kenny endured for ten minutes while the verdicts were returned and Egan's consent to a date for judgment and sentence was obtained. It is true that Kenny had been called as a witness for the prosecution but only to establish whether a Mrs. Barton had been a caller at Egan's office on April 30, 1932. Kenny was assistant to Egan as public defender and the friendliest relation between them was apparent. Hallinan was permitted to re-enter the case at a point when his client's interests again required his personal attention.

Finally, the petitioners are making a collateral attack on judgments rendered ten years before this particular proceeding was initiated. The burden was upon them to show that they were deprived of some constitutional right. Neither has established such a deprivation on the basis of alleged false testimony given at the trial, and neither has proved that he was deprived of the assistance of counsel in a substantial sense. Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458, 468, 58 S. Ct. 1019, 82 L.Ed. 1461, 146 A.L.R. 357. The court therefore would not be justified in declaring the judgments void.

The writs heretofore issued are discharged and the petitioners are remanded to custody.

1. Workmen's compensation $\S$ 459, 463

Under workmen's compensation statute, where a child is living with his mother at time of accident in course of employment which resulted in her death, or the mother was legally liable for child's support, then, in the event that the father is living, the conclusive presumption of child's dependency applies if the father was not dependent upon the wife. St.1937, p. 268, § 3501 (b).

2. Workmen's compensation $\S$ 459, 463

Where the Industrial Accident Commission found that surviving father was not dependent upon his wife at time of her death resulting from an accident in the course of her employment, the commission properly awarded death benefit to minor children who were living with her, since under the compensation statute the children were conclusively presumed to be dependent upon her, and whether she was liable for their support was of no consequence. EDMONDS, Justice.

The Industrial Accident Commission awarded a death benefit to the minor children of a mother who was killed in an industrial accident. Douglas Aircraft Company, Inc., the mother's employer, by writ of review, now challenges the commission's jurisdiction to make the award, and the question for decision concerns the construction of section 3501(b) of the Labor Code, St.1937, p. 268, which declares that, under stated conditions, a minor child shall be conclusively presumed to have been wholly dependent upon a parent.

[1,2] There is no dispute as to the facts. In 1942, Nathan Meehan and Hazel N. Meehan, his wife, with their two minor children, came to California from Oklahoma where they had conducted a grocery store. Meehan found employment in a shipyard. Because his salary of about $50 per week, less the deductions made for war bonds, federal income tax and social security payments, was insufficient to meet all of their living expenses, Mrs. Meehan secured a position at the aircraft factory and their salaries were pooled in a common fund for the support of the family. Three weeks after she went to work, Mrs. Meehan was killed in an accident arising out of and occurring in the course of her employment. Upon these facts the commission found that Meehan was not dependent upon his wife for support; also, that "said employee left surviving, wholly dependent," two minor children who are entitled to a death benefit of $5,844.02, based upon stipulated earnings.

An award was made accordingly with an additional amount of $150 for burial expenses.

The commission acted without or in excess of its power, Labor Code, § 5952, the employer asserts, because the uncontradicted testimony of the minors' father shows that at the time of the death of the mother, they were not wholly dependent upon her as they were receiving substantial support from him. Under these circumstances, says the employer, the conclusive presumption of total dependency specified in section 3501(b) of the Labor Code is not available to the minor children. In support of its award, the commission takes the position that, according to the express terms of that statute, a minor child is conclusively presumed to have been dependent upon a parent, either father or mother, with whom he was living at the time of an industrial accident by which such parent was killed. The commission also urges that its award should be upheld because Mrs. Meehan was legally liable for the support of her minor children. Adopting the same grounds for affirming the award as those stated by the commission, counsel for the children also say that as the employer is attacking only the amount allowed to the minors, the provision regarding dependency should be liberally construed in accordance with the legislative mandate requiring the enactments concerning workmen's compensation to be construed "with the purpose of extending their benefits for the protection of persons injured in the course of their employment." Labor Code, § 3202.

Section 3501 of the Labor Code reads as follows: "The following shall be conclusively presumed to be wholly dependent for support upon a deceased employee: (a) A wife upon a husband with whom she was living at the time of his injury, or for whose support such husband was legally liable at the time of his injury. (b) A child under the age of eighteen years * * * upon the parent with whom he is living at the time of the injury of the parent or for whose maintenance the parent was legally liable at the time of injury, there being no surviving dependent parent." The following section 3502, provides: "In all other cases, questions of entire or partial dependency and questions as to who are dependents and the extent of their dependency shall be determined in accordance with the facts as they exist at the time of the injury of the employee."

Usually, and particularly before war-time conditions brought married women into industry, the man of the family is the wage earner and the wife and minor child or children are dependent upon him. In accordance with a sound social policy, the Legislature has declared that there shall be a conclusive presumption of dependency as to a wife living with her husband, or for whose support he is legally liable. The same presumption applies to a minor child under eighteen years of age, but only if there is "no surviving dependent parent." Unquestionably, the legislative intent was to give particular consideration to a dependent surviving parent, and under all ordinary circumstances, this is the wife. If she was living with her husband at the time of the fatal accident, or he was then liable for her support, she, exclusively, is given the advantage of the conclusive presumption, and in practice, although the Industrial Accident Commission is not required to do so, Labor Code, §§ 4703, 4704, the entire death benefit is made to her. Only if the status of the wife at the time her husband sustained the fatal injury does not meet the conditions specified by the statute is a minor child under eighteen living with the father, or for whose support the father is liable, entitled to the conclusive presumption.

In the event of the death of a mother by industrial accident, the right of her minor child to a death benefit depends upon other provisions of section 3501. By the express terms of that statute, if the child was living with his mother at the time of the accident, or the mother was legally liable for his support, then, in the event that the father is living, the conclusive presumption applies to the child if the father was not dependent upon his wife. However, if it be determined, as an issue of fact, that the father was dependent upon his wife, a minor child may not be held, as a matter of law, to have been dependent upon her. Under this construction of the statute, the commission having found that Meehan was not dependent upon his wife at the time of her death, properly awarded a death benefit to the minor children who were living with her. Whether or not she was liable for their support is of no consequence; the Legislature has stated that the conclusive presumption applies under either of the conditions mentioned.

The petitioner relies upon Fox v. Industrial Acc.Comm., 194 Cal. 173, 228 P. 38, and State Comp.Ins.Fund v. Industrial Acc.Comm., 125 Cal.App. 776, 14 P.2d 140, as holding that the conclusive presumption is operative only if the father is killed and the child's status comes within both of the conditions specified in the statute. However, in the Fox case the minor children were not living with either the mother or the father at the time of her death and the court declared that, as she was not legally liable for their maintenance, the conclusive presumption of dependency did not apply. And although the opinion includes a reference to the commission's contention that the statute (then § 14[a] of the Workmen's Compensation Act, Stats.1917, p. 844, as amended) applies to both parents, that point was expressly rejected as a ground of decision. In the later case the District Court of Appeal annulled an award of the commission upon an erroneous conclusion concerning the holding in Fox v. Industrial Acc.Comm., supra. The decision of the District Court of Appeal is therefore disapproved.

Comment concerning the phrase "no surviving dependent parent" is also found in the case of Baker v. Industrial Acc.Comm., 2 Cal.App.2d 730, 38 P.2d 822, 823, where the court characterized these words as obscure in meaning but ventured the opinion that where a claimant has a surviving parent upon whom he may rely for support, the conclusive presumption of dependency may not be applied. This statement, although dictum, is disapproved as being directly contrary to the conclusion now stated in regard to the conditions entitling a minor child to the benefit of the presumption.

The award is affirmed.

I. Workmen's compensation $\S$ 459, 463

Where both husband and wife were employed and pooled their wages to pay living expenses, at time of accidental injury in course of employment resulting in wife's death, the Industrial Commission properly awarded compensation to minor child on ground that under statute the husband was not a "surviving dependent parent" and the child was conclusively presumed to be dependent on the mother. 2. Constitutional law $\S$ 301

A compensation award to a minor for fatal industrial accident of child's mother, who was survived by a husband also employed and not dependent on wife, which award was based on ground that under statute child was conclusively presumed to be wholly dependent on mother, did not deprive employer or its insurance carrier of property without "due process of law." St.1937, p. 268, $\S$ 3501; Const. art. 1, $\S$ 13; art. 20, $\S$ 21; U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 14, $\S$ 1.

Proceeding by Fireman's Fund Indemnity Company, insurance carrier, to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation to Betty Louise Graves, a minor, for the death of Mary I. Graves.

Award affirmed.

EDMONDS, Justice.

By writ of review, the insurance carrier of Permanente Metals Corporation, the employer of Mary I. Graves at the time she sustained fatal injuries arising out of and occurring in the course of that employment, has attacked the award of a death benefit made to the woman's minor child. The facts are undisputed and the question for decision concerns the statute which was construed and applied in Douglas Aircraft Co., Inc., v. Industrial Acc. Comm., Cal. Sup., 149 P.2d 702.

[1,2] At the time of her death, Mrs. Graves and her husband were both employed at the same shipyard. Betty Louise Graves, about ten years old, is their minor child. The parents pooled their wages and from the total amount received by them paid the family's living expenses. Upon the application of the husband and child for a death benefit, the commission found that "by presumption" the child survives her mother as a total dependent and that "there was no surviving dependent parent." An award of a death benefit of $6,000 was made to the child and an additional amount was allowed to the husband for burial expenses.

The insurance carrier charges that the commission in making the award has acted without and in excess of its power; that the findings and award are unreasonable; and that the findings of fact do not support the award. Other grounds stated by the petitioner are that "unless the award is annulled, your petitioner will be deprived of its property without due process of law in violation of Section 21 of Article XX, and of Section 13 of Article I of the Constitution of the State of California, and in violation of Section 1 of Article XIV of the Amendments to the Constitution of the United States of America." The commission, in support of its ruling declares that by the express terms of section 3501 of the Labor Code, St.1937, p. 268, a child under the age of eighteen years is conclusively presumed to have been wholly dependent upon a parent, male or female, with whom he is living at the time of a fatal industrial accident and that Graves is not a "surviving dependent parent" within the meaning of that statute.

The constitutional points presented by the petitioner are not supported by either argument or citation of authority. As to the construction of the statute, it argues that under circumstances such as those shown in the present case, a child may only be found to be partially dependent upon the mother. The decision in the Douglas Aircraft Co. case is to the contrary and compels a determination accordingly.

The award is affirmed.

In suit by executor to recover amount of loan for purchase of a motortruck, which loan was alleged to have been procured by fraud, wherein defendant filed cross-complaint against executor individually for damages for wrongfully taking possession of truck, evidence, indicating that defendant fraudulently obtained loan from estate with intention of abandoning lease covering estate farm which he did immediately after procuring loan and purchasing truck, supported judgment for executor.

2. Executors and administrators ¶449

In suit by executor to recover amount of loan which was alleged to have been procured by fraud, defendant's contention that there was fatal variance between allegations of pleading and proof, because loan was made by plaintiff individually and not by estate of which he was executor, was not sustained by record.

5. Executors and administrators ¶426

Where executor's suit to recover money of estate was primarily based on an action in assumpsit to recover money obtained by fraud and not on note, it was immaterial that purported note was payable to plaintiff individually and not to the estate.

6. Executors and administrators ¶437(1)

Where executor's suit to recover money of estate was primarily based on an action in assumpsit to recover money obtained by fraud and not on note, it was immaterial that note allegedly had not matured at time of filing of complaint.

7. Executors and administrators ¶437(1)

Where executor's suit to recover $600 lent was based on fraud in procuring loan, the suit was not premature merely because the note, evidencing loan, and dated April 1, 1942, provided that money was to draw interest at rate of 7 per cent. annually until paid and $200 on principal until paid.

8. Executors and administrators ¶448

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; Arthur Coats, Judge.

Suit by Vest Lowrey, as executor of the estate of Bedford Lowrey, deceased, against Joseph T. Rego, to recover the amount of a loan for the purchase of a truck, wherein the defendant filed a cross-complaint against Vest Lowrey. From a judgment for plaintiff, the defendant and cross-complainant appeals.

Affirmed.

Carlin & Fudge and W. E. Davies, all of Marysville, for appellant.

Lawrence J. Skirving, of Sacramento, for respondent.

THOMPSON, Justice.

This is an appeal by the defendant and cross-complainant from a judgment for the sum of $600, which was rendered pursuant to a verdict, in a suit to recover the amount of a loan for the purchase of a truck, which loan was alleged to have been procured by fraud.

The amended complaint alleges that plaintiff, Vest Lowrey, is executor and sole devisee of the last will and estate of his brother Bedford Lowrey, deceased; that the estate consisted of a farm in Sutter County and $1,229.36 in cash; that on October 23, 1941, plaintiff orally leased the ranch to the defendant, Joseph T. Rego, for a term from year to year; that on or about April 1, 1942, the defendant fraudulently induced the plaintiff, as executor of said estate, to loan him the sum of $600 with which to purchase a truck, by representing that defendant needed the truck for use on the farm, and that if the loan was made defendant would remain on the ranch and properly farm it for the period of a year and that he would transfer the title and custody of the truck to plaintiff to be held as security for the payment of said debt; that pursuant to that agreement the plaintiff loaned defendant said sum of $600 with which the truck was purchased and at defendant's request a certificate of ownership of the truck was issued in the name of Vest Lowrey, and that the defendant executed and delivered to plaintiff a promissory note for payment of the debt, in the following language:

"This 1st day of April, 1942, I, Joseph T. Rego, hereby agree to pay to Vest Lowrey Six Hundred Dollars ($600.00). This amount and note is secured by the pink slip of a GMC Truck (1937) model. This money is to draw interest at the rate of 7% annually until paid and $200.00 on principal until paid.

"(Signed) Jos. T. Rego."

The complaint further alleges that, immediately after negotiating said loan and purchasing the truck, the defendant, Joseph T. Rego, contrary to his said agreement, on or about April 1, 1942, repudiated the lease and abandoned the farm "taking the truck for his own use and benefit." It is also alleged that on June 16, 1942, plaintiff rescinded the agreement by giving notice as required by law.

To the amended complaint the defendant filed his answer denying the material allegations thereof, and also filed a cross-complaint against Vest Lowrey, as an individual, alleging ownership of the truck by the cross-complainant and that plaintiff, on April 1, 1942, wrongfully took possession of the vehicle and deprived him of the use thereof to his damage in the sum of $25 per day from April 1, 1942, to June 10, 1942, aggregating the sum of $1,750. To the cross-complaint the plaintiff individually and as executor of said estate filed an answer denying the material allegations thereof except as to the allegations and admissions which are contained in paragraphs III, IV, V, VI and VII of the amended complaint.

The cause was tried with a jury which returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $600 and against the defendant and cross-complainant. The court adopted the verdict of the jury and rendered judgment against the defendant and cross-complainant for the sum of $600. From that judgment the defendant and cross-complainant has appealed.

The appellant contends that the verdict and judgment are not supported by the evidence; that there is a fatal variance between the allegations of the pleadings and the proof thereof since the loan was made by Vest Lowrey individually and not by the estate of which he was executor; that the action was commenced prematurely before the note was due; that the court erred in striking out some of defendant's evidence of damages resulting from having been deprived of the use of his truck, and that the court erred in its instructions to the jury.

[1,2] The verdict and judgment are adequately supported by the evidence. There is not a fatal variance between the allegations of the amended complaint and the proof thereof to the effect that the $600 which was loaned to the defendant was the property of the estate of Bedford Lowrey, deceased. The suit was instituted in the name of Vest Lowrey, as executor of that estate. It is alleged that the money belongs to the estate, that it was loaned by the estate and that the loan was procured by fraud and deceit. The check for that sum was drawn on a bank for the funds of the estate and signed by Vest Lowrey as executor. The defendant knew that the money belonged to the estate. This is not a suit on a promissory note. On the contrary, it is primarily a suit for money had and procured by means of fraud which rendered the note invalid. The proof supports those allegations. The loan was made in good faith without a previous order of the court for the purpose of preserving the estate. The executor was the sole devisee of the estate. There is no evidence that there are creditors of the estate who would be harmed by the loss of the money.

[3] It is the executor's duty to "collect all debts due * * * to the estate." Sec. 571, Probate Code. Actions for the recovery of real or personal property "may be maintained by * * * executors." Sec. 573, Probate Code. It is the duty of an executor to collect all assets belonging to the estate. 11b Cal.Jur. 232, sec. 828; 2 Bancroft's Prob. Pr., 663, sec. 348. In the case of Robertson v. Burrell, 110 Cal. 568, at page 574, 42 P. 1086, at page 1087, it is said:

"The administrator, also, is a trustee, with well-defined duties, among the first of which is that of collecting the assets of the estate, and paying its just debts."

The evidence warranted the jury in assuming that the defendant fraudulently obtained the loan from the estate with the intention of abandoning his lease and the farm, which he did immediately after procuring the loan and purchasing the truck. He took possession of the truck.

[4] An action for money had and received will lie to recover money obtained by one person from another by false and fraudulent representations. Minor v. Baldridge, 123 Cal. 187, 55 P. 783; Halberstadt v. Nielsen, 113 Cal.App. 313, 298 P. 37; 17 Cal.Jur. 616, sec. 12.

[5-7] Since this suit is primarily based on an action in assumpsit to recover money obtained by fraud, and not one on a promissory note, it is immaterial that the purported note was payable to Vest Lowrey, and not to the estate. It is also immaterial that the note may not be deemed to have become matured at the time of the filing of the complaint. Since the suit is based on fraud, the action was not premature merely because the note, which was dated April 1, 1942, provided that "This money is to draw interest at the rate of 7% annually until paid and $200.00 on principal until paid."

[8,9] It is also immaterial that the amended complaint alleged notice of rescission of "the contract entered into" with relation to the loan and the purchase of the truck. Barbour v. Flick, 126 Cal. 628, 59 P. 122; 37 C.J.S., Fraud, p. 373, § 79. In the authority last cited it is said:

"Where the complaint states a good cause of action for fraud and deceit, allegations relating to a rescission of the contract may be disregarded. Likewise, the fact that a prayer for alternative relief asks to have the parties placed in statu quo will not make the action one for rescission if the facts stated in the complaint make out a cause of action in deceit; nor will the fact that plaintiffs ask that a note and mortgage given by them be canceled as part of their recovery of damages."

In the case of Barbour v. Flick, supra, which was a suit for damages on account of alleged fraud exercised in an exchange of real properties, with regard to allegations in the pleadings concerning a rescission of the contract, the syllabus properly announces the determination of the court as follows:

"In an action for damages for deceit in respect to an exchange of property, the rules as to rescission are not applicable; and the plaintiff may be allowed, as part of his damages, the cancellation of a note and mortgage."

[10,11] In the present case, since the defendant was found to have procured the loan of $600 by means of fraud, he is not injured by a cancellation of the note or agreement. It is conceded he owns the truck which was purchased with that money. The request for cancellation is merely incident to the suit for fraud. If he is required to repay the loan, he is benefited by a cancellation of his note. The judgment does not decree cancellation of either the agreement to loan the money or the note. The prayer for cancellation is therefore immaterial and may be disregarded.

For the foregoing reasons the defendant's motion for a nonsuit was properly denied.

[12,13] The court did not err in sustaining certain questions propounded to defendant's witnesses regarding the measure of damages sustained by reason of plaintiff's depriving defendant of its use. Both Mr. Miller and Mr. Hurlbut testified that the rental value of the truck was $2.50 to $3 per hour. Mr. Burns testified that the rental value of the truck was $10 per day. That evidence was not stricken from the record. Mr. Hurlbut did qualify his answer by later stating that "Our rate" for a ton and a half truck was three dollars an hour." He finally testified that when the renter furnished the driver of a vehicle "I wouldn't give you over two dollars an hour." Plaintiff's attorney did ask "that all of this testimony go out." But that motion was not granted. After several questions were subsequently answered by Hurlbut indicating that his measure of damages was based on the use of the truck for a particular business, such as hauling fruit and grain, the Court said, "You are basing your answer to these questions on your knowledge of that kind of work?" To that question the defendant replied, "Yes." Thereupon the court said, "The answer may go out." The court also extended that ruling to "the Court's questions" involving that qualified use of the truck. To the former unqualified answer to the question, "Was there a going rate for a ton and a half truck, flat rack truck?" the defendant replied, "Yes." When he was asked, "What was that?" he replied, "Our rate for a ton and a half truck was three dollars an hour". That answer was not stricken from the record. Since the witness' answer was based on his own charges for renting a truck, and not on his knowledge of the general local market value of such use of a truck, the evidence might have been properly stricken out, but it remains in the record. That ruling did not constitute error.

[14] The appellant contends that the court erred in giving to the jury and refusing to give certain specified instructions. We have examined the entire charge to the jury and find therein no reversible error. The jury was fully and fairly instructed upon all material issues presented by the pleadings. There was an issue as to whether the plaintiff bought the truck and subsequently sold it to the defendant on a conditional sales contract, reserving the right to its custody and possession. The defendant contends he bought the truck and merely procured the certificate of ownership to be issued to the plaintiff as security for payment of the purchase price. It is immaterial which theory of ownership of the truck was correct. The jury was properly instructed on both theories regarding the measure of damages to which the defendant would be entitled for the period of time he claimed to have been deprived of its use. The court properly instructed the jury that if it found that the defendant owned the truck, and the plaintiff deprived him of its use during any period of time, the defendant was entitled to damages "during the time it was detained." The jury was properly instructed that, under such circumstances, the measure of damages would be the reasonable value of the use of the vehicle during the period of detention. Stanley W. Smith, Inc., v. Pilgrim, 117 Cal.App. 244, 3 P.2d 573; Mutch v. Long Beach Imp. Co., 47 Cal.App. 267, 190 P. 638; 2 Cal.Jur. Ten Year Supp. 90, sec. 55. In the court's instruction number four, the jury was told in part:

"If you should find that the defendant was the owner of the truck * * * and that the plaintiff for any period unlawfully withheld the possession of the truck from the defendant for any period of time,

"Then you shall by your verdict compensate the defendant for the loss of the use of the truck during that period of time.

"This compensation or damages is the equivalent to the reasonable value of such use during the time he was wrongfully deprived thereof."

In instruction number seven, the jury was further charged in that regard:

"In determining the market value of the use of personal property, such market value is the net usable value thereof, less the expense of the upkeeping of the property."

[15] The court did not err in instructing the jury that:

"A contract or agreement which is otherwise valid and which is entered into by an executor of the estate of a deceased person without the consent of Court, while not binding on the estate, is nevertheless binding on the maker in his individual capacity."

[16] In 11b California Jurisprudence 286, section 871, it is said: "Unauthorized or individual loans are at the representative's own risk." It is also said in 11b California Jurisprudence 264, section 854, that: "Where, however, the representative reports such a loan and the amount is allowed in his account, this is conclusive." But regardless of whether the executor who, in good faith, loans money belonging to the estate, without first procuring an order therefor, may receive credit for the amount in his subsequent account with the estate, if the contract or loan is made in his individual name, he may become personally responsible therefor. In the present case the defendant is not interested in any possible loss to the estate.

[17] The court did not err in instructing the jury regarding the principles of rescission or accord and satisfaction. The question of rescission was merely incident to the suit for damages based on fraud as we have previously stated. There is evidence of a subsequent settlement between the plaintiff and the defendant of the conflicting claims of ownership of the truck and defendant's claim of damages for withholding the truck for a short period of time. The defendant was then paid a specified sum of money which the plaintiff claimed was in full satisfaction of defendant's demand on that account. That question was submitted to the jury under proper instructions, and decided against the defendant.

[18] The appellant is mistaken in asserting that the court improperly instructed the jury that: "The allegations of the complaint state the plaintiff * * * is also suing here in his individual capacity." That statement was made in a colloquy between counsel before the case was argued and before the instructions were given to the jury. The instructions contain no such statement. The attention of the court was not called to that inadvertent statement. It does not appear that the defendant was prejudiced thereby. It was harmless, and it does not constitute reversible error.

The judgment is affirmed.

GARRISON v. CALIFORNIA EMPLOYMENT STABILIZATION COMMISSION et al.

Civ. 14159.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.

June 13, 1944.

Rehearing Denied June 29, 1944.

Hearing Denied Aug. 10, 1944.

1. Master and servant ⇨78

The relationship contemplated by the California Unemployment Insurance Act is that of employer and employee, and it was not the intent of the Legislature to include any independent contractor. Gen. Laws 1937, Act 8780d, § 6.5.

2. Master and servant ⇨5

A generally conclusive factor in distinguishing between status of "independent contractor" and "employee" is the right of the employer to exercise complete and authoritative control of the manner in which the work is done, and the existence of such right of control and not the extent of its exercise constitutes the relationship of employer and employee.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Employee" and "Independent Contractor".

3. Master and servant ⇨78

An insurance agent, who maintains his own office and pays his own expenses, whose compensation is solely from commissions, who controls his own time, is agent for several different companies, and sells several different kinds of insurance, is an "independent contractor" and not an "employee" within provision of California Unemployment Insurance Act. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 8780d, § 6.5.

4. Master and servant ⇨78

An insurance agent who works for one company only, the company furnishing his office and paying all cost of its operation, controlling his time in its entirety, with right to direct manner of performance of work and to discharge him, is an "employee" within provision of California Unemployment Insurance Act. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 8780d, § 6.5.

5. Master and servant ⇨78

In the absence of any evidence of conduct of the parties to the contrary, a recital in a contract that nothing therein contained shall be construed as creating relationship of employer and employee is prima facie proof of the relationship of independent contractor and principal.

6. Master and servant ⇨78

Where contract between insurance company and district agent gave agent the right to exercise his own judgment in soliciting insurance and provided that the contract should not be construed as creating relation of employer and employee, provision that company had right to prescribe rules relative to conduct of the business did not make the agent an "employee", and in absence of evidence of conduct to the contrary the relationship was that of "independent contractor" and principal and not that of employer and employee within meaning of California Unemployment Insurance Act. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 8780d, § 6.5.

7. Master and servant ⇨78

General agent of insurance company who, after 1938, worked under contract giving agent right to exercise his own judgment as to soliciting insurance and further provided that the contract should not be construed as creating the relation of employer and employee, was an "independent contractor" after 1938 and not an "employee" under California Unemployment Insurance Act. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 8780d, § 6.5.

8. Insurance ⇨80

In insurance parlance, a "debit agent" is one who collects weekly or monthly premiums from a number of policyholders, generally small policies and industrial insurance, the accounts of which policyholders are debited to the agent.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Debit Agent".

9. Master and servant ⇐78

A debit agent, who was required by a contract with insurance company to devote his entire time to the business of the company and whose duties were defined, was at least prima facie an "employee" within meaning of California Unemployment Insurance Act, which was sufficient to support finding that he was an employee. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 8780d, § 6.5.

10. Master and servant ⇐78

Rewrite agent, employed by insurance company to interview policyholders for purpose of inducing them to change their policies under insurance commissioner's directive, working under direction of a supervising representative and who was told where to go and whom to interview, was an "employee" under California Unemployment Insurance Act, notwithstanding his compensation was solely from commissions and that he provided his own transportation and expenses. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 8780d, § 6.5.

11. Master and servant ⇐78

Where Unemployment Commission passed rule exempting all types of insurance agents from Unemployment Insurance Act, commission was estopped to take the position that it had no power to pass such rule so as to collect taxes for certain agents during period rule was in effect. Gen. Laws 1937, Act 8780d, § 6.5.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ruben S. Schmidt, Judge.

Action by Maynard Garrison, substituted for A. Caminetti, Jr., Insurance Commissioner of the State of California, as conservator of National Guaranty Life Company, against California Employment Stabilization Commission, substituted for the State of California, Unemployment Reserves Commission, and others to determine whether certain classes of agents of plaintiff insurance company come within the provisions of the California Unemployment Insurance Act. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed and remanded with instructions.

Morton L. Barker, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher and Norman S. Sterry, all of Los Angeles (Robert F. Schwarz, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for amici curiae.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., Clarence A. Linn, Deputy Atty. Gen. (Forrest M. Hill and Doris H. Maier, both of Sacramento, of counsel), for respondents.

DRAPEAU, Justice pro tem.

The Insurance Commissioner is named as plaintiff in this case, but inasmuch as he is conservator for a California insurance company, reference to the plaintiff hereafter will mean the insurance company. The defendant is the California Employment Stabilization Commission. And the problem to be determined is whether or not certain classes of agents of the insurance company come within the provisions of the California Unemployment Insurance Act. These are district agents, general agents, debit agents, and re-write agents.

While the briefs contain argument and discussion as to the status under the California Unemployment Insurance Act of one inclusive class comprising all insurance agents, a determination of that particular question, if it were possible, is not necessary to a decision in this case. All that is required is to fix the status of the several classes of agents above named and to say whether or not as to them the Commission is entitled to enforce penalties and contributions to the unemployment insurance fund, as against the plaintiff.

Cases from other states construing similar statutes with reference to insurance agents are not of much help, because of material differences in definitions of the relationship in the laws of each state when compared with each other and with our own California Unemployment Insurance Act, Deering's Gen.Laws, Act 8780d.

The federal statute, after which our California law is modeled, expressly exempts insurance agents of all classes, whose compensation is wholly derived from commissions. The California law does not contain this provision.

Cases defining the relationship of master and servant, employer and employee, and independent contractor, in tort and in contract actions and in actions involving workmen's compensation, become helpful in the application of the California Unemployment Insurance Act to the classes of agents here under consideration.

The definition of employment in the statute is in Sec. 6.5, as follows:

"'Employment,' subject to the other provisions of this act, means service, including service in interstate commerce, performed for wages or under any contract of hire, written or oral, express or implied."

This definition may be shortened to read: "Service performed for wages or under any contract of hire."

The meaning of each of these ten words is well established and understood, except possibly that of the word "hire." In a bankruptcy case in the Federal Court, First National Bank of Wilkes-Barre v. Barnum, D.C., 160 F. 245, 248, there is an interesting discussion of the statutory meaning of this word: "The word 'hire' is rather associated with the act of employment than the reward for services done; and in the latter connection is more on the plane of wages than salary, although in a sense it comprehends both; and is also applied to engaging the use of property. We hire a coachman, a gardener, or a cook; or a carriage to take a ride. And may also be said to hire a superintendent, a bookkeeper, or a clerk, although it would seem more correct, in the latter instances, to say engage or employ. In some communities, a farm hand is called a hireling, without intending any reflection, although in general speech the term is one of reproach. As further defining its use, a laborer, according to Sacred Writ, is said to be worthy of his hire. And coming up from the people, as the word thus does, it is sometimes applied, out of place, to the securing of professional services, as where one is said to hire a lawyer, a doctor, or a person of that class."

In the California case of Mono County v. Industrial Accident Commission, 175 Cal. 752, 753, 167 P. 377, 378, construing the meaning of the word "employee" as used in the workmen's compensation act, our Supreme Court observes: "The essential condition of the relation of employer and employee is 'service under any appointment or contract of hire or apprenticeship.'"

[1] Therefore it is clear enough that the relationship contemplated by the California Insurance Act is that of employer and employee, and that it was not the intent or the purpose of the Legislature to include any independent contractor.

[2] In Baugh v. Rogers, Cal.Sup., 148 P.2d 633, 637, the factors to be used in determining whether one is an employee or an independent contractor are recapitulated: "The distinction between the status of independent contractor and that of employee has often been considered by this court, and it is well established that a material and generally conclusive factor is the right of the employer to exercise complete and authoritative control of the manner in which the work is done. The existence of such right of control and not the extent of its exercise constitutes the relationship that of employer-employee. S. A. Gerrard Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 1941, 17 Cal. 2d 411, 413, 414, 110 P.2d 377; Burlingham v. Gray, 1943, supra, 22 Cal.2d 87, 95, 99, 137 P.2d 9; Riskin v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 1943, 23 Cal.2d 248, 253, 144 P.2d 16. 'Perhaps no single circumstance is more conclusive to show the relationship of an employee than the right of the employer to end the service whenever he sees fit to do so.' Press Pub. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 1922, 190 Cal. 114, 120, 210 P. 820, 823; Hillen v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 1926, 199 Cal. 577, 582, 250 P. 570; Chapman v. Edwards, 1933, 133 Cal.App. 72, 77, 24 P.2d 211. 'An employee may quit, but an independent contractor is legally obligated to complete his contract.' Los Flores S. Dist. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 1936, 13 Cal.App. 2d 180, 183, 56 P.2d 581, 583."

[3] Coming then to the application of the California Unemployment Insurance Act to the insurance business, it becomes apparent that an insurance agent who maintains his own office and pays his own expenses, whose compensation is solely from commissions, who controls his own time, who is agent for several different companies, and who sells several different forms of insurance—such as life, health, accident, and fire—is an independent contractor, and may not be included within the provisions of the act.

[4] On the other hand, in California, an agent who works for one company only, the company furnishing his office and paying all of the cost of its operation, controlling his time in its entirety, with the right to direct the manner of performance of his work and to discharge him for any cause sufficient to the employer, is undoubtedly an employee coming within the provisions of the act, even though all of his compensation may be from commissions.

With these preliminary observations we will now discuss the several classes of agents here involved.

Subsequent to 1938 the status of the district agent was set forth in a written contract with the company, in which the following appears:

"(1) The Company hereby appoints the Agent for the purpose of procuring applications for life insurance, delivering policies, collecting and paying over to the Company the initial premiums on the insurance so effected.

"(2) The Agent is hereby vested with the authority and powers and is subject to the terms, conditions, and limitations herein particularly set forth. Nothing herein contained shall be construed to create the relation of employer and employee between the parties. The Agent shall be free to exercise his own judgment as to the persons from whom he will solicit insurance and the time and place of solicitation, but the Company may from time to time prescribe rules and regulations respecting the conduct of the business covered hereby, not interfering with such freedom of action of the Agent, which rules and regulations shall be observed and conformed to by the Agent." (Emphasis added.)

[5,6] While language of this kind in a contract does not conclusively establish the fact, in the absence of any evidence of conduct of the parties to the contrary, such a recital is prima facie proof of the relationship of independent contractor and principal. Burlingham v. Gray, 22 Cal.2d 87, 137 P.2d 9. And without proof that the true relationship of the parties was that of employer-employee such recital in an insurance agent's contract compels only one conclusion to be drawn, to-wit: That the agent is an independent contractor. Baugh v. Rogers, supra, 148 P.2d at page 637.

A careful review of the bill of exceptions discloses no testimony before the trial court which would negative the language quoted from the contract. Respondent argues that the provision giving the insurance company the right to prescribe rules and regulations relative to the conduct of the business makes the agent an employee. Such a covenant is necessary for the proper conduct of the insurance business, and does not in itself establish the relationship of the agent as being an employee or independent contractor. Therefore the district agents of the company subsequent to 1938 were not employees within the meaning of the California Unemployment Insurance Act.

Prior to 1938 this portion of the district agent's contract read as follows: "Witnesseth; The Company hereby appoints the Agent for the purpose of procuring applications for life insurance, delivering policies, collecting and paying over to the Company the initial premiums on the insurance so effected, and performing such other duties as may be required by the Company, all in accordance with the Company's rules and rates in force at the time, and such specific instructions as the Company may give from time to time."

This provision in the contract brings the district agent within the rule set forth in Robinson v. George, 16 Cal.2d 238, at page 242, 105 P.2d 914, at page 916, where the following appears: "The rule, as stated by plaintiff, is that the fact that one is performing work and labor for another is prima facie evidence of employment and such person is presumed to be a servant in the absence of evidence to the contrary. Hillen v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 199 Cal. 577, 250 P. 570; 13 Cal.Jur. 1041, and cases cited."

[7] The general agent solicited insurance as a district agent, and in addition had a number of district agents under his supervision. From the business which these subordinate district agents produced, the general agent was paid an over-riding commission. The contracts with this type of agent were the same as the contracts with the district agents. Therefore our conclusions as to the general agents are the same as with reference to the district agents, and for the same reasons. Prior to 1938, they were employees; subsequent to that date they were not.

[8] At one time in the history of this insurance company most of its contact with its policy holders was through a number of employees called debit agents. In insurance parlance a debit agent is one who collects weekly or monthly premiums from a number of policy holders, generally small policies, and generally industrial insurance. The accounts of these policy holders are debited to the agent; hence the appellation debit agent. Before the commencement of this action the company discontinued using debit agents and substituted district and general agents. As to these debit agents the Commission demanded payment from the company of $2700 upon the ground that they were employees within the act. The company paid the $2700.00 under protest and commenced action. The Commission filed an answer and counterclaim, and demanded additional payments because of the district and general agents heretofore discussed, and because of re-write agents hereafter to be discussed.

[9] The debit agent was required by the contract between him and the company to devote his entire time to the business of the company, and his duties were defined. Therefore there is in the record at least prima facie evidence which will support the finding that he was an employee.

[10] Re-write agents were employed to interview as many of the company's policy holders as possible for the purpose of inducing them to change their policies. This was made necessary because of a directive by the Insurance Commissioner requiring the insurance company to revise its insurance structure and to change certain of its business practices.

Re-write agents were appointed by a letter to them by the company, stating a compensation which the company would pay them on premiums on exchanged and additional insurance secured by them from policy holders. One of defendant's witnesses testified that he was a re-write agent, that he was furnished cards by the company, with the names of policy holders he was to interview, that he worked under the direction of a supervising representative of the company, to whom he made daily reports, that the witness was told where to go and whom to interview. Despite the fact that his compensation was solely from commissions and that he provided his own transportation and expenses, this testimony is sufficient to support the finding that the re-write agent was an employee.

But there is another rule which must be applied before a proper judgment may be rendered in this case. Before reading the briefs and hearing the argument this court was aware of the social and humanitarian objectives of the law-making power of this State embodied in the California Unemployment Insurance Act. Everyone should join in extolling the desirability of insurance against the evils of unemployment. But, worthiness of legislation for any particular group of people should never be a pretext for conduct on the part of the state which would do injustice to some other group.

An insurance company is nothing more nor less than an aggregation of persons who have voluntarily pooled their resources to protect each other from the hazards to themselves as individuals of casualties incident to the vicissitudes of human life—casualties which may and often are as serious as unemployment. Unemployment insurance is simply an aggregation of employees who are compelled by law to build up for themselves a fund to insure against unemployment. And, by law, employers and employees are both required to contribute to the fund, the measure used being the wages paid. In the event the employer fails to collect the employee's portion of the contribution, the law prescribes a penalty whereby the employer must then himself pay to the fund the amount not collected. In the last analysis, these two groups of people are the real parties in interest in this case. And as between them it is the obvious duty of our courts to endeavor to hold the scales of justice exactly even.

From January 1, 1936, until March 19, 1937 (stipulated for the purposes of this case to be April 1, 1937), the defendant promulgated a rule which in part reads as follows:

"Rule 8.17. Employees—Insurance Agents, Solicitors, and Brokers Exempt. General and Branch Officers Nonexempt.—Agents and solicitors of insurance of every kind or nature whose principal remuneration arises from commissions are deemed contractors and no contributions are payable on their compensation."

This rule was in effect during a part of the time employees considered in this case were in the service of the plaintiff. It is conceded that the principal remuneration of all of them came from commissions, and that all of them were insurance agents. As stated, the employer was required to deduct a percentage of the compensation of every employee covered by the act, to be applied to the unemployment insurance fund administered by the defendant, and if the employer failed to make the deduction, he was liable therefor. With this rule promulgated by the commission and in effect no deductions were made from the pay of these employees by the insurance company. And obviously, after it was abrogated, collection of the employees' percentage during the time the rule was in effect was for all practical purposes difficult and expensive if not impossible. With the lapse of time involved and periodical allocation of costs to policy holders, it would be unfair now to require the insurance company to pay its contribution for these employees.

[11] Defendant admits these facts, but asserts that the Commission was without power to promulgate the rule in the first place, and that the rule was therefore void and not binding upon it.

It is unnecessary to pass upon the power to make the rule, because the Commission is estopped to take such a position. The doctrine of equitable estoppel of governmental agencies where justice and right require it has but recently been reaffirmed and approved by our Supreme Court in Farrell v. County of Placer, 145 P.2d 570, 572. And in that case is repeated the exceedingly apt observation from 48 Harvard Law Review, 1299: "If we say with Mr. Justice Holmes, 'Men must turn square corners when they deal with the Government', It is hard to see why the government should not be held to a like standard of rectangular rectitude when dealing with its citizens."

Therefore, the defendant may not now collect from the insurance company for these employee agents during the period that rule 8.17 was in effect.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded to the trial court with instructions to enter judgment in accordance with the views hereunder expressed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Miller, Judge.

Action by Billy Burgess, a minor, by and through his guardian ad litem, Grace Evans, and others against Samuel A. Cahill and others to recover for injuries sustained in an automobile collision. From an adverse judgment, plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

Gumpert & Mazzer and Charles A. Zeller, all of Stockton, for appellants.

Neumiller & Ditz and C. H. Hogan, all of Stockton, for respondent.

THOMPSON, Justice.

The plaintiffs have appealed from a judgment rendered pursuant to a directed verdict in favor of the defendant, H. P. Garin Company, the owner of an automobile which was involved in a highway collision, as a result of which two persons were killed and others were seriously injured. No appeal was taken from the separate judgments which were rendered against the other defendants.

The plaintiffs seek a reversal of the directed judgment on the ground that the record contains substantial evidence of implied permission for Samuel A. Cahill, the employee, to operate the company machine at the time of the accident, and that the court therefore erred in taking that issue from the jury. It is also contended the court erred in unduly restricting plaintiffs' examination of witnesses for the purpose of eliciting evidence of permissive use of the vehicle.

The appeal is presented on a settled statement of facts. It appears without conflict that the defendant, H. P. Garin Company, a corporation, was engaged in a farming enterprise on Bouldin Island situated about eight miles northwest from Stockton, and elsewhere in that vicinity. The company employed Cahill in 1942, as a mechanic to keep its farming machinery in repair. Mr. and Mrs. Cahill, and their infant son, then resided at Lodi. The company provided Mr. Cahill with a Ford pickup automobile which he kept in the driveway at his home. Cahill also owned a machine of his own which he kept in a one-car garage on the same premises. The company furnished him with oil and gas for the Ford pickup machine. Printed stickers were placed by the company in its cars with the exception of the one in the possession of Cahill, prohibiting the use of the machines for private purposes. Mr. Cahill knew that fact. He repeatedly stated that he knew he had no right to use the company car for private purposes.

Sunday, January 17, 1943, at 7 o'clock P. M., Mr. and Mrs. Cahill and their son were riding in the Ford pickup on a private mission to take some plants and shrubs to the property some distance from their home to which they intended to move. On the return trip, while Mrs. Cahill was driving the machine, and her husband and child sat by her side, a collision with plaintiffs' machine occurred on the highway about one-half mile from Stockton. Two occupants of plaintiffs' automobile were killed, and others, including both Mr. and Mrs. Cahill, were injured. A suit for damages was instituted against the defendants, including the H. P. Garin Company, the owner of the machine. The cause was tried with a jury. At the close of the evidence the court instructed the jury to return a verdict in favor of the company on the ground that there was no substantial evidence showing that the Ford pickup was being operated at the time of the accident with the permission of the owner of the vehicle. The jury returned a verdict in compliance with that instruction. A judgment was rendered accordingly. From that judgment this appeal was perfected. We are not concerned with the judgments which were separately rendered against the other defendants.

The chief issue on this appeal is the question as to whether the record contains substantial evidence that the automobile of the Garin Company was being operated by Mrs. Cahill under the direction of her husband at the time of the accident, with the implied permission of the owner, so as to render it liable for imputed negligence of the driver under the provisions of Section 402 of the Vehicle Code, St.1937, p. 2353. That section reads in part:

"Every owner of a motor vehicle is liable and responsible for the death of or injury to person or property resulting from negligence in the operation of such motor vehicle, in the business of such owner or otherwise, by any person using or operating the same with the permission, express or implied, of such owner and the negligence of such person shall be imputed to the owner for all purposes of civil damages." (Italics added.)

[1] It was stipulated at the trial that the Ford pickup was not being operated at the time of the accident on any business in which the Garin Company was interested. Since the above-quoted section clearly imposes liability for imputed negligence against the owner of the vehicle whether it was being actually used at the time of the accident in its business "or otherwise" provided it was then operated with the owner's "express or implied" permission, it becomes necessary to determine whether there is any evidence, or reasonable inferences to be drawn therefrom, that the machine was being operated with the implied permission of the owner. We must assume that, since the machine was being driven by Mrs. Cahill in the presence of her husband and under his direction, her negligence may be imputed to the owner, provided Mr. Cahill had implied permission to use it for his private purposes.

[2-5] It is not contended that the vehicle was then operated with the express permission of the owner. The only question to be determined is whether the conduct or declarations of the owner with respect to the use of the automobile by Samuel A. Cahill constituted implied permission for him to operate the machine for his own benefit. Permission for an employee to operate, for his own benefit, the vehicle belonging to his employer, may be inferred only when the owner has knowledge, or at least reason to believe, that it will be so used. An owner of a machine may not be deemed to have consented to the private use of his vehicle unless he has knowledge or at least reason to believe that it will be used in that manner. One may not permit an act to be performed of which he has no knowledge or information. Bradford v. Sargent, 135 Cal.App. 324, 332, 27 P.2d 93; Engstrom v. Auburn Automobile Sales Corp., 11 Cal.2d 64, 77 P.2d 1059; Howland v. Doyle, 6 Cal.App.2d 311, 44 P.2d

453. There is a clear distinction between a presumption and an inference. A presumption is created by statute. Sec. 1959, Code Civ.Proc. An inference is a conclusion founded "on a fact legally proved", from which a reasonable deduction may be drawn. Sec. 1960, Code Civ.Proc.; Engstrom v. Auburn Automobile Sales Corp., supra. It has been held that a presumption created by law may be considered by the jury as evidence and may outweigh strong and convincing testimony to the contrary. Smellie v. Southern Pacific Co., 212 Cal. 540, 299 P. 529; People v. Chamberlain, 7 Cal.2d 257, 60 P.2d 299. An inference, however, may be dispelled and overcome as a matter of law by clear, positive and uncontradicted evidence. Maupin v. Solomon, 41 Cal.App. 323, 183 P. 198; Engstrom v. Auburn Automobile Sales Corp., supra, 11 Cal.2d at page 70, 77 P.2d at page 1063.

[6,7] A directed verdict may properly be granted when there is no substantial evidence to support the material issues. In passing on a motion for a directed verdict the court must give full credit to all evidence favorable to the party against whom it is sought, together with all inferences which may be reasonably drawn therefrom, and should disregard all evidence in conflict therewith. Walters v. Bank of America, 9 Cal.2d 46, 69 P.2d 839, 110 A.L.R. 1259; Howland v. Doyle, supra; Engstrom v. Auburn Automobile Sales Corp., supra; 24 Cal.Jur. 912, secs. 162-165.

[8] We have critically examined the record in this case and are convinced there is no substantial evidence of permissive use of the automobile at the time of the accident by the employee or his wife, and that the court was justified in directing the jury to return a verdict to that effect in favor of the respondent.

Samuel A. Cahill was furnished the automobile in question, together with necessary oil and gas, by H. P. Garin Company, his employer, with the privilege of keeping the machine at his home for his convenience in going to and coming from his work. It is true that he did use the machine on several occasions to drive to a local store for his groceries, paying for gasoline for the car on one occasion. He also used the machine for a fishing excursion on one occasion. The evidence is uncontradicted that the company had no knowledge of that personal use of the machine. Adolph Boltzen, Superintendent of Equipment for the Garin Company, testified that when he delivered the automobile to Cahill in November, 1942, he told him "that the car was to be used only on company business." He also testified that Cahill had never requested the use of the machine for his private purpose; that he had never seen him driving the car except upon company business, and that he had never heard of his using the machine for private purposes. Walter G. Norris, the District Superintendent of the respondent company, also testified to the same facts, except as to the oral instructions given to Cahill at the time of the delivery of the machine. Mr. Cahill did not contradict those facts. When he was asked, "Did you receive any instructions [regarding the use of the car for your private purposes], oral or written?" he merely replied, "Not that I remember." When Cahill was asked if Mr. Boltzen or Mr. Norris, who supervised his work, knew that he used the car for his private purposes, he said "I don't know whether they knew or not." Mr. Cahill did not claim he had been expressly authorized to use the car for private purposes. His only excuse for using the machine for his own benefit was thus expressed:

"I had used my own car for H. P. Garin Company's business. I thought that it would be all right to use their car occasionally in my personal business."

That answer does not infer permissive use of the vehicle, either express or implied. It merely declares Cahill's opinion that it would be fair for him to have the use of his employer's machine occasionally because he had sometimes used his own automobile for the benefit of the company. That is a mere expression of what Cahill thought would be just, and we are of the opinion it virtually refutes the idea of permission having been granted to use the machine for private purposes, in view of his positive assertions that he knew he had no right to use the vehicle for his private purposes.

Mr. Cahill admitted that he knew it was the general rule of the company to forbid employees to use the company cars in their possession for private use. He knew that printed stickers were placed by the company in their cars prohibiting their use for private purposes. Regarding his knowledge of that rule and of the fact that most of the company cars contained such printed stickers, Mr. Cahill said:

"A. There were notices in other cars to that effect, but I was never notified, either in writing or verbally, not to use the car for my own use.

"Q. * * * You say that there were notices in some of the other cars. Is that right? A. Most of the other cars, yes.

"Q. But there were some cars that had no such notices in them. Is that correct? A. I can't say that there were any others.
* * *

"Q. And do you know who put those notices in the other cars, if you know? A. The orders were given by Walter G. Norris."

This shows his knowledge of the general orders of the company prohibiting private use of the machines. His statement that "I was never notified, either in writing or verbally not to use the car for my own use," merely contradicts Mr. Boltzen's assertion that he had orally instructed Cahill to that effect. We may assume he was not personally informed of the rule, but, nevertheless, he repeatedly acknowledged in his written statement and in his oral testimony that he knew he had no right to use the machine for his personal purposes. There is absolutely no evidence in the record in conflict with Cahill's acknowledgment that he knew he had no right to use the car for his own benefit. That being true, it may not be said there is any evidence to support an implied inference that he was granted permission to use the machine for his own purposes.

The evidence appears to be clear and conclusive of the fact that Mr. Cahill was not granted permission, either express or implied, to use the automobile for his own private purposes. The written statements of both Mr. and Mrs. Cahill, and their testimony at the trial leaves no doubt that they knew they were not permitted to use the Ford pickup for their own private benefit. At the trial Mr. Cahill was critically examined with relation to each material declaration of his written statement, and he confirmed them seriatim.

Each of these witnesses signed two separate statements which were received in evidence. In two of them they unequivocally declared that the Ford pickup was delivered to Mr. Cahill to be used by him "only for company business." One of those statements was written in the handwriting of Samuel A. Cahill, and signed by him March 3rd, nearly six weeks after the accident occurred. It is not contended the statements were procured by fraud or other unfair means. In one of his statements Mr. Cahill said:

"They furnished me with a 1940 Ford Pickup which I was to use on company business only. I knew that I was not to use this car for my personal use. * * * I had never asked any of my supervisors if I could use the car for my personal use on any previous occasion as I knew that such a request was against company rules."

With respect to Mr. Cahill's knowledge of the fact that he did not have permission, express or implied, to use the car for his personal benefit, he was sworn as a witness at the trial and specifically confirmed all such statements. The following colloquy occurred regarding the written statement of Mr. Cahill marked exhibit "C":

"Q. * * * You wrote that in your own handwriting, didn't you? A. Yes. * * *

"Q. And at that time you told Mr. Lee the truth concerning your right to use this car, didn't you? A. I did.

"Q. And the things in this statement are true and correct, aren't they? A. I believe they are. * * * [Reading to the witness from the statement] 'They furnished me with a 1940 Ford pickup which I was to use on company business only.' That is true? A. Yes. 'I knew that I was not to use this car for my personal use.' That true? A. Yes. 'I also knew that I had no business in allowing my wife to drive this car at any time.' That is true? A. Yes."

Not only is there no evidence contradicting the respondent's positive testimony that Mr. Cahill was not given permission, express or implied, to operate the automobile for his own personal use, but the written statements and testimony of Mr. and Mrs. Cahill confirm and corroborate the fact that not only was permission not given to Mr. Cahill, but he knew that the rules of the company absolutely prohibited him from using the machine for his own personal benefit. The court therefore did not err in instructing the jury to return a verdict in favor of the company on that issue.

In the case of Blank v. Coffin, 20 Cal.2d 457, 126 P.2d 868, upon which the appellant relies, a directed verdict in favor of the defendant, Mercantile Acceptance Corporation, was reversed. That case is readily distinguishable from the present suit.

In that case the court properly decided that there was substantial evidence to show that Ian Coffin, the employee of the automobile financing corporation, who was driving his employer's car at the time of the casualty, was doing so with permission of the owner of the machine. At the time of the accident Coffin was taking two young women in the machine to a social function. He was not engaged in the performance of duties for which he was employed. The printed instructions from the corporation, with which he was supplied when he was hired, merely declared that "Company owned cars must not be used by the employees on their vacations." The evidence was undisputed that Coffin was not using the machine on his vacation. The Supreme Court emphasized that fact. It held that it was the sole province of the jury to determine, under the circumstances of that case and the limited instructions which were given, whether implied permission had been granted to Mr. Coffin to use the car for his own pleasure, so long as he did not so use it on vacation expeditions. In giving its reasons for holding there was evidence of implied permission sufficient to entitle the cause to be submitted to the jury, the court said:

"The manual of instructions that he received forbade the use of the car on vacations, but did not forbid its use for [other] personal matters; the company could determine that Coffin was habitually using the car for his personal business by checking his mileage reports against his gasoline reports; Coffin was not discharged after discovery of his use of the car on a week-end trip and was allowed to resume possession of it after a short lay-off. The fact that Coffin was accompanied by a friend in violation of the rules of the company could not establish that he did not have permission to drive the car." (Italics added.)

In the present case there is absolutely no evidence that the Garin Company knew Cahill was using its automobile for his personal benefit. Moreover, contrary to the facts of the Blank case, supra, Cahill knew the employer's rules prohibited him from operating the car for his own personal use. There is no evidence to the contrary. Cahill repeatedly admitted that fact. Those circumstances clearly distinguish the present suit from the foregoing Blank case. It is not authority for holding that the trial court erred in granting the motion for a directed verdict in this action.

In the case of Hicks v. Reis, 21 Cal.2d 654, 134 P.2d 788, upon which the appellants also rely, a judgment which was rendered against the owner of an automobile, on the theory of imputed negligence of the owner, based on implied permission for another person to operate the machine, was affirmed. That case may likewise be distinguished from the present action. Quite a different rule applies to that case. It was not a jury trial. No directed verdict was involved. Having determined on its merits that the owner of the automobile granted implied permission to his employee to operate the car, every intendment is in favor of the judgment which was accordingly rendered. The appellant, Fred W. Gray, was a dealer in second-hand automobiles. Frank Hume was his salesmanager. The defendant, John Reis, was employed as a salesman. On the occasion of the accident Reis took his employer's automobile from the sales lot where it was parked and drove it on a birthday pleasure expedition. On that trip a collision occurred and the plaintiffs were injured. Suit was brought against the appellant Gray, together with other defendants, for damages incurred as a result of negligence imputed to the owner of the car, growing out of implied permission for the employee to operate the machine for his own benefit. Judgment was recovered against all the defendants. The owner of the machine, Fred W. Gray, appealed. The judgment was affirmed. The Supreme Court said that the evidence showed that John Reis had been working for Mr. Gray three weeks before the accident occurred, and on prior occasions; that at no time had he been instructed by the appellant, by his salesmanager, Mr. Hume, or by anyone else, not to take the machines from the sales lot for his own use; that he had never been informed of any such rule; that he had no knowledge of the existence of such a rule; that he frequently took the cars from the sales lot with the knowledge of Mr. Hume, without asking permission from anyone to do so, and that he also often took the cars to drive to his lunch; "that Hume knew he took the cars for these purposes," and never objected to that use of them.

It is true that much of the foregoing evidence in the Hicks case was contradicted at the trial. But the weight and sufficiency of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses were solely for the determination of the trial judge. With that province a reviewing court may not interfere. The lack of knowledge on the part of the employee that he was not permitted to take the machines from the sales lot without the consent of the owner or his salesmanager, and the fact that the employee, John Reis, had frequently taken them with the knowledge of Mr. Hume justified the court in assuming that they were taken with the implied permission of the owner, and that imputed negligence would therefore render the owner liable for damages to the limited extent provided by Section 402 of the Vehicle Code.

No such absence of knowledge of the employer's rule against permissive use of the machine by an employee, or evidence of knowledge on the part of the owner that the machines were so customarily used by the employee appears in the present case. The Hicks case is therefore clearly distinguishable from the facts of this suit. We find nothing in the foregoing cases or in any of the other cases relied upon by appellants in conflict with what we have said regarding the legality of or justification for the order directing the jury to return a verdict in favor of the respondent.

Likewise, in the case of Lufkin v. Patten-Blinn Lumber Co., 15 Cal.App.2d 259, 59 P.2d 414, upon which the appellant also relies, judgment against the Lumber Company on the theory of imputed negligence growing out of implied permission to use its automobile for private purposes was affirmed. In that case there was no evidence to refute plaintiff's testimony that his use of the car was not limited by any instructions, and it does not appear the Lumber Company lacked knowledge of the fact that plaintiff was using the machine for private purposes. The Appellate Court affirmed that judgment apparently for the reason announced in Dahl v. Spotts, 128 Cal.App. 133, 16 P.2d 774, 776, that when the appellant "has it in his power to produce evidence which from its very nature must overthrow the case made against him if it is not founded on fact, and he refused to produce such evidence, the presumption arises that the evidence, if produced, would operate to his prejudice, and support the case of his adversary."

The Lufkin case, therefore, is clearly distinguishable from the facts of this cause. It is not authority for holding that the trial court erred in granting the judgment in the present case.

The judgment which was rendered pursuant to the directed verdict in this case is valid and should be affirmed.

[9] The court did not err in sustaining objections to plaintiffs' interrogatories on examination of Samuel A. Cahill or on cross-examination of Walter G. Norris. The questions to which objections were sustained were incompetent. They do not tend to show permissive use of the car for private purposes. They merely sought to prove that, in a conversation between Cahill and Norris after the accident occurred, Cahill was not criticised because he had used the machine for his own private purposes and that he was not discharged, but continued to work for the Garin Company for several months thereafter. Neither Cahill nor Norris was asked, nor did the plaintiffs' attorney offer to prove, that the Garin Company had knowledge before the accident occurred that the employee had previously used the car for his own benefit. If Cahill had been criticised by Mr. Norris after the accident had occurred, or had been thereafter promptly discharged, those acts would not tend to prove that the Garin Company previously knew he had been violating instructions by using the car for his own benefit. That being true, the appellants may not complain of the rulings of the court.

In support of their contention that the court committed error in sustaining objections to that testimony, the appellants rely on Hicks v. Reis, supra, and Blank v. Coffin, supra. In both of those cases there was evidence that the owners of the machines had knowledge before the accidents occurred of the fact that their employees were, contrary to instructions, using their machines for their own private benefit. Under such circumstances the reviewing courts properly said that the failure to discharge the employees, or to criticise them for violating their rules, before the accidents occurred, was some evidence tending to show implied permission to use them for their own purposes.

In the present case no such previous knowledge on the part of the respondent appears in evidence. Nor was the excluded evidence offered for that purpose.

The judgment is affirmed.

BOND v. FARMERS & MERCHANTS NAT. BANK, LOS ANGELES, et al.

Civ. 14465.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

June 14, 1944.

1. Judgment ☞815

A judgment entered in another state upon a negotiable instrument containing a warrant of attorney to confess judgment without service of process is entitled to "full faith and credit". U.S.C.A.Const. art. 4, § 1.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Full Faith and Credit".

2. Set-off and counterclaim ☞40

The code section pertaining to counterclaims does not indicate legislative intent that counterclaim must have existed at time of commencement of action in order to be asserted. Code Civ.Proc. § 438, as amended by St.1927, p. 1620.

3. Set-off and counterclaim ☞3

The Legislature, in rewriting code section pertaining to counterclaims, indicated legislative intent to formulate a plan complete in itself without reference to original provision and to substitute a new law for that which formerly existed, and any content of old section not repeated must be considered as repealed even though there are no inconsistencies between the two sections. Code Civ.Proc. § 438, as amended by St.1927, p. 1620.

4. Set-off and counterclaim ☞23, 34(1), 41

The sole requisites of a "counterclaim" are that it must tend to defeat or diminish plaintiff's demand, and that demands must be reciprocal, and connection between cause alleged by plaintiff and that which forms basis of counterclaim is unnecessary. Code Civ.Proc. § 438, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1620.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Counterclaim".

5. Set-off and counterclaim ☞1

The code section pertaining to counterclaims manifests legislative intent to avoid a multiplicity of suits and to settle conflicting claims in a single action. Code Civ. Proc. § 438, as amended by St.1927, p. 1620.

6. Set-off and counterclaim ⇨53

In action against a bank individually for declaration of plaintiff's right to money held by bank in trust for plaintiff, where bank held a judgment against plaintiff for benefit of an estate of which bank was executor and to which estate plaintiff's debt was originally owed, action of bank, in causing plaintiff's debt to be reduced to judgment by residuary legatee and taking an assignment thereof to the bank individually and pleading it as a counterclaim against plaintiff's demand, was proper. Code Civ.Proc. § 438, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1620; Probate Code, § 300.

7. Pleading ⇨238(4), 353

Where supplemental answer was filed pursuant to an order which was entered after notice to plaintiff, the striking of supplemental answer without service upon defendants of notice of intended action of court was error.

8. Judgment ⇨388

A court is without power to vacate an order involving judicial action regularly made and in its place enter another and different order without notice to adverse party.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Clarence M. Hanson, Judge.

Action by John G. Bond, by his attorney in fact, George M. Bond, against Farmers & Merchants National Bank, Los Angeles, and Doris Bond Sherman for declaratory relief, wherein defendant bank counterclaimed. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal.

Reversed with instructions.

George I. Devor, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Boyd C. Barrington, of Santa Monica, and Frank L. Simons, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MOORE, Presiding Justice.

The question for decision is whether a bank as executor of an estate may cause a debtor's obligation to the estate to be reduced to judgment by the residuary legatee and assigned to the bank individually and thereafter be pleaded as a counterclaim to the action of the debtor against the bank individually for money which the bank as trustee had held for the debtor during the lifetime of the testator.

Plaintiff filed his action for declaratory relief alleging that he was the beneficiary of a trust established by his niece, defendant Doris Bond Sherman, December 31, 1935. The basic instrument provided that in the event that Seth Bond, the father of Doris, should predecease her the bank as trustee should at Seth's demise pay to plaintiff the sum of $1,000. Seth Bond deceased June 16, 1940, whereupon defendant bank qualified as the executor of his will. Plaintiff had no beneficial interest in decedent's estate but he was indebted thereto in the sum of $3,500 on three promissory notes executed to his brother in 1929 and which had been appraised at $1,000. Upon discovering the indebtedness of plaintiff to the Bond estate the bank insisted that the $1,000 due plaintiff be applied pro tanto to the extinction of his debt, leaving plaintiff still indebted to the estate in the sum of $2,500. Following the bank's refusal to pay him the $1,000 plaintiff instituted this action August 4, 1942, alleging the controversy, and as consequent relief demanded judgment for the $1,000.

By her answer filed September 9, 1942, Doris alleges the establishment of the trust, admits its provision of $1,000 for plaintiff and alleges that at the time the trust was created she was unaware of his debt to her father in the sum of $3,500. By its answer filed September 29, 1942, the bank alleges the subsisting indebtedness of plaintiff to the Bond estate and that as executor it has applied the $1,000 due plaintiff upon his $3,500 debt.

Subsequent to the filing of its answer the bank as such executor without order of court assigned the three promissory notes to Doris, who was the residuary legatee under the will of her father. In turn she caused suit to be instituted in Ohio, the domiciliary state of plaintiff, in order to obtain judgment upon the debt. Pursuant to cognovit clauses in the three notes, without personal service judgment was obtained against the debtor in the aggregate sum of $5,101.10. Subsequently Doris assigned the Ohio judgment to the bank individually and on November 19, 1942, the court below authorized the filing of a supplemental answer. The supplement alleged as a counterclaim the judgment against plaintiff and demanded that it be set off against the $1,000 due plaintiff. Such pleading was never stricken and its allegations were found to be true.

[1] Inasmuch as no point is made by respondent as to the validity of the Ohio judgment, it is unnecessary to extend the discussion on that point. Suffice it to say that a judgment entered in another state upon a negotiable instrument containing a warrant of attorney to confess judgment without service of process is entitled to full faith and credit under the Federal Constitution, Art. 4, § 1. 31 Am.Jur. 168. The notes were not barred by any statute of limitation in Ohio. Page's Ohio General Code, Sec. 11221.

[2,3] It appears that the primary basis of the court's rejection of the counterclaim arose out of the court's interpretation of section 438, Code of Civil Procedure. Prior to 1927 that section provided that in order to prevail a counterclaim must have existed at the commencement of the action. In that year the section was amended to read as follows: "The counterclaim mentioned in section 437 must tend to diminish or defeat plaintiff's recovery and must exist in favor of a defendant and against a plaintiff between whom a several judgment might be had in the action; * * *." 1 There is nothing contained in this section to indicate that the legislature intended that the counterclaim must have existed at the time of the commencement of the action. The existing statute was the evident attempt on the part of the lawmakers to establish a new law for the regulation of the pleading of counterclaims. Inasmuch as it is a complete statute in itself without reference to the superseded section, a reasonable interpretation is that the legislature undertook to formulate a plan complete in itself without reference to the original provision upon that subject. It appearing that the legislature's intention was to revise the entire subject matter of section 438, it must be presumed that they intended to substitute a new law for that which had formerly existed, and that any content of the old statute not repeated should be considered as repealed by the new even though there be no inconsistencies between the two. Mack v. Jastro, 126 Cal. 130, 132, 58 P. 372; Stockburger v. Jordan, 10 Cal.2d 636, 646, 76 P.2d 671; Jewett v. City Transfer & Storage Co., 128 Cal.App. 556, 561, 18 P.2d 351. The enactment of the new statute will not be considered as repealing by implication but rather is it to be understood that the later legislative attempt is a revision of the entire subject matter embodied in the successive legislative enactments and that the latest was designed as a substitute for all preceding acts. Whatever of the old is excluded from the new must be ignored. All the limitations upon the right to counterclaim not found in section 438 as amended must be deemed to have been abolished by the new section. Buckman v. Tucker, 9 Cal.2d 403, 408, 71 P.2d 69; Todhunter v. Smith, 219 Cal. 690, 693, 28 P.2d 916; Terry Trading Corp. v. Barsky, 210 Cal. 428, 435, 292 P. 474.

[4,5] From a reasonable construction of the section and the cited cases it appears that the sole requisites of the counterclaim are (1) that it must tend to defeat or diminish plaintiff's demand; and (2) the demands must be reciprocal. Harrison v. Adams, 20 Cal.2d 646, 649, 128 P.2d 9. The intention of the legislature to avoid a multiplicity of suits and to settle conflicting claims in a single action was clearly manifested. Terry Trading Corp. v. Barsky, supra. Connection between the cause alleged by plaintiff and that which forms the basis of the counterclaim is unnecessary. Buckman v. Tucker, supra.

[6] The demands of the parties are not lacking in mutuality. The bank is sued in its individual capacity. Proof that it appeared in any other character would have been inadmissible. It filed its counterclaim in the same capacity. The fact that the $1,000 originated in a trust carried by the bank was immaterial. The bank conceded its obligation to pay the $1,000. The transfer of plaintiff's debt by mesne assignments from the creditor estate to the bank is also

1 Prior to 1927, it read as follows: "Section 438. When counterclaim may be set up. The counterclaim mentioned in the last section (section four hundred and thirty-seven) must be one existing in favor of a defendant and against a plaintiff, between whom a several judgment might be had in the action, and arising out of one of the following causes of action:

"1. A cause of action arising out of the transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim, or connected with the subject of the action;

"2. In an action arising upon contract; any other cause of action arising also upon contract and existing at the commencement of the action."

of no consequence. The paramount facts are that plaintiff owed the judgment and the bank as assignee thereof pleaded it as a set-off. As executor of the Bond estate the bank was justified in diligently pursuing such legal course as would conserve the estate for the legatees. In the execution of its office as executor the bank properly assigned to Doris the notes in order to obtain judgment upon them and thereby to conserve the assets of the estate. McCully v. Cooper, 114 Cal. 258, 262, 46 P. 82, 35 L.R.A. 492, 55 Am.St.Rep. 66. The assignments of the notes were absolute. They had been assets of the Bond estate in the custody of the court solely for the purposes of administration. Since Mrs. Sherman was the residuary legatee, the notes of plaintiff would have been distributable to her at the close of the administration. Sec. 300, Probate Code. But despite her actual as well as titular ownership of the notes, after recovering judgment thereon she assigned it to the bank. Thereby she saved herself from loss while enabling the bank to report a partial collection on the notes which had been deemed of no greater value than the amount recoverable as a set-off.

That the bank individually held title to the judgment for the benefit of the estate was of no concern to the plaintiff. Lewis v. Adams, 70 Cal. 403, 11 P. 833, 59 Am. Rep. 423. While it had held the notes as executor of the estate, yet as between the bank and plaintiff the bank might assert the judgment as a counterclaim as though it owned the judgment in fee. Dambmann v. White, 48 Cal. 439. Plaintiff was in no position to object to the bank's strategy. So long as its performance as executor satisfies the residuary legatee in accounting for all of the residuum of the estate its total obligation in the premises will have been discharged. See Bond v. City of Pasadena, 6 Cal.2d 139, 142, 56 P.2d 946. Any failure in that respect would be a matter solely for the bank to settle with the residuary legatee.

[7,8] Finally, the judgment is contrary to the supplemental answer and the findings thereon. That pleading was filed pursuant to an order which was granted after notice to the plaintiff. While there is no formal order striking it, the court's decision suggests that it should be stricken. Conceding, arguendo, that the court's "conclusion" was an order striking the supplemental pleading, such an order would have been erroneous for the reason that no notice of the intended action of the court was served upon the defendants. A court is without power to vacate an order involving judicial action regularly made and in its place enter another and different order without notice to the adverse party. Harth v. Ten Eyck, 16 Cal.2d 829, 834, 108 P.2d 675; Stevens v. Superior Court, 7 Cal.2d 110, 59 P.2d 988; McMahan v. Baringer, 49 Cal.App.2d 431, 122 P.2d 63. Due notice to the party to be affected by a judgment is indispensable to a fair and orderly administration of justice.

The judgment is reversed with instructions to the trial court to enter judgment for defendants as prayed in the supplemental answer.

7. Witnesses ⇨133

Where under none of causes of action pleaded in complaint could money judgment have been rendered against deceased's estate, the fact that complaint contained allegation that plaintiff had presented claim against deceased's estate and that claim had been rejected did not show that plaintiff was not competent to testify in his own behalf under statute prohibiting testimony by party on claim or demand against estate. to rink property and business. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals.

KNIGHT, Justice.

The plaintiff, Richard S. Streeter, appeals from a judgment of nonsuit in an action arising out of a joint venture carried on under the name of Ice Bowl, Inc., in pursuance of which an ice skating rink was constructed and operated in San Jose, and toward the construction and operation of which plaintiff was induced to advance $31,000.

The complaint sets forth three causes of action, and according to the prayer the relief sought was to permanently enjoin a trustees' sale of the rink property, and to cancel two deeds of trust and the notes secured thereby; to obtain an accounting of the business venture; and to secure a decree quieting title to the rink property and the business, adjudging that plaintiff was the owner of a one-fourth interest in both, as provided in the written agreement entered into by the four parties to the venture.

Subsequent to the giving of the notice of the trustees' sale and prior to the commencement of his action one of the parties to the venture, George J. Hollenbeck, died, and at the trial of the action, after plaintiff had introduced the testimony of several witnesses, the trial court refused to permit plaintiff to testify as a witness in the case upon the ground that he was barred from doing so by the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 1880 of the Code of Civil Procedure. We are of the opinion that such refusal constituted prejudicial error, which calls for a reversal of the judgment.

Construing the evidence most strongly in plaintiff's favor, the essential facts of the case may be stated as follows: Ice Bowl, Inc., was incorporated on March 6, 1940, by Chas. S. Mabrey and two others named Johnson and Hann, all residents of Sacramento. They constituted the board of directors, and Mabrey was the active head of the corporation. On March 12, 1940, the corporation leased, with an option to buy, a piece of property in San Jose upon

Action by Richard S. Streeter against George A. Martinelli and others to permanently enjoin a trustees' sale of ice skating rink property, to cancel two deeds of trust and two notes secured thereby, to obtain an accounting of joint venture business, and to secure a decree quieting title which to build the rink, and immediately thereafter let a contract for its construction. All of this was done before any stock was sold. At the end of March a permit was obtained from the Corporation Commissioner authorizing the sale for a limited time of a number of shares of stock under certain conditions, among which required the depositing in escrow of the money received from stock subscriptions. The stock selling campaign was not successful and this led to financial difficulties. Hollenbeck lived in or near Sacramento, and was associated with Mabrey in operating an ice skating rink in Sacramento, which had paid large profits; and through Mabrey he became interested in the San Jose enterprise. When Hollenbeck entered the venture Johnson and Hann stepped out and were succeeded on the board of directors by Hollenbeck and Richard H. Schwab. The latter is an attorney with whom Hollenbeck had transacted considerable business. He did not put any money into the venture, but at Hollenbeck's request accepted a place on the board of directors. To help finance the enterprise Hollenbeck obtained $36,750 on personal obligations from a Sacramento bank, and about a year later he was called upon to pay the same. In October, 1940, or thereabouts, it became evident that the permit to sell stock was about to be revoked for failure to comply with the escrow conditions; and the corporation needed more money to complete the rink. Streeter was a prune grower in Santa Clara valley, and a distant relative of Mabrey, and his financial aid was solicited by Mabrey, Hollenbeck and a stock salesman named Fuller; and up to November 7, 1940, he was induced to advance sums amounting to $9,000, taking the corporation's notes therefor. On that date, November 7, 1940, the stock selling permit was revoked, but prior thereto and anticipating the revocation of the permit Hollenbeck and Mabrey conceived the plan of completing and operating the rink as individuals under the corporate name, Ice Bowl, Inc., but they needed much more money to do so. Finally Streeter was induced by Hollenbeck, Mabrey and Fuller to make additional advances which eventually amounted to $22,000 on Hollenbeck's promise that he would see to it that Streeter would never lose any of his money. Positive testimony to this effect was given by Mabrey, Schwab, Fuller, and the superintendent of construction named Libby. In consummation of the new plan and on November 9, 1940, which it will be noted was two days after the revocation of the permit, Schwab drew an agreement whereby Hollenbeck, Streeter, Mabrey and Schwab agreed to take over the completion of the rink and operate the same. The essential provisions of the agreement were as follows:

"Whereas, it has now developed that it is for the best interest of all of the parties hereto that in place of selling said stock to the public to finance the erection and construction of said ice rink themselves, and

"Whereas, the respective parties hereto have heretofore contributed to the cost of the erection and construction of said ice rink, and

"Whereas, it is the desire of the parties hereto to carry on said business in the name of Ice Bowl, Inc., and

"Whereas, it is the desire of the parties hereto to define their respective interests in said ice rink,

"Now, Therefore, in consideration of the mutual promises of the respective parties hereto and other valuable consideration, it is hereby agreed by and between said respective parties that each of the parties above named shall own an undivided one-fourth interest in said Ice Rink and business.

"It Is Further Understood and Agreed that each of the parties hereto shall be reimbursed for any and all advances made for the erection and construction of said Rink out of fifty per cent (50%) of the net income of said business.

"It Is Further Understood and Agreed that the parties hereto will mutually agree upon salaries to be paid out of said project for the services of the respective parties which shall be paid out of the remaining fifty per cent (50%) of the net income of said business, and that any remaining portion of said last mentioned fifty per cent (50%) shall be set aside as an operating fund."

The rink was completed and opened for business on December 23, 1940, and with the exception of two months during the summer of 1941 was operated by the parties to the agreement up to April, 1942. However, during the five months following the opening, creditors were threatening suit, and some suits had been filed. Early in May, 1941, Wm. A. Sitton, an attorney in Sacramento, arranged with a client named Melick to lend the enterprise $30,000 on a trust deed and on certain conditions, among them being that Hollenbeck and Streeter would each advance an additional $5,000, and Mabrey $2,500; but this arrangement was terminated by the sudden death of Melick from a heart attack. Thereupon, Sitton arranged with Hollenbeck to furnish the $30,000 on the same conditions, and on May 27 and May 29 Sitton wrote two letters to Mabrey stating the conditions under which the money would be furnished. In the concluding sentence of each letter it was stated that a copy thereof was enclosed for Streeter; but Mabrey testified that he did not turn over a copy of either letter to Streeter, nor at any time inform him of the contents of either letter; nor is there any evidence showing that Streeter was aware of the conditions stated in Sitton's letters. However, the evidence shows that Streeter knew that Hollenbeck was going to furnish the $30,000, and that a trust deed was to be given covering the rink property, and he put up his additional $5,000, which with the $30,000 furnished by Hollenbeck was deposited in escrow. But as shown by the allegations of the complaint he claimed that the purpose of placing the trust deed on the property was to protect the interests of all the promoters of the enterprise against judicial seizure of the property by creditors.

$10,000 of the total amount thus advanced was used to buy the property on which the rink had been built, and the balance to satisfy claims of creditors. After the money was so deposited in escrow and on June 10, 1941, the following transactions took place: The rink property was deeded by the owner through a title company to George A. Martinelli, title thereto admittedly being taken by him in trust for the corporation; Martinelli then gave Elwood Addison, Hollenbeck's son-in-law, a promissory note payable to Addison for the sum of $30,000, and to secure the payment thereof he executed a deed of trust covering the rink property, naming Sitton and D. M. McKee as trustees, and Addison as beneficiary; a deed was then executed by Martinelli conveying the rink property to the corporation, Ice Bowl, Inc.; but the deed was withheld from record until December, 1941; because of a question of title Sitton insisted that a second deed of trust covering the rink property be given by the four parties to the agreement of November 9, 1940, which according to its terms was given to secure the payment of a promissory note for $30,000 executed in favor of Addison by the four trustees. Admittedly, however, Addison did not pay over any money in any of these transactions. He was merely acting for Hollenbeck.

In August, 1941, the articles of incorporation of Ice Bowl, Inc., were amended so as to increase the number of directors to five, and the two additional places on the board were filled by Hollenbeck's wife, his son or Addison. So far as the record shows Streeter was never made a director. Meetings were held frequently in Sacramento by the members of the board throughout this period, but it does not appear that Streeter ever attended any of them.

As stated, the rink was closed in April, 1942; and that following July the trustees gave notice that at the expiration of three months the rink property would be sold under the terms of the trust deed given by Martinelli. Subsequent to the giving of the notice of trustees' sale and prior to September 8, 1942, the exact date not appearing, Hollenbeck died. No part of the $31,000 advanced by Streeter was ever repaid to him from any source; and on November 10, 1942, he filed the present action.

Named and served as parties defendant were Martinelli, Sitton and McKee as trustees, Addison, Mrs. Hollenbeck and her son as legal representatives of the Hollenbeck estate, Mabrey and his wife, Schwab and his wife, and Ice Bowl, Inc., the corporation. All appeared in the action except the corporation, Ice Bowl, Inc., and at the opening of the trial plaintiff asked that its default be entered; and during the trial plaintiff moved to dismiss as to the Mabreys and the Schwabs.

After plaintiff had introduced the testimony of five witnesses he was sworn as a witness and sought to testify in his own behalf, but counsel for defendants objected to his giving any testimony upon the ground that he was barred from so doing by the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 1880 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The trial court first overruled the objection but immediately afterwards defendant's counsel argued in support of the objection and thereupon the trial court ruled that plaintiff was barred from testifying. Plaintiff's counsel then, for the purposes of the record, started to make a statement of the facts he intended to establish by plaintiff's testimony, but on objection of defendants he was not permitted to do so. Defendants then moved for a nonsuit as to the first two causes of action, and the court, after first giving its reasons therefor, stated "* * * the motion for nonsuit is granted"; whereupon counsel for plaintiff inquired, "On the first two causes of action?" and the court replied "On all causes of action."

"Mr. Richardson [counsel for plaintiff]: The motion was only directed to two of them."

"Mr. Bedeau [representing the defendants]: We move to amend the motion for nonsuit heretofore made by including therein and adding thereto the third cause of action [to quiet title to the property and the business]."

"The Court: Motion to amend is granted."

[1-4] Subdivision 3 of section 1880 of the Code of Civil Procedure upon which the trial court based its ruling barring plaintiff from testifying is as follows: "The following persons cannot be witnesses: * * * 3. Parties or assignors of parties to an action or proceeding, or persons in whose behalf an action or proceeding is prosecuted, against an executor or administrator upon a claim, or demand against the estate of a deceased person, as to any matter or fact occurring before the death of such deceased person." But as stated in California Jurisprudence (vol. 11A, pp. 888-9): "The statute applies its inhibitions to parties or assignors of parties to an 'action or proceeding' * * * against an executor or administrator, * * * upon a claim or demand against the estate of a deceased person,' and does not apply when the action is not upon a claim or demand against the estate. The statute is not extended by construction to apply to cases not within its terms, or to apply to all actions brought against an executor or administrator, although the reason for the rule might be as applicable to other cases as to the case of a money claim against the estate. It does not disqualify the defendant party." And in applying the foregoing doctrine it is held that suits based on claims to property adverse to the estate of a decedent are not within the statute, because, if the property belongs to the claimant, the recovery does not diminish the estate to which the judgment might decide it did not belong. 11A Cal.Jur. p. 149 P.2d—46½

890. As also pointed out in California Jurisprudence (vol. 11A, p. 893): "Suits to recover property or establish title thereto against the estate do not aim to take from the estate or diminish it and are not claims against it, and the plaintiff may testify in his own behalf. Hence, neither an action to have deeds absolute declared mortgages and for reconveyances upon payment of the amount adjudged due, nor a suit to declare a partnership in property and for an accounting of the proceeds of its sale is one upon a claim against the estate. So also a suit to set aside a deed to the decedent for fraud in procuring it is not a claim against the estate, but is brought to establish the fact that the land never became a part of his estate." Moreover, it is well settled that an action to quiet title as against an estate is not a controversy involving a claim or demand against the estate within the meaning of subdivision 3 of section 1880. 11A Cal.Jur. p. 893; Hector v. Superior Court, 15 Cal.App.2d 552, 59 P.2d 591; In re Hill, 13 Cal.App.2d 326, 57 P.2d 155.

[5,6] In the present case the third cause of action set forth in the complaint is admittedly one to quiet title to the rink property and the business, based on the four party agreement which is made part of the complaint; and clearly under the cases above cited plaintiff was a competent witness to testify in his own behalf in support of such cause of action. As to the first and second causes of action, it may be conceded that they were not pleaded as clearly as might be desired, but it is apparent from the allegations thereof and the prayer of the complaint that the purposes of those causes of action were to obtain a decree cancelling the two deeds of trust and the notes secured thereby upon the grounds of actual and constructive fraud on the part of Hollenbeck, and to secure an accounting of the business carried on under the four party agreement. With respect to the charges of fraud it was alleged in substance that the four party agreement was obtained through fraudulent promises made by Hollenbeck that if plaintiff would furnish financial aid to complete the construction of the rink and to carry on the business he, Hollenbeck, would not cause a sale of the property to be made, and would save plaintiff harmless from the loss of any money so advanced by him; that the only purpose of the execution of the two trust deeds and the notes in favor of Addison was to protect all of the promoters of the enterprise, and to secure to them, out of the net income of the business, the repayment to them of the moneys they had advanced; that there was no other consideration for the trust deeds or the notes; that Addison was "a merely nominal payee and beneficiary" acting for the protection of all of the promoters. It was further alleged, on information and belief, that fifty per cent of the net income from the business exceeded $100,000, which "was and is ample to have reimbursed this plaintiff for the said amount of money so advanced by him." It may be that if plaintiff had been permitted to testify, his testimony would not have been legally sufficient to justify a finding of fraud or to warrant the cancellation of the trust deeds and notes; but in the present state of the record it cannot so be held as a matter of law, because his counsel was denied the right to state the facts he intended to establish by plaintiff's testimony.

[7] The first cause of action is made up of twelve separate paragraphs, the first of which embodies allegations to the effect that plaintiff presented a claim against the Hollenbeck estate for $31,000 based on the four party agreement, and that the claim was rejected; and defendants seem to take the position that because of the presence of those allegations the first cause of action must be construed as one to recover a money judgment against the Hollenbeck estate on the rejected claim. But no such relief was sought by the action, and at the opening of the trial counsel for plaintiff stated that such was not the purpose of the action, and that the presentation of the claim was in fact wholly unnecessary. In this respect Mr. Richardson, one of plaintiff's attorneys, stated in part: "We think we are entitled to have these deeds of trust cancelled and our title quieted to one-fourth of the property, both real and personal, on those premises; that the Ice Bowl is by all pleadings declared to be a trustee for the benefit not only of our client, but of the other promoters; that the estate of George J. Hollenbeck, deceased, and Messrs. Mabrey, Schwab, and Elwood Addison, the beneficiary named, be declared to be just nominal owners and not having any interest in the deeds of trust or net profits of the corporation or anything else." Later on, during the course of the trial, the following took place.

"The Court: * * * As I understand, Mr. Houser [plaintiff's other counsel], you are not making a claim against the Estate of Hollenbeck?"

"Mr. Houser: No; this is on the fraud * * * and for the interest in the real estate.

"The Court: Not against the estate?"

"Mr. Houser: That's correct."

At an earlier stage of the trial Mr. Richardson in response to an inquiry made by Mr. Sitton concerning the third cause of action stated in effect that he believed plaintiff was "entitled" to his money against the Hollenbeck estate; and immediately following the discussion between the court and Mr. Houser, above quoted, Mr. Richardson stated that plaintiff was "asking a money judgment on the ground of fraud and for damages sustained by reason of it," irrespective, however, of the statements of counsel, it is obvious that under none of the causes of action pleaded in the complaint in this action could a money judgment of any kind have been rendered against the Hollenbeck estate. Moreover, as indicated by the remarks of the trial court in granting the nonsuit, it treated the action as being one for the cancellation of the trust deeds and notes upon the ground of fraud; and that the basis of its decision in granting the nonsuit as to all three causes of action was that no evidence had been offered "to show that any of the defendants took undue advantage or exercised any fraud against Mr. Streeter." It must be borne in mind, however, that this conclusion was reached without affording plaintiff the right to testify in support of his case.

The cases cited by defendants in support of the trial court's ruling barring plaintiff from testifying are not in point. In George v. McManus, 27 Cal.App. 414, 150 P. 73, the action was one to recover a money judgment for damages against the estate of the decedent on account of the negligent destruction of plaintiff's automobile. The other cases involved actions for the recovery of money judgments against the estates of deceased persons, either on rejected claims or for services rendered the deceased.

The judgment is reversed.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem.

The defendant appeals from a decree of specific performance of a contract for the sale of real property. On January 22, 1942 the parties executed a written contract of purchase and sale whereby defendant agreed to sell and convey to plaintiffs the real property in question for the sum of $4,550 "plus transfer charges such as assumption agreement, deed and revenue stamps. The above amount is to be paid as follows:

"Buyers agree to pay the sum of $75 on or before the first day of February, 1942, and a like sum of $75 on the first of each and every month thereafter until such time as the amount owing by the buyers has been reduced to conform in dollars and cents to an F. H. A. loan which is now existing on the property and which amount as of this date is approximately $3,800 and when their application for a loan has been accepted by the Federal Housing Administration. At the time the buyers may assume the F. H. A. insured loan and the seller will give to the buyers a deed to the property * * *."

On the date of the execution of this agreement plaintiffs had no money to make a down payment and plaintiffs contemporaneously signed and delivered to defendant an agreement "to sign over our right, title and interest in our automobile * * * to be held as security in lieu of a down payment * * *."

There was an outstanding chattel mortgage on the automobile upon which $318.21 was then owing which defendant was to pay off, and plaintiffs by this supplemental agreement promised to repay this sum plus any additional interest and insurance, after completing the payments on the property, at the rate of $25 per month.

Subsequently on March 14, 1942 the plaintiffs executed a note for $346.83 payable on September 14, 1943 in one installment. This promissory note was secured by a chattel mortgage on the automobile.

Plaintiffs made fourteen monthly payments of $75 each pursuant to their contract. A dispute arose between plaintiffs and defendant as to whether a portion of these payments should be applied as interest at 6% on the unpaid principal. The evidence was in conflict as to the discussions between the parties concerning interest, but that most favorable to plaintiffs is that nothing was said to them about interest nor was the fact that defendant was claiming the right to interest brought to their attention until about September 11, 1942 when defendant sent plaintiffs a letter showing the application of a considerable portion of the monthly payments theretofore made to the payment of interest. Plaintiffs continued to pay $75 monthly thereafter until February 26, 1943 when $1,050 had been paid. The February 26th payment was for the March installment. On March 31, 1943 plaintiffs filed their complaint for specific performance.

Defendant answered setting up his claim to interest and by cross-complaint claimed a default in the payment of the March 1, 1943 installment and each and every month thereafter, asked the court to quiet his title to the real property and also sought to foreclose the chattel mortgage on the automobile.

At the trial, which was had on November 12, 1943, the parties stipulated to the payment of the fourteen installments of $75 each by plaintiffs, that the defendant was entitled to credit for fire insurance premiums paid on the property in the sum of $56.64 and taxes paid in the sum of $73.19 and a balance due on the chattel mortgage, including charges and interest, of $354.72. They further stipulated that the amount owing on the existing deed of trust as of November 1, 1943 was $3,628.63.

By its decree the trial court ordered defendant to execute and deliver a deed to the property to plaintiffs, to execute and deliver a release and satisfaction of the chattel mortgage and to transfer the title of the automobile to plaintiffs, and to execute such written consent or other documents as may be necessary to enable the plaintiffs to assume the indebtedness under the existing deed of trust, the amount to be assumed as of November 12, 1943 being $3,628.63; and further decreeing that on the tender of performance of these terms defendant is entitled to receive from plaintiffs the sum of $484.55.

[1] We notice a claim of plaintiffs that the decree failed to allow them a credit of $128.63 to which they were entitled, only to point out that having taken no appeal they are not in a position to attack the decree in any particular. 2 Cal.Jur. 839.

[2, 3] The primary dispute between the parties in the trial court was on the matter of the right of defendant to charge interest on the unpaid balance. It is the generally well-settled rule that where a contract makes no provision for the payment of interest no interest can be charged or collected prior to the time that payment falls due. Nesbit v. MacDonald, 203 Cal. 219, 222, 263 P. 1007; Puppo v. Larosa, 194 Cal. 717, 720, 230 P. 439; Safeway Stores v. King Lumber Co., 45 Cal.App.2d 17, 23, 113 P.2d 483; Dugan v. Forster, 104 Cal. App. 117, 122, 285 P. 384; Gibbs v. Mendoza, 103 Cal.App. 183, 186, 187, 284 P. 250; Gero v. Richey, 38 Cal.App. 21, 24, 175 P. 91. The contract here is silent on the subject of interest and the $75 monthly installments were regularly paid when due.

[4, 5] Defendant points to section 1 of the Usury Law, Deering's Gen.Laws, Act 3757, which provides: "The rate of interest upon the loan or forbearance of any money * * * shall be seven dollars upon the one hundred dollars for one year * * *", and claims that the contract for payment in installments constitutes a forbearance of money within the meaning of this act. The cases construing the words "forbearance of any money" in the usury law are to the contrary. "'Forbearance' is 'the act by which a creditor waits for the payment of a debt due him by the debtor after it has become due.'" Murphy v. Agen, 92 Cal.App. 468, 469, 268 P. 480, 481; O. A. Graybeal Co. v. Cook, 111 Cal. App. 518, 528, 295 P. 1088. The sale of property to be paid for in installments or in a lump sum at an agreed future date is not under these decisions a forbearance of money.

[6] Defendant argues that there was no sufficient performance or tender of performance by plaintiffs. In their complaint plaintiffs offered to pay any balance found due by the court. The payment of $1,050 in installments had reduced the balance of the agreed purchase price below the amount due on the existing deed of trust which plaintiffs were to assume. They could not assume the debt secured by the deed of trust before the real property was conveyed to them. At the time their complaint was filed the note secured by chattel mortgage was not yet due and did not fall due until many months later. There is no showing that they were advised by defendant of the amount advanced by him for insurance and taxes. Defendant by reason of his claim for interest was claiming a considerable balance which plaintiffs were not in fact bound to pay. Under the circumstances plaintiffs did all in their power to tender performance when they offered in their complaint to pay what amount the trial court should find to be owing to defendant. 58 Cor.Jur. 1085; Ray Thomas, Inc., v. Cowan, 99 Cal.App. 140, 146, 277 P. 1086; Boro v. Ruzich, 58 Cal.App.2d 535, 541, 137 P.2d 51.

Appellant seems to argue that the original agreement to pay off the indebtedness of $318.21 arising from defendant's advancing that amount to clear title to the automobile remained in force, and plaintiffs were bound to pay $25 per month under its terms. It is too clear for argument that this agreement was superseded by the promissory note and chattel mortgage of March 14, 1942, which was payable by its terms in one lump sum of $346.83 on September 14, 1943. A simple calculation shows that this sum of $346.83 represents the principal of $318.21 with interest thereon at 6% from March 14, 1942 to September 14, 1943, the date of maturity. As already pointed out when suit was commenced in March 1943 this note was not due and did not fall due until shortly before the trial of this action.

[7, 8] Appellant urges that the contract was too indefinite to support a decree for specific performance. The times and terms of payment and the amount of the purchase price were clearly set forth. The agreement to assume the existing deed of trust is equally clear. Boro v. Ruzich, supra, 58 Cal.App.2d 535, 541, 137 P.2d 51. The agreement to pay "transfer charges such as assumption agreement, deed and revenue stamps" falls within the rule announced in Janssen v. Davis, 219 Cal. 783, 788, 29 P.2d 196, 198: "There is no principle of equity requiring all the terms and conditions of the proposed agreement to be set forth in the contract. The usual and reasonable terms found in such contracts are, in contemplation of the parties, a part of such contract."

[9] No proof was made of any transfer charges other than those specifically mentioned in the agreement. The decree, probably through inadvertence, was silent as to the payment by plaintiffs of such charges. The cost of the assumption agreement will in any event fall on plaintiffs since the burden is on them under the decree to assume the obligation of the existing loan. The trial court is directed to amend the decree to require plaintiffs to pay the cost of the revenue stamps required to be affixed to the deed from defendant and either to prepare the deed themselves or to pay the defendant the reasonable and necessary cost of preparing the same, and to pay the notary fee for its acknowledgment.

With such modification the decree is affirmed, respondents to recover their costs on appeal.

FULFER v. SHERRY'S LIQUOR STORES

et al.

Civ. 3141.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

June 23, 1944.

Hearing Granted Aug. 21, 1944.

1. Negligence Ⓒ59

A defendant cannot be held liable where acts resulting in plaintiff's injury would not have been foreseen by reasonably prudent person.

2. Negligence Ⓒ59

Where plaintiff, while a patron in defendants' liquor store, was injured as result of an assault by several youths who were having an altercation with defendant's manager when plaintiff moved toward telephone at manager's request to call the police, and it appeared that assault immediately followed plaintiff's movement toward telephone, so that there was no opportunity for any warning and that manager immediately went to plaintiff's assistance, the unlawful assault was not a foreseeable result, so as to render defendant liable for plaintiff's injuries, notwithstanding that youths had made a prior assault on the manager of which plaintiff was unaware.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Robert B. Lambert, Judge.

Action by John Fulfer against Sherry's Liquor Stores and another for injuries sustained by plaintiff while a patron in defendants' store. From a judgment for defendants, the plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Clafin & Chain, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

Borton, Petrini, Conron & Borton, of Bakersfield, for respondents.

MARKS, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment entered after defendants' motion for nonsuit had been granted at the close of plaintiff's case.

In his opening brief plaintiff makes the following statement of facts:

"On August 12, 1943, defendant Sherry's Liquor Store was the owner, and defendant Earl Padgett was the employee manager, of a branch of said stores located at 904 Baker Street in East Bakersfield, California, and on the night of August 12, 1943, defendant Padgett was solely in charge of said store; sometime during the night of said day three men who were together came into the store to make a purchase. An argument ensued between these men and Padgett over the sale because of the questionable age of the man who desired to make the purchase. Padgett tried to phone the police but was intimidated and desisted and then was severely beaten by two of these three men who then left the premises. Shortly after they had gone plaintiff came in with a friend to make a purchase and was standing by the wall at the rear of the store with his friend and Padgett making his selection when the three men who had been in there originally and who had beaten Padgett and threatened him regarding the telephone returned reinforced by two other men. Plaintiff had no knowledge of what had gone on before, nor was what had gone on before imparted to him by Padgett. One of the three original men commenced to argue with Padgett about the dollar he paid him (Padgett) and demanded the dollar back. When Padgett refused to give it back, he stated 'You will give me that dollar back or I will take it out of your hide.' Padgett, mindful of what had happened to him prior to this time and of the threat made relative to using the telephone for the purpose of calling the police, looked in plaintiff's direction and directed him to call the police. Plaintiff, being unaware of any obvious danger to him in so doing, took two or three steps in the general direction of the telephone still undecided as to whether he would phone or not, at which time two or three of the men who had previously been in the store set upon him, beat him about the head and face with their fists, knocked him to the floor, kicked him while he was on the floor, breaking his jaw, injuring his throat, and generally bruising him."

We should add to this statement that when the youths demanded their dollar back, Padgett told them they had broken some liquor bottles and he was not returning any money; that the young men told Padgett they would take it out of his hide—would stamp him into the cement floor unless he returned the dollar; that their attitude was threatening and their voices loud and angry; that this was apparent to plaintiff and his friend who had accompanied him; that when plaintiff moved toward the telephone one of the men said that no one was going to phone the police and then attacked him immediately; that in going to the attack "they ran more than walked * * *. All three came at practically the same time"; that Padgett helped resist the attack of the ruffians; that the entire altercation lasted between three and five minutes.

Counsel for plaintiff admit that they have been able to find no California case involving an action for damages decided under a factual situation similar to that appearing here. They cite several authorities on the circumstances under which a court may grant a motion for nonsuit, on the duty of a property owner to keep his premises reasonably safe for use by an invitee and on his duty to warn the invitee of any known danger. These principles are so well known that a citation of authorities and discussion of them should be unnecessary. Counsel cite decisions from other jurisdictions which they maintain support their argument to the effect that the evidence shows that Padgett breached a duty which he owed to plaintiff, an invitee on the premises of Sherry's Liquor Stores, by failing to warn him of a danger known to Padgett but unknown to plaintiff and which was a proximate cause of his injuries. We will consider those cases.

Plaintiff relies on the case of Molloy v. Coletti, 114 Misc. 177, 186 N.Y.S. 730, as supporting his argument. In that case a motion by defendant for judgment on the pleadings was granted and judgment was entered for defendant which was reversed on appeal. From the few facts stated in the brief opinion it would seem that plaintiff was a guest in a restaurant operated by defendant. Another guest had been guilty of boisterous, offensive and unlawful conduct of which defendant had notice. This patron threw a heavy water glass which struck plaintiff and injured him. The court seemed to be of the opinion that as defendant had notice of the condition of the boisterous patron he should have made some effort to protect the plaintiff from injury at his hands. The only case cited in support of this conclusion is Rommel v. Schambacher, 120 Pa. 579, 11 A. 779, 6 Am.St. Rep. 732.

In the Rommel case it appears that the plaintiff entered the tavern of defendant and met Edward Flanagan. Both became intoxicated on liquor furnished them by defendant. While Rommel was standing outside the bar talking to defendant, Flanagan pinned a piece of paper on Rommel's back and lighted it causing serious burns. This was done in full view of defendant who neither warned Rommel nor attempted to interfere to protect him. It was held that if defendant saw Flanagan setting fire to plaintiff it was his duty to interfere or if he was guilty of making Flanagan drunk, or permitted him to remain in his tavern knowing he was drunk, defendant owed a duty to his other customers to protect them from injury at Flanagan's hands.

Curran v. Olson, 88 Minn. 307, 92 N.W. 1124, 60 L.R.A. 733, 97 Am.St.Rep. 517, is also cited. Plaintiff had been a guest in defendant's saloon and having spent all of his money there went to sleep in a chair. A cook in a restaurant in the rear of the saloon entered and procured some alcohol from the barkeeper employed by defendant. He poured this over the foot of plaintiff and set fire to it causing the injuries complained of. On two prior occasions on the same night the cook had obtained alcohol from the barkeeper which he used in the same manner on two other sleepers. The judgment in favor of plaintiff was affirmed because the barkeeper, having knowledge of the use to which the alcohol was put on the prior occasions still delivered the alcohol to the cook a third time which was held to be a violation of the duty "to use reasonable care to protect their guests and patrons from injury at the hands of vicious or lawless persons whom they knowingly permitted to be in and about their saloon."

The decision in Rommel v. Schambacher, supra, is considered at length in the case of Rahmel v. Lehndorff, 142 Cal. 681, 76 P. 659, 661, 65 L.R.A. 88, 100 Am.St.Rep. 154, where our Supreme Court said:

"The proprietor was held liable for a tort in which he was personally a participant, and what else was said, so far as it may seem to apply to a malicious assault by a servant, wholly unauthorized and unobserved by the master, may be regarded as dictum. An innkeeper is, no doubt, guilty of negligence if he admits to his hotel, or permits to remain there, whether as guest or servant, a person of known violent and disorderly propensities, who will probably assault or otherwise maltreat his guests, and for the consequence of such negligence he may be liable in damages. But the plain ground of his liability in such case would be his negligence in harboring persons dangerous to the peace and comfort of those for whose comfort he is bound to provide. And if, as in the Philadelphia case, he stands by while a guest is exposed to the violence of a person who has been made dangerous by his fault, and sees an injury inflicted without any effort to prevent it, he may be regarded as particeps criminis."

The final comment of our Supreme Court on Rommel v. Schambacher is particularly applicable here. It said:

"We do not regard it as a case strictly in point, but one resting upon grounds peculiar to itself, and sufficient to sustain the conclusion of the court without reference to the proposition to which it has been cited here."

The foregoing should sufficiently distinguish the factual situations presented in the Rommel case and in Molloy v. Colletti, supra, and Curran v. Olson, supra, from those of the instant case so that they need not be considered controlling here. In the instant case the attack on plaintiff was almost instantaneous with the apparent enmity of the ruffians towards him. Padgett had no sufficient opportunity to warn plaintiff of his danger which must have been as apparent to plaintiff as to Padgett. The further fact that Padgett immediately went to his assistance and engaged in the fight to protect him also distinguishes the cases.

Rahmel v. Lehndorff, supra, has been cited with approval and followed. See Clancy v. Barker, 8 Cir., 131 F. 161, 69 L.R.A. 653; Yates v. Taft Lodge, 6 Cal.App.2d 389, 44 P.2d 409; Davison v. Diamond Match Co., 10 Cal.App.2d 218, 51 P.2d 452. It has also been cited and distinguished. See, Ruppe v. City of Los Angeles, 186 Cal. 400, 199 P. 496; McInerney v. United Railroads, 50 Cal.App. 538, 195 P. 958; Stansell v. Safeway Stores, Inc., 44 Cal.App.2d 822, 113 P.2d 264. While some question may be raised by later cases as to the ultimate decision in the Rahmel case the rules of law we have quoted from it are still generally applied.

Plaintiff also relies upon Sinn v. Farmers Deposit Savings Bank, 300 Pa. 85, 150 A. 163, where the plaintiff, a customer, was injured by an explosion caused by a man who was attempting to rob the defendant bank. The judgment in favor of plaintiff was affirmed on appeal because between ten and twenty minutes elapsed between the time the danger became known to the employees of the bank and the explosion during which time the customer might have been warned of his danger. This lapse of time alone distinguishes that case from the instant case. The Court of Appeals of New York in a carefully considered opinion (Laidlaw v. Sage, 158 N. Y. 73, 52 N.E. 679, 44 L.R.A. 216) reached a conclusion opposite to that of the Pennsylvania court in the Sinn case.

Plaintiff also cites Johnson v. Monson, 183 Cal. 149, 190 P. 635; Hiroshima v. Pac. Gas & Elec. Co., 18 Cal.App.2d 24, 63 P.2d 340, and Stansell v. Safeway Stores, Inc., supra. In each of those cases the assaults were committed by an employee and the cases turned on the question of whether or not the acts complained of fell within the scope of employment. In the instant case the assault was made by others than the employee, and the employee attempted to protect the plaintiff.

For the purpose of this opinion we may assume, as argued by plaintiff, without holding, that Padgett owed a duty to plaintiff to warn him of the danger of an assault, if as a reasonably prudent person he should have anticipated such an assault, and if he had an opportunity of doing so in time to prevent injury.

When the assault was made on Padgett, plaintiff was not present. The enmity of the assailants was directed towards Padgett and no one else. When they returned their enmity was still directed against Padgett and they threatened him and no one else. There was nothing to indicate that they would assault an innocent bystander until plaintiff started to move towards the telephone. The assault followed this movement immediately so there was no opportunity for any warning. Padgett did all he could by engaging in physical combat to protect plaintiff. He had no time for words so went into action.

[1,2] Further, there is nothing to indicate that the assault on plaintiff was a foreseeable result to be expected from the conduct of the assailants. A defendant cannot be held liable where the acts resulting in the injury of a plaintiff would not have been foreseen by a reasonably prudent person. Reithardt v. Board of Education, 43 Cal.App.2d 629, 111 P.2d 440; Katz v. Helbing, 205 Cal. 629, 271 P. 1062, 62

A.L.R. 825. We fail to see how a reasonably prudent person could have anticipated or foreseen the unwarranted and unlawful attack on plaintiff because of the prior assault on Padgett and the threats to do him bodily harm.

• The judgment is affirmed.

In re NIELSEN'S ESTATE.

VEITCH et al. v. ERICKSEN et al.

Civ. 12663.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

June 24, 1944.

1. Appeal and error ⇨770(1)

Where appellants' opening brief was on file but respondents did not file a reply brief within time prescribed by court rules, the case was submitted pursuant to court rule. Rules of the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal, Rule 17(b).

2. Husband and wife ⇨274(1)

Under statute relating to succession of community property, when decedent died intestate without issue or surviving spouse, property which came to him as a surviving joint tenant with predeceased spouse and which was originally acquired with community funds went to children of predeceased spouse rather than to sisters and nephews of decedent. Probate Code, § 228.

3. Executors and administrators ⇨314(13)

Where attorney represented both administrator and decedent's sisters and nephews on hearing of petition for distribution and sisters and nephews did not contest right of children of decedent's predeceased spouse to his property after decision of similar cases upholding children's legal position, costs on children's successful appeal from order dividing property between them and decedent's sisters and nephews should be paid by estate and not assessed against sisters and nephews. Probate Code, § 1232.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Proceeding in the matter of the estate of Mainert Nielsen, also known as Dietrich Christian Mainert Nielsen, also known as Meinert Nielsen, deceased. From an order settling final account and decreeing distribution, Myrtle Veitch and others appeal, opposed by Regina Ericksen and others.

Order reversed.

John Langer and Howard Magee, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

A. E. Levinson, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WARD, Justice.

This appeal is taken from the decree of distribution in the estate of Mainert Nielsen, deceased, distributing one-half of the estate to appellants, children of Nielsen's predeceased spouse, Sarah, and one-half to respondents, sisters and nephews of Nielsen.

[1] Appellants' opening brief is on file. Respondents have failed to file a reply brief within the time prescribed by the Rules on Appeal, and, pursuant to rule 17 (b) of those rules, the case has been submitted. Zeigler v. Bonnell, 52 Cal.App. 2d 217, 126 P.2d 118; Ramacciotti v. Galiano, 59 Cal.App.2d 8, 137 P.2d 722.

Appellants contend that under section 228 of the Probate Code they should receive distribution of the entire estate, not one-half as decided by the trial court.

The facts are not in dispute. Appellants, Myrtle Veitch, Conrad von Rappard and Edward von Rappard are the children of Sarah Nielsen and her first husband, von Rappard. After von Rappard's death, Sarah married Mainert Nielsen and the two acquired community property which they used to purchase a piece of real property. They held this real property in joint tenancy. Sarah Nielsen died intestate on October 26, 1938, and her interest in the real property was thereby terminated. Mainert Nielsen died intestate on December 30, 1941. He did not leave a widow or children.

A dispute has arisen between the children of Sarah Nielsen (appellants) and the sisters and nephews of Mainert Nielsen (respondents) as to who is entitled to take the property which Mainert and Sarah Nielsen had held in joint tenancy. The trial court decreed that appellants take half of the property and that respondents take half.

This case is governed by section 228 of the Probate Code, as amended in 1939, St.1939, p. 2992: "If the decedent leaves neither spouse nor issue, and the estate, or any portion thereof was community property of the decedent and a previously deceased spouse, and belonged or went to the decedent by virtue of its community character on the death of such spouse, or came to the decedent from said spouse by gift, descent, devise or bequest, or became vested in the decedent on the death of such spouse by right of survivorship in a homestead, or in a joint tenancy between such spouse and the decedent or was set aside as a probate homestead, such property goes in equal shares to the children of the deceased spouse and their descendants by right of representation. * * *" (The italicized part of the section was added in 1939.)

[2] The 1939 amendment compels the conclusion that appellants, children of the deceased spouse, are entitled to the entire estate. It was so held in Estate of Taitmeyer, 60 Cal.App.2d 699, 141 P.2d 504. See Estate of Perkins, 21 Cal.2d 561, 134 P.2d 231.

[3] On the hearing of the petition for distribution the attorney for the administrator represented both the administrator and "two sisters and three nephews of Mainert Nielsen, the decedent." Appellants suggest that the individual respondents should bear the costs of appeal. See Estate of Schaetzel, 44 Cal.App.2d 320, 112 P.2d 324; Estate of Murphey, 7 Cal.2d 712, 62 P.2d 374; Estate of Pierce, 28 Cal. App.2d 8, 81 P.2d 1037. The hearing took place prior to the decisions in Estate of Taitmeyer, supra, and Estate of Perkins, supra. Probate Code, sec. 1232, provides: "When not otherwise prescribed by this code, either the superior court or the court on appeal, may, in its discretion, order costs to be paid by any party to the proceedings, or out of the assets of the estate, as justice may require." In view of all the circumstances surrounding the hearing before the probate court and the subsequent appeal, and of the fact that after the Perkins and Taitmeyer decisions respondents did not contest appellants' legal position, we conclude that the costs herein should not be assessed against respondents.

The order settling final account and decreeing distribution is reversed, costs to be paid by the estate. Sec. 1232, supra.

Division 3, California.

Criminal law $\S$ 1084

Where grounds urged for reversal of conviction presented debatable questions requiring extended consideration, and appeal was taken in good faith, defendant was entitled to stay of execution pending determination on appeal. Pen.Code, $\S$ 1243.

On petition by Jean Simpson to stay execution of judgment of conviction pending determination of appeal.

Petition granted.

John S. Cooper, of Los Angeles, for defendant and appellant.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., and Frank Richards, Deputy Atty. Gen., for plaintiff and respondent.

PER CURIAM.

Defendant and appellant has made application for a stay of execution of a judgment of conviction pending the determination of her appeal following the refusal of the trial court to order a stay of execution pending the appeal pursuant to section 1243 of the Penal Code.

We have examined the record on appeal and have concluded that the grounds urged for a reversal of the judgment present debatable questions meriting extended consideration by the court and that the appeal has been taken in good faith and is not frivolous. Under these circumstances, a stay of execution should be and is granted pending the final determination of the case on appeal. *People v. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie E. Still, Judge.

Ralph Maddox was convicted of unlawfully occupying an apartment with paraphernalia for the purpose of recording bets upon horse races, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

Geo. D. Blair, of North Hollywood, for appellant.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., and T. G. Negrich, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

PARKER WOOD, Justice.

Defendant was accused of the crime of violation of section 337a, subdivision 2, of the Penal Code, a felony, in that he unlawfully kept and occupied an apartment in Los Angeles with books, papers and paraphernalia for the purpose of recording bets upon the result of "contest, of skill, speed and power of endurance between beasts, to wit, horses." He was also accused of violation of subdivision 4 of said section, in that he did unlawfully record a bet or bets upon the result of such a contest. Trial by jury was waived. Defendant was convicted of the charge as to subdivision 2, and was acquitted of the charge as to subdivision 4. He was sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail for six months.

Appellant's first contention is that the evidence was not sufficient to support the judgment of conviction. A police officer testified that when he and four other officers entered room 241 of a hotel in Los Angeles on October 21, 1942, about 1 p. m., a lady was standing beside a table in the room upon which table there were two stacks of horse-race betting markers with pencil writing upon them, a filing cabinet in which there were betting markers, two scratch sheets, two telephones, two California Turf Digests, blank paper pads, many pencils, and crayons; that as they entered the room, the lady who was the only person therein, said, "Ralph," and stepped back from the table with a pencil in her hand; that a racing form sheet dated October 21, 1942, was on a bureau in the room, and about 30 copies of racing form sheets of various dates were in the closet; that after they had been in the room about five minutes, the defendant Ralph Maddox entered the room with a leather folder in his hands, which folder (it was later ascertained) contained documents including a scratch sheet bearing the date of October 21, 1942; that the testifying officer "was busy answering phones" when defendant entered, and he did not see any one bring the defendant in, and did not know whether defendant "walked in voluntarily" or whether some one brought him in, but "they might have" brought him in; that after defendant entered the room the witness and another officer went into the hall with defendant, took him to the hotel manager and asked her who rented the room, and she said "that is the man [indicating the defendant] who rented the apartment"; that defendant then said he had rented the room but he didn't live there; that they stayed in room 241 about one hour and the "phones rang continuously until they were disconnected"; that defendant "stood around the room" while the witness and another officer answered telephones; that the witness made notations of some "of those telephone calls"; that the "phone rang and people would say, 'Hello,' and then they would hang up"; that one person said, "'Hello. This is Mac. I want two across the board on 152,' and hung up"; that another person said, "'Hello. Ralph? This is W. H. I want the fifth at New York—Jamaica—Alsab, ten and five; fifth at Laurel, Enterprise, one and one; 504, two to win; 156 one and one; 154, six and two,' and then he hung up"; that another person said, "'Hello. This is Ann. This one is for Ruth. I want five to win on 811. Then I want a parlay, 887 to 906, one to win and one to place; and 887, one to win.'"; that another person said, "'Hello, Ralph? This is Stearns. Give me Hi Gold in the fourth at Sportsman, one to win and one to place'"; that another person said, "'Hello. Have you the results of the fourth at Laurel? This is S. T. * * * I want Enterprise, the fifth at Laurel, one to win and one to show; The Raider, the first at Bay Meadows, parlayed to Flying Back, the sixth at Bay Meadows, one to win.'" It was stipulated that said witness was "qualified to testify as an expert on book-making matters as conducted" in Los Angeles County. The witness testified further that the articles which were on the table and on the bureau when the officers entered the room (received in evidence) were "racing paraphernalia" that "a bookmaker would use in recording bets" on horse races; that the white slips of paper in the cabinet were betting markers, and "all [the numbers on the markers] were contained in the scratch sheet for" October 21, 1942; that the names of the horses mentioned in the telephone calls which he received were on the scratch sheet for October 21, 1942. He testified further that defendant said he had rented that room in May, that he didn't know "how the phones got in that room [room 241—one telephone was registered to room 242 and the other to room 240]," that the bathrobe and slippers [which were in the closet] were his, that sometimes he slept in that room, and that "he had been arrested by practically every vice squad in the city."

The lady who was in the room when the officers entered was Barbara Ames, and she was accused jointly with defendant in the information herein. She pleaded guilty to the charge of violation of said subdivision 2 of section 337a of the Penal Code; and the charge concerning said subdivision 4 was dismissed as to her.

It was stipulated that defendant had written his name on a certain document which was received in evidence. A police officer, who according to a stipulation of the parties was qualified to testify as a handwriting expert, testified that some of the numerals on the betting markers which were in the cabinet, and some of the numerals on the betting markers which were in the two stacks of betting markers on the table, were made by the same person who had written on the document in evidence.

Defendant pleaded guilty on January 22, 1943, to the said charge of violation of said subdivision 2 of section 337a of the Penal Code. On March 4, 1943, defendant's plea of guilty was set aside and his plea of not guilty was reinstated. Defendant testified that he entered the plea of guilty because his former attorney had told him that he thought it was the best thing to do. He testified further, in explanation of the change of plea, that when he wrote the facts of the case in his application for probation he wrote that he was not guilty, and the probation officer said he would recommend that the case be tried.

Defendant testified that he was arrested in the hallway of the hotel, while he "was going up there to see a gentleman about some furs"; that the arresting officer took him into room 240, and then into room 241; that when the officer told him in room 241 that he wanted the defendant "to try these shoes on [referring to the slippers in that room]," defendant said, "It is unnecessary, I go with a girl that lives here"; that the girl's name was Dorothy Ward and he visited her about two or three times a week; that the leather folder he had with him (when he entered) contained "paraphernalia pertaining" to his fox and mink farm at Big Bear; that he "never did occupy" room 241, "did not register for it or anything" and was not "making book there"; that he did not say to any one that he was "occupying—making book in that room"; that he "never recorded any bets over those phones" in his life; that he did not know what a betting marker was; that when the officers asked the manager of the hotel whether defendant rented the room, she said, "I don't know who rented the room"; that he did not "remember of writing any numerals on any sheets there"; that he probably did "some figuring" on some slips of paper on three or four occasions when he was visiting the girl in the evenings in that room; that every evening he "had some daily business to take care of" and he would make various figures on pieces of papers to "keep track" of the breeding of foxes and minks at the farm, which figures were the distinguishing marks on the ears of foxes and minks and on the pens where the foxes and minks were kept; that he might have written the figures if he "was checking on some particular pelts" that he had brought in, but the figures were not for his records and he would not take them home and file them.

Barbara Ames, who was in the room when the officers entered, testified that she was with Dorothy Ward when Dorothy rented that room; that an officer brought the defendant into the room; that she (witness) had gone to the room to visit Dorothy, and Dorothy had requested her to "answer the phone" and "make notations" while Dorothy went across the street to "get a coke."

[1,2] Defendant argues that the testimony of the police officer should be disbelieved for the reason, among others, that the officer testified on direct examination that defendant entered the room and was arrested therein, and testified on cross-examination that he did not know whether defendant walked in voluntarily or whether some one brought him in but "they might have" brought him in. The credibility of the witnesses was a matter for the determination of the trial court. The evidence was sufficient legally to support the judgment of conviction.

[3,4] Defendant's second contention is that the court erred in refusing to grant defendant's motion for a continuance of one day. Defendant's counsel of record (at the time of trial) was not present when the case was called for trial. An attorney, who was a partner of defendant's then counsel of record, appeared in court when the case was called for trial on May 19, 1943, and stated that the attorney of record was engaged in a jury trial of an action for damages in another department of the court, that he (the partner) was unfamiliar with the present case, and that he moved for a continuance. The court said, "This is one of those kinds of cases that you do not have to be very familiar with, this type of case." The attorney then said, "I can understand that, but Mr. Fainer * * * has some defense, the nature of which I am not aware of." The trial judge reviewed the record of the proceedings. The arrest was on October 21, 1942. Trial was set for December 16, 1942, and the case was later continued at the request of defendant to January 22, 1943, at which time the defendant pleaded guilty and the matters of probation and sentence were set for February 18th. On February 18th, on motion of defendant, said matters were continued to March 4th. On March 4th the plea of guilty was set aside, and the trial was set for April 26th. On April 14th, on motion of defendant, the trial was continued to May 19, 1943. When the court denied the motion for a continuance, the attorney then asked the court to "put it over until tomorrow, to give me a chance to study it." The court denied that request, and stated that it would be about an hour before a case then on trial would be finished. The trial in the present case was commenced about 1½ hours after the motion for continuance was denied. Whether the case should have been continued was a matter within the discretion of the trial court. People v. Russell, 1909, 156 Cal. 450, 456, 105 P. 416. It was not an abuse of discretion to deny the motion for a continuance.

[5] The last contention of defendant is that the judgment is in violation of Section

1 of Amendment XIV of the Constitution of the United States. He argues that "to grant the right to those at a licensed track to legally bet on horse races, and to make it a crime to do the same thing away from a licensed track, would seem to violate" the said portion of the Constitution which guarantees equal protection of the law to all of the people. Said contention is not sustained. People v. Sullivan, 1943, 60 Cal.App.2d 539, 141 P.2d 230.

The judgment of conviction and the order denying the motion for a new trial are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MASON et al.
Cr. 626.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

June 20, 1944.

1. Larceny ☞55

Evidence was sufficient to sustain conviction for theft. Pen.Code, § 484.

2. Criminal law ☞1169(1)

In prosecution for theft, permitting introduction of testimony containing an inference of prostitution on part of one of the defendants was not prejudicial error.

3. Criminal law ☞349

In prosecution for theft, testimony of officer that he found a blackjack in a defendant's automobile when defendants were taken into custody was admissible as circumstance surrounding the arrest.

4. Criminal law ☞349

In prosecution for theft, where victim when found in automobile of a defendant showed evidence of having been drugged, evidence that bottles containing a drug were found in automobile less than three hours afterwards was admissible.

5. Criminal law ☞783(1)

In prosecution for theft, where victim when found in automobile of a defendant showed evidence of having been drugged and bottles containing a drug were found in automobile less than three hours afterwards, action of court in giving an instruction leaving weight and effect of such evidence to jury and in refusing more specific instructions in regard thereto was not error.

6. Criminal law ☞412(2)

In prosecution for theft, evidence of conversation between officers and defendants immediately after and shortly after they were arrested was admissible.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; G. R. Freeman, Judge.

O. K. Jim Mason and Cleo Jones were convicted of theft, and they appeal.

Affirmed.

Joseph Seymour, of Riverside, for appellants.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., and T. G. Negrich, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

The defendants were charged with theft in taking a sum of money from the person of John Parks in violation of section 484 of the Penal Code. A jury found them guilty and each has appealed from the judgment.

The defendants were living in a house at Coachella, where Mason's mother had formerly resided. They spent considerable time in the evenings at a place of entertainment in Indio known as "Brownie's Cafe." Parks was a sergeant in the army and stationed at Camp Young. On September 2, 1943, he spent most of the evening in this cafe. He had just received two months' pay and had on his person sixteen new $10 bills with a little other money. During the evening he drank some beer. About 10 o'clock he was ready to return to camp. When he went outside he saw the defendant seated in a car. He talked to Mason, who agreed to take him out to the camp for $1. At that time he had $161.50 in his pockets, $160 in new $10 bills. He entered the front seat of the car with Mason, and Mrs. Jones was in the rear seat. Almost immediately he went to sleep or became unconscious.

Instead of going to Camp Young, Mason drove to Coachella and stopped the car in a dark place beside a park. About 11 P. M. a deputy sheriff and two military policemen came along in a car. The military police asked to see the soldier's pass. They had to rouse him and take him out of the car. They at first thought he was drunk but decided he was not. Their testimony as to his condition strongly indicates that he had been drugged. He finally produced his pass which was in good order. The deputy sheriff asked the defendants what they were doing there and Mason replied that he was taking the other two to their homes. Mrs. Jones told one of the officers that Mason was her husband and told another that Parks was her husband. The officers demanded some identification from Mrs. Jones and she offered to produce it if they desired to go to her home which was near by. The officers and the two defendants then proceeded to the house where the two defendants lived.

Shortly after the others left, Parks walked a couple of blocks to a lighted portion of Coachella. He then discovered that all of his money was gone. He reported his loss to the officers who immediately began to try to locate the defendants. In the meantime the defendants had again gone to Indio, stopping at one or two other places.

An officer was sent to watch the house where the defendants lived. About 2 o'clock A. M. the defendants returned to their home with another soldier in the car. In looking through the defendants' car the deputy sheriff found three bottles of wine. Mason said the wine belonged to the soldier and the soldier said it did not. A little later, the sheriff found a blackjack in the car. The defendants were taken to the sheriff's office in Indio. Mason denied that he had taken any money from Parks or knew anything about it. The officers then searched Mason and found $160 loose in his left hip pocket, consisting of fifteen new $10 bills and two worn $5 bills. They also found $22 in bills and some change in his front pants pocket. Mason first said he had acquired this money by working for the Southern Pacific. A little later he was asked if he had taken this money from Parks and he said that he had not "but that Cleo Jones had taken the money and given it to him to keep." One of the officers wrote up a statement to this effect and Mason signed it. A few minutes later this officer had a conversation with the defendant Jones in which she said she had not taken any money from Parks, but when asked if she had seen any money taken from Parks she refused to give any information concerning anything that had taken place during that evening. A little later, she told the officers that Mason had taken the money from Parks.

The deputy in charge of the sheriff's office at Indio had a conversation with Mason the next afternoon. Mason first denied that either he or Mrs. Jones had taken any money from Parks. He admitted that he had had the bottles of liquor in his car and said he had purchased one of the bottles at Brownie's Cafe. Also, that he had the blackjack under the front seat of the car. He stated that he had been working for the Southern Pacific and had just cashed a check for $92 and that the rest of the money found in his possession belonged to him and to his mother. Later he said that the $150 found in his hip pocket had been given to him by Mrs. Jones and that she had taken it from Parks; that she took it from Parks on the road between Indio and Coachella; that she handed him the roll and he put it in his hip pocket; that this was "the quickest place he could seem to get it as about that time we saw the officers come." He also stated that he had exchanged a $10 bill for two fives at Brownie's Cafe in Indio.

This same afternoon this officer had a conversation with Mrs. Jones. She said that after they picked up Parks they went to the Black Cat Cafe on the road between Indio and Coachella, that they then went back to Brownie's Cafe in Indio where she got some wine, and that they then went to Coachella and got stalled near the park where the officers first found them. She said that after she showed her identification to the officers she and Mason went back to Brownie's Cafe in Indio and after stopping at another place or two went back to Coachella where the officers picked them up. She first said that neither she nor Mason had taken any money from Parks "that she knew of". She then said that when they stopped at the Black Cat Cafe Mason drove down the road with Parks in the car and returned in about fifteen minutes, and that he then had the $150 which he told her he had gotten from Parks.

The contents of the three wine bottles were analyzed and were found to contain chloral hydrate, a strong narcotic, which is commonly known as "knockout drops."

The defendants took the stand and each denied taking any money from Parks or knowing anything about it. Mrs. Jones denied that she had told the officers that Mason had told her he had taken the money from Parks. Mason admitted having told the officers that Mrs. Jones had taken the money from Parks and handed it to him, but said that this was not the truth. He then testified that when the officers first questioned him in the sheriff's office at Indio the officers hit him with a blackjack and he made the admissions in question in order to escape further abuse. He first said the officers hit him with a blackjack once or twice but as he went on he had the blows coming so fast he could not count them and, finally, he said the officers beat him over the head and face with a blackjack over a period of an hour. In explaining where he got the money found in his possession, he added a statement that he had won $40 or $50 in a crap game shortly before the officers picked him up at 2 A. M. There were a number of other inconsistencies and conflicts in his testimony. Evidence was introduced that the blackjack belonged to a man in Los Angeles and that it was inadvertently left in Mason's car. Mason's mother testified that she had given him $90 to keep for her but she was unable to be at all definite about the date when she gave it to him.

[1] There is no merit in appellants' contention that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdicts and judgment. Mason's story about being beaten up by the officers was obviously overdone and was thoroughly and completely discredited by the testimony of a number of witnesses. The testimony given by the appellants themselves is such that it is easy to see why the jury did not accept it as true. The evidence, although many conflicts appear, amply sustains the verdicts and fully justifies the inference that the appellants were both actively engaged in the theft which occurred.

[2] Several assignments of error are made in connection with the admission of evidence. It is first urged that prejudicial error appears in that the court permitted testimony containing an inference of prostitution on the part of Mrs. Jones. This came out incidentally and, in fact, was first mentioned by Mrs. Jones. When she was being questioned on the afternoon of September 3, the officer asked her why she got out of the car at the Black Cat Cafe, about which she had been telling, and her answer indicates that it was for the purpose of prostitution. While she was on the stand she was asked on cross-examination whether she had not told the deputy district attorney that she had obtained certain money from a soldier. She denied this. Later, a matron in the county jail testified that she heard Mrs. Jones tell this attorney that she had procured this money from a soldier. No objection was made at any time this matter was mentioned. Conceding that it would have been better if the last two references thereto had been omitted no prejudicial error appears.

[3-5] It is next urged that it was error to permit the officer to testify that he found a blackjack in Mason's car when the appellants were taken into custody. It was one of the circumstances surrounding the arrest and was admissible as such. No contention was made that the blackjack had been used in connection with taking the money from Parks. Apparently, the presence of the blackjack was relied upon by Mason in claiming that he was beaten with such an instrument. It was further argued that the court erred in allowing the admission into evidence of the three bottles of wine found in Mason's car. It is claimed that the car was searched when the officers first found the car parked near the park in Coachella at 11 o'clock P. M., that the wine was not then found, and that having been placed in the car after that time it could have had nothing to do with this case. The officers involved testified that no search of the car was made at that time. Parks at that time showed evidence of having been drugged and the fact that these bottles, containing such a drug, were found in the car in question less than three hours afterward was admissible under the general circumstances appearing. The further contention that the court erred in giving an instruction leaving the weight and effect of this evidence to the jury, and in refusing a more specific instruction in this regard which was asked for by the appellants, is without merit.

[6] The only other point raised is that the court erred in receiving in evidence "the alleged confessions and/or admissions of the defendants." The statement signed by Mason was not offered in evidence. The conversations between the officers and the appellants immediately after and shortly after they were arrested were clearly admissible.

No prejudicial error appears and a reading of the entire record neither indicates nor suggests that a miscarriage of justice has occurred.

The judgment, as it relates to each appellant, is affirmed.

INDUSTRIAL INDEMNITY EXCHANGE v.
INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. ***
Civ. 14460.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.

June 24, 1944.

Hearing Granted Aug. 21, 1944.

1. Workmen's compensation ⇨208

Injured employee must have been subject to direction and control of alleged special employer before liability for compensation can attach to one as a "special employer".

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Special Employer".

2. Workmen's compensation ⇨208

To constitute status of "special employer" so as to be liable for an award of compensation to an injured employee, there must be a showing that there was exercise of the right of directing injured employee by alleged special employer as to manner and method of doing the work, based upon alleged special employer's right to control not only the work to be done but person engaged in the doing of the work.

3. Workmen's compensation ⇨208

Where one person is performing work in which another is beneficially interested, the latter may exercise over the former a certain measure of control for a definite and restricted purpose, without incurring responsibilities or acquiring the immunity of a master with respect to person's control.

4. Workmen's compensation ⇨208

To establish legal relation of "special employer" and "special employee", it must appear that, either by terms of contract or during course of its performance, employee of alleged independent contractor came under control of other party to contract, and suffered injury as result of such direction and control.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Special Employee".

5. Workmen's compensation ⇨1432

Evidence was insufficient to support finding that injured employee, who was in general employ of truck owner as a truck driver, was a special employee of the general contractor on a construction job who had entered into contract with truck owner for hauling of sand and gravel, so as to render general contractor on construction job liable for compensation for employee's injuries. St.1937, p. 267, § 3353.

Proceeding by the Industrial Indemnity Exchange, an inter-insurance exchange, against the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California and others, to review an order of the Commission awarding compensation to respondent John Campellone against the petitioner.

Award annulled.

Herlihy & Herlihy, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Everett A. Corten and Fred G. Goldsworthy, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

WHITE, Justice.

Petitioner, the Workmen's Compensation Insurance carrier for J. S. Metzger and Son, seeks by this proceeding to annul an award made by respondent Industrial Accident Commission in favor of respondent John Campellone and against petitioner.

The Commission found that said John Campellone, while employed as a truck driver, on November 29, 1942, at Palm Springs, California, by respondent Gagnon Company, Inc., a corporation, as general employer, and by J. S. Metzger and Son, a corporation, as special employer, sustained injury arising out of and occurring in the course of his employment. The Commission also found that on the date of the injury, The Gagnon Company was uninsured against Workmen's Compensation liability.

An award of compensation was made by the Commission in favor of John Campellone, the injured employee, against the general employer and petitioner herein, the insurance carrier for the special employer, jointly and severally. No question is here involved as to the award against the general employer, and the legality of the award against petitioner herein, as insurance carrier for the special employer, is the sole issue presented in this proceeding.

The transcript of the testimony which was given before the referee of the respondent Commission discloses that the following facts form the evidentiary basis for the award which is here sought to be annulled:

J. S. Metzger and Son, Inc., was the general contractor on a construction job at Indio, California. The Gagnon Company owned a truck. Ernest E. Gagnon, president of the corporation, ascertained from respondent John A. Fox, in a telephone conversation, that hauling work was available in Palm Springs. Respondent Fox was engaged in an independent calling as a truck broker at the time of the transaction here in question, and possessed a truck broker's license. In addition to his services for J. S. Metzger and Son, Fox was supplying trucks for two other jobs in the vicinity at the same time. We feel that it may be fairly stated from the record that J. S. Metzger and Son orally agreed with respondent Fox to obtain trucks for the Metzger job and for this service the latter agreed to pay Fox a percentage on every ton hauled, as an override. There can be no question but what the injured employee, John Campellone, was hired by The Gagnon Company to drive and to repair the truck which was owned and furnished by Gagnon to Fox. For his services as such driver Campellone was to receive $1 per hour for the time he worked. At the instigation of the president of The Gagnon Company, Campellone reported to Fox about November 24, 1942, and was informed by the latter that there were three jobs running, one of which was the construction job upon which Metzger and Son, Inc., was the general contractor. Fox gave Campellone his choice to work upon any one of them. The latter chose to drive The Gagnon truck in connection with the Metzger job. At the hearing before respondent Commission, the injured employee, himself, testified that he never received orders from any one connected with or representing J. S. Metzger and Son; that upon only one occasion did an employee of the latter offer any suggestion or direction and that upon that occasion such employee merely stated that no more sand was needed on the Metzger job, but that rock was. The evidence is without contradiction that the injured employee was hired and paid by The Gagnon Company to drive the truck and also to make any necessary repairs thereon. All expenses in the operation of the truck were paid by The Gagnon Company. The employee was injured November 29, 1942. At the time of his injury he was on the public highway repairing the truck driven by him as an employee of The Gagnon Company. He was injured when the hoist gave way and the truck fell onto him. At the time of his injury he was not hauling a load on the Metzger job, and in fact there was no load in the truck. As we view the evidence the injured employee was repairing the truck in compliance with directions and instructions given him by his employer, requiring that he keep the truck in repair. It is noteworthy that the application for adjustment of claim in this proceeding was not filed by the injured employee, but by the president of The Gagnon Company, and its filing was without the consent of the injured employee and against his wishes.

While petitioner challenges the legality of the award made against it upon several grounds, we shall give consideration only to the contention that the record is barren of any substantial evidence to support the finding of respondent Commission that John Campellone was employed by petitioner's assured, J. S. Metzger and Son, as a special employer, and that he sustained injury arising out of and in the course of such employment. This we do because we are persuaded that petitioner's claim in this regard is well taken and determinative of this proceeding.

[1-5] Before liability can attach to one as a special employer, it is necessary that at the time of the accident, the injured employee must have been subject to the direction and control of such special employer. The status of special employer arises from this right to control and direct the activities of the employee. Independence Indemnity Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 203 Cal. 51, 55, 262 P. 757. We fail to find in the record any evidence, substantial or otherwise, that any representative of J. S. Metzger and Son had the right to direct the employee in the work he was doing, either in hauling sand and gravel or in repairing the truck. And certainly there is not a scintilla of evidence that petitioner's assured could have discharged the injured employee, because the latter was employed by, paid by, and subject to the direction and control of The Gagnon Company. So far as we can discern from the record, the only directions given to the truck driver on the Metzger job by the latter or its representatives were as to where the loads were to be hauled. In weighing the control allegedly exercised care must be taken to distinguish between authoritative control and mere suggestion as to detail. To constitute the status of special employer there must be a showing that there was exercise of the right of directing the employee by the alleged special employer as to the manner and method of doing the work, based upon the latter's right to control not only the work to be done but the person engaged in the doing of the work. As was said in Western Indemnity Company v. Pillsbury 172 Cal. 807, 811, 159 P. 721, 723: "The test of 'control,' however, means 'complete control.' * * * 'It is well settled that, where one person is performing work in which another is beneficially interested, the latter may exercise over the former a certain measure of control for a definite and restricted purpose, without incurring the responsibilities, or acquiring the immunities, of a master, with respect to the person controlled.'" (Emphasis added.) And the case of Stacey Brothers Gas Construction Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 197 Cal. 164, 169, 239 P. 1072, 1074, is authority for the statement that in order "to establish the legal relation of special employer and special employee it must appear that either by the terms of the contract or during the course of its performance the employee of the alleged independent contractor came under the control and direction of the other party to the contract, and suffered injury as the result of such direction and control". It seems clear to us from the record in this case that the relation between J. S. Metzger and Son, Inc., and The Gagnon Company was that of independent contractors, Sec. 3353, Labor Code, St.1937, p. 267; and it appears equally clear therefore that the relationship between Metzger and Son, Inc., and the injured employee was that of general contractor and the employee of an independent sub-contractor. The record herein shows that J. S. Metzger and Son was not interested in the slightest degree in the means by which the truck hauling should be done by The Gagnon Company, or in the details of its accomplishment, but was interested only in the final result which was to be attained. And the result was the delivery of sand and rock upon the job, in the construction of which Metzger and Son, Inc., was the general contractor. In the case of Winther v. Industrial Accident Commission, 16 Cal.App.2d 131, 60 P.2d 342, the alleged employer therein exercised considerably more control over the injured employee than is shown in the instant proceeding, yet it was held under the above stated rules that the relationship of employer and employee did not exist, and an award made by the Commission was annulled.

The only semblance of any "control" exercised by Metzger and Son over the injured employee is contained in the testimony of respondent Fox, who testified that he directed the employee John Campellone where to take the truck on the job "on the instructions of the superintendent of Metzger Company", and that similar instructions were given to the truck driver by Metzger and Sons superintendent who, according to the witness Fox, said "take this truck—take this load to the Whittier Ranch, where he previously had instructions to dump it at the Bell Ranch. And I heard him say 'Go to Cabazon, get the load, and dump it here'". But this testimony falls short of establishing that "complete control" which is essential to fasten liability upon J. S. Metzger and Son as a special employer. It in no sense "reaches into the details of performance and reserves to the employer the right to direct the manner in which these details are to be carried out". Winther v. Industrial Accident Commission, supra, at page 136, 60 P.2d at page 345. These "directions" indicate only an interest upon the part of Metzger and Son in the result to be accomplished, and indicate no interest in, or right to direct, the manner and method of doing the work in question.

As we view the evidence in this case, it admits of but one conclusion, and that is that petitioner's assured was the general contractor on a job; respondent John A. Fox was an independent contractor who arranged for trucks with drivers to haul loads on the job, and for which he was to be paid an override on each load so hauled; while the injured employee, John Campellone, was hired by The Gagnon Company, paid by it, and sustained his injury while repairing the truck in conformity with directions given him by his employer, The Gagnon Company, which corporation alone employed him, could alone discharge him, and which alone paid him for his services. Therefore, the conclusion is inescapable that all of the evidence bearing upon the relationship which existed between J. S. Metzger and Son and the injured employee is insufficient to sustain the finding of respondent Commission that petitioner's assured was the special employer of John Campellone, the injured employee.

The foregoing conclusion at which we have arrived renders it unnecessary to consider or decide other questions raised in this proceeding.

The award is annulled.

JACKSON et al. v. UTICA LIGHT & POWER CO. et al.

Civ. 12518.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.

June 15, 1944.

1. Negligence Ⓒ2, 56(1)

In order to constitute "actionable negligence", it is necessary to show a legal duty to use due care, a breach of such duty, and that such breach is proximate cause of resulting injury.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Actionable Negligence".

2. Electricity Ⓒ14(1)

One who owns, maintains, and operates high-voltage power lines is under general legal duty to use due care in construction, maintenance, and operation of such lines so as to avoid injury to persons and property.

3. Electricity Ⓒ19(5)

Evidence that defendant maintained a pole carrying defendant's high-voltage power line and a farmer's telephone line, which pole was so deteriorated that it was weaker than tensile strength of wire, was sufficient to charge defendant with a breach of duty to use due care in construction, maintenance and operation of power line.

4. Negligence Ⓒ136(25)

Whether negligence of a defendant should be held to be proximate cause of injury is ordinarily a question of fact for jury.

5. Negligence Ⓒ59

A defendant's breach of a legal duty may be considered proximate cause of an injury and impose liability upon defendant even though defendant might not have foreseen particular injury which did happen.

6. Electricity Ⓒ19(6)

In action against power company for death by electrocution, when power shovel which decedent was operating came in contact with a charged telephone wire, whether defendant's negligence in maintaining a deteriorated pole which broke and allowed power lines to contact telephone wire was proximate cause of death was for jury, in view of prior notice to defendant of proposed highway construction. St.1937, p. 2560, § 680.

7. Electricity Ⓒ19(12)

Whether plaintiffs' decedent was guilty of contributory negligence in permitting his power shovel to come in contact with telephone wire strung on same poles as defendant's power lines which telephone wire became charged when a pole broke, was for jury.

8. Death Ⓒ58(1)

In determination of question whether plaintiffs' decedent was guilty of contributory negligence, plaintiffs were entitled to benefit of presumption that decedent had used due care for his own safety and had not been guilty of negligence.

9. Electricity Ⓒ15(2)

A power shovel operator, who was electrocuted when shovel came in contact with a telephone wire charged with electricity from defendant's power line, could not be classed as a trespasser against defendant, even if he was a trespasser in his relation to owners of land on which pole was located or as to owners of telephone line.

10. Electricity ⇨15(1)

Power company is not relieved of duty of exercising due care in maintenance of power line even as to a trespasser.

11. Appeal and error ⇨1056(1)

In death action, where decedent's alleged violation of safety order of Industrial Accident Commission relating to operation of power equipment under power lines could not have had any causal connection with decedent's electrocution when power shovel contacted a telephone line across which defendants' power line had fallen when a defective pole broke, refusal to admit safety order in evidence was not prejudicial error.

12. Death ⇨104(2)

In death action in absence of anything in evidence adduced by plaintiffs wholly irreconcilable with exercise of due care on part of decedent, court properly instructed on presumption of due care of a decedent.

13. Trial ⇨260(8)

Where jury was fully and fairly instructed on subjects of negligence and contributory negligence, defendants could not complain of the giving and refusing of various instructions on such subject.

14. Appeal and error ⇨1067

Where refusal to admit safety order of Industrial Accident Commission was not prejudicially erroneous, there was no prejudicial error in refusal to instruct jury with respect to such order.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Ruby Jackson and Harold Jackson, Jr., a minor, by his guardian ad litem, Ruby Jackson, against Utica Light & Power Company, a joint venture association, and Hobart Estate Company, to recover for the wrongful death of Harold Jackson, deceased. From a judgment for plaintiffs and from an order denying defendants' motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Charles V. Barfield, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Blewett & Blewett, of Stockton, and Robert G. Partridge, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SPENCE, Justice.

Plaintiffs, as the surviving wife and minor child of Harold Jackson, deceased, brought this action to recover damages for the death of said deceased. After a trial by jury, judgment was entered upon the verdict in favor of plaintiffs and against defendants in the sum of $20,000. Defendants appeal from said judgment and from the order of denying their motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict.

Deceased was employed by a construction company as a power shovel operator on a project involving the realignment of portions of the state highway in Calaveras County between Angels Camp and San Andreas. On June 19, 1941, he met his death from electrocution while engaged in this employment when his power shovel came in contact with a farmer's telephone wire which was strung upon the same poles as were the high voltage power lines of defendants. There were no eye witnesses to the accident, the deceased having been found dead on the ground near the power shovel shortly after the accident. The sheave at the end of the boom on the power shovel was still in contact with the telephone wire. One of the power poles, owned and maintained by defendants, had broken at the point where the telephone wire cross-arm had been bolted to the pole thereby permitting defendants' high voltage power lines to fall upon the telephone wires. The power pole which had broken was not a pole immediately adjacent to the scene of the accident but was the second pole easterly from the scene. The two power poles immediately adjacent to the scene and the power lines between them remained intact. The power poles were spaced approximately 200 feet apart.

Defendants phrase their main contentions in various ways which may be summarized by stating that the defendants contend that the evidence was insufficient to show actionable negligence on the part of defendants and that the uncontradicted evidence showed that deceased was chargeable with contributory negligence as a matter of law.

[1-3] The essential elements of actionable negligence are set forth in Monroe

v. San Joaquin Light & Power Corp., 42 Cal.App.2d 641, at page 647, 109 P.2d 720, at page 723, as follows: "In order to constitute actionable negligence, it is necessary that the following three elements be present: (1) The legal duty to use due care; (2) a breach of that legal duty; and (3) that such breach is the proximate or legal cause of the resulting injury." There can be no question but that defendants, who admittedly owned, maintained and operated the power lines in question, were under the general legal duty to use due care in the construction, maintenance and operation of said lines so as to avoid injury to persons and property. That legal duty has been defined in numerous authorities. Irelan-Yuba Gold Quartz Min. Co. v. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., 18 Cal.2d 557, 116 P.2d 511; Stasulat v. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., 8 Cal.2d 631, 67 P.2d 678; Anstead v. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., 203 Cal. 634, 265 P. 487; Dow v. Sunset Tel. & Tel. Co., 157 Cal. 182, 106 P. 587; Monroe v. San Joaquin L. & P. Corp., 42 Cal.App.2d 641, 109 P.2d 720; Roberts v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 102 Cal.App. 422, 283 P. 353. Nor can there be any question concerning the sufficiency of the evidence in the present case to show that defendants were chargeable with a breach of that duty.

Plaintiffs alleged in their complaint that: "Said poles and each of them at the said time and place supporting said wires were deteriorated and rotted and weakened and by reason thereof the same and each of them were unsafe * * *." There was an abundance of evidence both oral and by way of photographs to support these allegations with respect to the broken pole. Said pole had been in use for several years in excess of the average life of a wooden pole and it did not appear that it had been inspected in any manner since 1937. It further appeared that such prior inspections as had been made of the poles had been infrequent and casual. The broken pole was described as "riddled with woodpecker holes and dry rot" and "practically nothing remained"; as "deteriorated to where it has no strength in it"; as "one hundred per cent cull, nothing but dry rot"; as "rotted off completely, clear through, and only the stub was holding the pole up"; as "unsafe for many years"; as "so badly attacked by fungi or rot that it had no strength left"; as "very much deteriorated with dry rot and termite holes". A witness for defendants testified that in his opinion, the woodpecker holes "caused the failure of the pole" and he further testified that if prior inspection had disclosed the condition of the pole, it would have been replaced. There was also ample evidence to show that the badly deteriorated condition of the pole could have been seen upon an inspection made from the ground. An electrical expert, called by plaintiffs, testified that proper installation and maintenance of a power line requires that the poles should be stronger than the tensile strength of the wire in order that the pole should be able to withstand the breaking of the wire; and that a pole which is maintained according to common standard practice would not be broken by a pull placed upon a twelve-gauge galvanized iron wire such as was used in the farmers' telephone line which was suspended beneath defendants' high power wires.

In arguing the question of the sufficiency of the evidence defendants lay great stress upon the question of proximate cause. They give their version of how the accident happened, claiming that the pole was broken by reason of the strain placed upon the telephone wire by the power shovel. They then claim that the act of the deceased in permitting the power shovel to come in contact with the telephone wire was the proximate cause of his death and that defendants' negligence was not the proximate cause but was merely "a prior and remote cause which did no more than furnish the condition" which made the injury possible through the intervening act of the deceased. There is no direct evidence as to the exact time or cause of the breaking of the pole. It appears from the evidence that the pole was in such a badly deteriorated condition that it might have broken at any time without the application of any force other than the strain of the wires suspended therefrom; and it further appears that it might have broken at any time from the application of any slight strain placed upon the pole or wires through the application of any external force, animate or inanimate. We will assume, for the purpose of this discussion, that the immediate cause of the breaking of this deteriorated pole was a strain placed upon said pole through the contact of the power shovel with the telephone wire as claimed by defendants. This assumption, however, does not necessarily mean that the negligence of defendants was not the proximate or legal cause of the death of the deceased.

[4,5] The doctrine of "proximate cause" or "causal relation necessary to the existence of liability" is one which has presented some difficulty in its application to cases grounded upon negligence in which an act of the plaintiff or another has intervened in such manner that the intervening act may be said to be immediate cause of the resulting injury. There are many authorities holding that the intervention of such act does not necessarily prevent the negligence of the defendant from being the proximate cause of the resulting injury. Anstead v. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., 203 Cal. 634, 265 P. 487; Emery v. Pacific T. & T. Co., 43 Cal.App.2d 402, 116 P.2d 1079; Monroe v. San Joaquin L. & P. Corp., 42 Cal.App.2d 641, 109 P. 2d 720; Langazo v. San Joaquin L. & P. Corp., 32 Cal.App.2d 678, 90 P.2d 825; McCormick v. Great Western Power Co., 134 Cal.App. 705, 26 P.2d 322; Lim Ben v. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., 101 Cal.App. 174, 281 P. 634; Howell v. San Joaquin L. & P. Co., 87 Cal.App. 44, 261 P. 1107; Carroll v. Central Counties Gas Co., 74 Cal.App. 303, 240 P. 53; Pezzalia v. San Joaquin L. & P. Co., 60 Cal.App. 786, 214 P. 285; Royal Indemnity Co. v. Public Service Corp., 42 Cal.App. 628, 183 P. 960. While the question of whether the negligence of a defendant may be held to be the proximate cause of the injury despite such intervening act is a question of law for the determination of the court (Stasulat v. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., 8 Cal.2d 631, 67 P.2d 678; Stackpole v. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., 181 Cal. 700, 186 P. 354; Hayden v. Paramount Productions, Inc., 33 Cal.App.2d 287, 91 P.2d 231), the foregoing authorities clearly indicate the question of whether the negligence of a defendant should be held to be the proximate cause of the injury is ordinarily a question of fact for the determination of the jury. In discussing the question of proximate cause, the courts frequently employ the expressions "foreseeability", "foreseeableness", "reason to anticipate", "reasonably to be anticipated", "realizable likelihood" and other similar expressions, but it is not always clear whether the reference is to the foreseeability of the type of resulting injury or the foreseeability of the type of act which is the immediate cause of the resulting injury. In the Restatement of the Law of Torts, Sec. 430 et seq., the necessary "causal relation" is said to be determined on the basis of whether defendants' negligence was a "substantial factor in bringing about the harm" (sec. 431; see also sec. 433); and that: "If the actor's conduct is a substantial factor in bringing about harm to another, the fact that the actor neither foresaw nor should have foreseen the extent of the harm or the manner in which it occurred does not prevent him from being liable" (sec. 435). It is there said that if the question of whether defendants' negligence is a "substantial factor" is "open to a reasonable difference of opinion", the question is one for the jury (sec. 434). And even in this state where the test seems to be based generally upon foreseeability, it has been said that a defendant may be liable even though "it might not have foreseen the particular injury which did happen" (Lim Ben v. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., 101 Cal. App. 174, 281 P. 634, 636; Carroll v. Central Counties Gas Co., 74 Cal.App. 303, 307, 240 P. 53), and that it is not necessary that defendant should have been able to anticipate the "precise form of the consequential injury" (Rocca v. Tuolumne County Elec. Power & Light Co., 76 Cal. App. 569, 583, 245 P. 468, 473) or the "precise accident". Royal Indemnity Corp. v. Public Service Corp., 42 Cal.App. 628, 635, 183 P. 960.

[6] The discussion of the question of proximate cause in the present case requires the statement of further facts. The pole line at the scene of the accident did not follow the curve of the original highway but cut across a field in approximately a straight line along the new right of way which had been acquired to straighten the highway at that point. The poles in the vicinity of the scene of the accident were approximately 50 feet distant from the original highway. These poles varied in height from 25 to 35 feet. The upper cross-arms of the poles carried defendants' high voltage power lines while the lower cross-arms, which were several feet below, carried the telephone wires. These telephone wires sagged between the poles and were about 12 feet below the power lines and about the same distance above the ground at the scene of the accident. The telephone wires were not dangerous to human life and could be safely touched with bare hands.

Defendants stress the fact that the poles at this point were removed some distance from the original highway and were "far from any danger of collision from traffic on the highway". They further stress the fact that no evidence was introduced to show that the ground immediately under the power line at this point "was ever used by vehicles or agricultural implements or machinery". They therefore contend that defendants "could not reasonably be required to anticipate" that the poles would be subjected to a strain such as they claim was caused by the contact of the power shovel with the telephone wire. It appears unnecessary to discuss the question of what defendants could have reasonably been required to anticipate prior to the time that they received notice on January 11, 1941, that construction work was about to be started on the highway project. That notice was received over five months before the date of the accident, which was June 19, 1941. The letter from the Division of Highways of the Department of Public Works of the State of California called attention to the proposed project, enclosed copies of other letters and stated: "We are forwarding to you under separate cover a set of layout plans showing poles belonging to your company that will have to be moved in order to clear our right of way * * *. As this project will be under construction at an early date, we would appreciate having you proceed to move your facilities at once." At the conclusion of the letter, it was stated: "As we expect to have this road under construction at an early date, your attention to this matter will be appreciated." The highway project had been contemplated for several years, some of the rights of way having been acquired as early as 1936, but the contract for the work was not let until the latter part of May 1941 and the work was not actually commenced until June 8, 1941. Despite the notice contained in the above mentioned letter of January 11, 1941, there is no evidence to show that defendants inspected their poles or removed them or that they did anything in response to said notice until a few days prior to the accident when they started the removal of some of the poles. At that time, the employees of defendants saw the deceased operating the power shovel along the new right of way in the general vicinity of the accident and along the line of the power poles.

Defendants state that there is no evidence that defendants were notified to move the pole line "within a specified time" as provided by section 680 of the Streets and Highways Code, St.1937, p. 2560. It may be conceded that the above quoted letter did not fix a specified time for removal of the poles but we are not dealing with the sufficiency of the letter as a notice requiring removal under said code section. The letter was obviously sufficient to put defendants upon notice that construction work would be commenced at an early date and that road building equipment would be used in this work along the new right of way. From the time of receiving that letter, it was as foreseeable that the poles and wires along the new right of way might be subjected to strains from vehicles and other equipment as it was foreseeable that poles and wires along the original highway or in fields where agricultural implements were customarily used might be subjected to such strains. We are therefore of the opinion that, under the authorities cited above, the question of whether the negligence of the defendants was the proximate cause of the death of the deceased was a question of fact and that the trial court properly left that question to the determination of the jury.

Defendants cite and rely upon Stasulat v. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., 8 Cal.2d 631, 67 P.2d 678; Stackpole v. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., 181 Cal. 700, 186 P. 354, and Hayden v. Paramount Productions, Inc., 33 Cal. App.2d 287, 91 P.2d 231, in all of which cases the question of proximate cause was held to be one of law rather than of fact. We believe these cases are all distinguishable upon their facts and that the basis of these decisions is explained in the reasoning found on pages 636 to 638 of 8 Cal.2d, 67 P.2d on pages 681, 682, of the Stasulat case. It was there recognized on page 638 of 8 Cal.2d, 67 P.2d on page 682, that "as a general rule, the question whether the original negligence is a proximate cause of the injury is one of fact for the jury" but it was held that there was no evidence to show that the intervening act "was an act which should reasonably have been foreseen and anticipated."

[7,8] We find no merit in defendants' contention that deceased was chargeable with contributory negligence as a matter of law. We may still assume, as claimed by defendants, that the immediate cause of the breaking of the deteriorated pole was a strain placed thereon through contact of the power shovel with the telephone wire. The evidence showed, however, that this apparently harmless telephone wire was suspended approximately 12 feet from the ground at the scene of the accident and that the power shovel was working over rolling, uneven ground in that vicinity. It is true, as stated by defendants, that the evidence showed that the power shovel, while being operated by deceased, had come in contact with the telephone wire on two previous occasions on the same day, on which occasions another employee of the construction company had lifted the telephone wire over the boom. We are of the opinion, however, that the question of whether deceased was chargeable with negligence in bringing the power shovel in contact with the telephone wire was a question of fact for the jury and that in the determination of this question, plaintiffs were entitled to the benefit of the presumption that the deceased had used due care for his own safety and had not been guilty of negligence. Westberg v. Wille, 14 Cal.2d 360, 94 P.2d 590; Eastman v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co., 51 Cal.App.2d 653, 125 P.2d 564; Gregg v. Manufacturers' Bldg. Corp., 134 Cal.App. 147, 25 P.2d 1014.

[9, 10] In the discussion of the question of actionable negligence, defendants contend that deceased was a trespasser upon defendants' power line and that defendants were therefore under no legal duty to exercise due care with respect to deceased as such trespasser. It is a sufficient answer to this contention to state that if deceased could be classed as a trespasser in his relationship to the owners of the land or in his relationship to the owners of the telephone line, he was not a trespasser upon defendants' power line and could not therefore be classed as a trespasser in his relationship to defendants. Even assuming that deceased could be classed as a trespasser in his relationship to others, defendants were not thereby relieved of the duty of exercising due care toward him in the maintenance of their power line. Roberts v. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., 102 Cal.App. 422, 283 P. 353; Langazo v. San Joaquin L. & P. Co., 32 Cal.App.2d 678, 90 P.2d 825.

[11] Defendants further contend that the trial court erred in refusing to admit in evidence a safety order of the Industrial Accident Commission, which order prohibited the operation of equipment under high voltage lines when it was possible to bring such equipment within six feet of such high voltage wires. We are of the opinion that there was no prejudicial error in the ruling of the trial court. There was no evidence to show that the power shovel, or any part thereof, was ever brought within six feet of the high voltage lines and the mere fact that it could have been brought within that distance, although it was not, could not have had any causal connection with the happening of the accident.

[12-14] Defendants further contend that the trial court erred in giving and refusing of various instructions. Defendants first claim that it was error to give any instructions on the presumption of due care on the part of the deceased. They cite Engstrom v. Auburn Auto. Sales Corp., 11 Cal.2d 64, 77 P.2d 1059, and claim that any such presumption was dispelled by the evidence adduced by plaintiffs. We find nothing in that testimony, however, which is "wholly irreconcilable" with the exercise of due care on the part of the deceased and therefore find no error in the giving of said instructions. Defendant also complains of an instruction to the effect that deceased was not a trespasser. We have heretofore discussed the subject of the status of deceased in his relationship to defendants and do not believe that any claim of error may be predicated upon the giving of the challenged instruction. Defendants also complain of the giving and refusing of various instructions on negligence and contributory negligence but a reading of the instructions as a whole shows that the jury was fully and fairly instructed on these subjects. Defendants also complain of the refusal to give an instruction based upon the above mentioned safety order of the Industrial Accident Commission. As we have heretofore expressed the view that there was no prejudicial error in refusing to admit said safety order in evidence, it follows that there was no prejudicial error in the refusal to instruct the jury with respect thereto.

The judgment and order denying defendants' motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict are affirmed.

KNIGHT, Justice.

The defendant corporation, Sleepy Hollow Investment Co., was engaged in the business of purchasing and selling real property, and had secured an option to purchase, with power to sell, a large tract of land in Marin County belonging to West Coast Life Insurance Company. The plaintiffs, Smith brothers, alleging that on April 6, 1943, defendant entered into a contract with them for the sale to them of 1100 acres of the tract, brought this action for the specific performance of the alleged contract. The defendant denied that any contract of purchase and sale had ever been entered into between the parties, and the trial court found in defendant's favor on that controlling issue. Accordingly judgment was entered for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal.

[1] The evidence supports the trial court's finding. The following are the facts: Plaintiffs were dairymen, and through a real estate broker named Grandi had been seeking to buy some 1000 acres of the property. The date fixed for the expiration of defendant's option to purchase the property from the owner was April 30, 1943; and Grandi had submitted a verbal, unauthorized offer on behalf of plaintiffs to purchase 1100 acres of the tract at $36 an acre, making a total purchase price of $39,600. On April 3rd, at a meeting of the directors of the defendant corporation, at which Samuel Gardiner, one of the directors and the attorney for the corporation, was present, Grandi's informal offer was reported to the board by George J. Kaenel, the president of the corporation. At the same meeting the board authorized Kaenel to sell 500 acres of the property to one A. J. Raisch; but his authority to close this deal was limited to 48 hours from and after 5 o'clock April 3, 1943; and the board voted to accept the Smith brothers' offer if the Raisch transaction was not carried through within the limited time. The sale was not made to Raisch, and on April 5, 1943, Kaenel instructed Gardiner to submit to plaintiffs a proposition for the sale to them of the property. That offer was addressed to Grandi, and read as follows:

"April 5, 1943.

"F. Lloyd Grandi:

"Smith Bros. proposal is very nearly satisfactory. We now have a definite authorization from the Board of Directors upon which we can close. I must limit your time to accept to 12 Noon tomorrow, because we are also close to agreement with another party and want to negotiate with him if we do not close with you by tomorrow noon.

"We offer to sell 1085 acres of ranch surrounding Sleepy Hollow Golf course, plus 15 acres off the top of the strip above the driving range, for $39,000.00 net to us, subject to the following:

"1. Right of way to 70 acre flat shall be reasonably and conveniently located, but exact location to be chosen by us, 40' right of way with joint user by ourselves and others.

"2. Flow of water from spring on ranch is reserved for one inch pipe. May be used both in Club House and elsewhere. To be terminated as soon as practicable. Right to maintain dam and storage facilities in meantime.

"3. No right of way to be allowed along roadway past Club House. This tract will be sold or used for residence purposes hence ranch use of that part of road will not be possible.

"4. Portions to be bought by Smith Bros., to be fenced in cattle proof manner within reasonable time. Details to be worked out later.

"Samuel W. Gardiner."

The offer as thus submitted by Gardiner was not acceptable to plaintiffs, and the next day, April 6, plaintiffs and Grandi met Gardiner in the latter's office, and after some discussion a counter offer was made by plaintiff. It was reduced to writing by Gardiner, typed in his office, signed by plaintiffs, and is the basis of the present action. It reads as follows (italics ours):

"April 6, 1943.

"Sleepy Hollow Investment Company:

"We hereby offer to buy 1085 acres of ranch surrounding Sleepy Hollow Golf Course plus 15 acres off the top of the strip above the driving range for the gross price of $39,000.00 subject to the following:

"(1) We are to have a 40 foot right-of-way from Butterfield Road directly to the 70 acre flat to the north. We understand that this right-of-way will be for the joint use of ourselves and others and that its exact location is to be chosen by yourselves within a reasonable time.

"(2) We are to have a right-of-way from Butterfield Road south to the 120 acre tract and this also is to be for the joint use of ourselves and others and the exact location is to be chosen by you within a reasonable time.

"(3) We understand that we are to have no right-of-way past the Club House along the present used roadway as you are selling that area for residential purposes.

"(4) You are to have the right to use the present spring on the property being sold to us and to impound water at the spring and to take from that, over a reasonable course, a one inch pipe and you are to have the flow which will be required to fill this pipe. However, it is understood that this water right is temporary and is to cease six months after the cessation of hostilities. You shall have the right to maintain the dam and the pipeline in the meantime. It is understood that this is to be used primarily for the Club House and for other domestic purposes. So far as it is used for gardens, only surplus water shall be used.

"(5) Boundary lines for fence are to be designated by you from time to time at our request.

"(6) Title is to be delivered by you to us within ninety days from date, satisfactory to title company and subject to its issuance of title policy to us without exceptions.

"Zekie Smith
"Sam Smith"

To the foregoing counter offer, Gardiner attached and signed the following (italics ours):

"To the extent of my authority, I accept the foregoing proposition on behalf of Sleepy Hollow Investment Company. There are some slight changes in the foregoing memorandum and I will therefore have to get specific authority as to those alterations but I believe the proposition to be acceptable.

"Dated: April 6, 1943

"Samuel W. Gardiner"

Thereafter the following was added and signed by Grandi:

"I agree to accept as a commission in full on the above transaction, the sum of $600.00.

"Dated, April 6, 1943.

"F. Lloyd Grandi."

At the time of the signing of the foregoing instrument plaintiffs gave Gardiner a check for $1,000 as a down payment on the purchase price; and while the instrument was being typed Grandi suggested to Gardiner that he telephone some of the other directors to ascertain whether the changes were satisfactory; and Gardiner attempted to do so. He first called Kaenel and another director, but they were not in; he then talked to another director named Main, who apparently was agreeable, but Gardiner did not discuss the details of the changes with him. Later that day Kaenel met Sam Smith on the street, and congratulated him on buying the property. But on April 8, 1943, defendant's board of directors met and rejected the counter offer of April 6, 1943, and thereafter sold the property to other purchasers.

[2, 3] It will be noted that the conditions above italicized in the Smith brothers' counter offer of April 6th were not contained in the offer submitted by Gardiner on April 5th; and it will be noted also from the italicized portions of the memorandum signed by Gardiner and attached to the Smith brothers' counter offer of April 6th that it was not an unqualified acceptance of the counter offer; but that it was expressly stated therein by Gardiner that his authority to accept the Smith brothers' offer was limited, and that because of the "changes" made therein it would be necessary to obtain "specific authority" from the company. Moreover, Gardiner testified that he told plaintiffs that he only had the express authorization contained in the April 5th letter; that he could not accept plaintiffs' counter offer unqualifiedly on behalf of the corporation on account of the changes therein; that he did not intend to get himself into difficulty and therefore could not accept the proposition unconditionally. His testimony in this regard was contradicted by the plaintiffs; but the conflict was one to be resolved by the trial court. The foregoing evidence obviously supports the trial court's findings that Gardiner's authority to act for the corporation was limited to the terms of the offer submitted by him on April 5th, and that he was not authorized to make a sale under the terms set out in the Smith brothers' counter offer of April 6th; and that Gardiner did not inform plaintiffs that he had the authority to accept the offer made by them on April 6th.

Plaintiffs argue that variances between the Gardiner offer of April 5th and their counter offer of April 6th were matters of mere detail and that therefore, since Gardiner was authorized to make the sale under the April 5th offer, he was authorized to accept the counter offer made on April 6th. But a comparison of the two offers will not sustain this view. First, the price is different. The original offer was to sell for a net price of $39,000, and the counter offer was to buy for a gross price of $39,000, the difference being that in the first, the plaintiffs were to pay the real estate commission, whereas in the second defendant would have to pay it. Then in the April 6th offer, plaintiffs asked for an additional right of way, not provided for in the offer of April 5th. The provision for defendant's use of the water, instead of being terminated "as soon as practicable" was changed to "six months after the cessation of hostilities" and the provision for use of only surplus water for garden purposes was added. And, in the April 5th offer, the property was to be fenced in a cattle proof manner within a reasonable time; but in the April 6th offer it was provided that the boundary lines for the fence were to be designated by defendants, which would involve a survey of the land. And finally, the last provision relating to the delivery of the title was added. These changes were sufficiently material to support the finding that the Smith brothers' offer of April 6th constituted a counter offer, and since there was not an unqualified acceptance thereof by Gardiner, and it was afterwards rejected by the corporation, there was no meeting of the minds, nor any clear mutual understanding or positive assent on the part of plaintiffs and the corporation which is necessary in order to constitute a binding contract between the parties.

Nor in the state of the evidence can plaintiffs rely upon the doctrine of ostensible authority on the part of Gardiner, for the reason that the qualifying language used by him in the memorandum attached to the Smith brothers' counter offer completely negatives any such theory. Furthermore, the situation is not changed by the fact that the other directors did not deny Gardiner's authority to close the deal, because admittedly those other directors at that time were not fully informed of all the details of the changes made in plaintiffs' proposition; and the evidence shows that Kaenel later strenuously objected for one thing to having to designate where the cattle fences were to be put because it would involve the expense of having a survey made.

The conclusions reached on these controlling issues make it unnecessary to discuss the other points raised by the appellants.

The judgment is affirmed.

DORAN, Justice.

Petitioner had been found guilty of two separate offenses, to wit, assault, after a trial by jury in a criminal action wherein, by indictment, defendant was accused in several counts with the crime of murder and assault with a deadly weapon with intent to commit murder. Judgment of six months in the county jail was pronounced, in two counts, said judgments to run consecutively. While serving the sentence defendant escaped from the road camp. Later arrested and charged with escape, defendant was adjudged guilty. Application for probation followed and on the day appointed for disposing of said matter, to wit, May 13, 1943, the court made and entered the following order: "It is ordered that proceedings herein be suspended and the defendant is granted probation for a period of one year under the following conditions: Defendant must serve the first year of his probationary period in the County Jail with no good time allowed. This jail term as a condition of probation is ordered to run consecutively with the sentence which defendant is now serving in County Jail."

It is petitioner's contention that the period of probation expired in one year from May 13, 1943, after which time, it is argued, the court was without power to enforce any condition whatsoever, hence the imprisonment is illegal.

Respondent argues as follows: "The order of the trial court in placing petitioner on probation is not as clear and explicit as it should be, but considering all the facts and circumstances before the court at the time the order was made, it is obvious that the court intended to place the petitioner on probation for a period of one year; that as a condition of probation the petitioner serve one year in the County Jail; that the period of probation and imprisonment as a condition thereof was to commence at the expiration of the sentence he was then serving."

[1-3] There can be no question as to the clarity of respondent's argument; nor can there be any question as to the clarity of the law. The power of the court with regard to probation is strictly statutory. Section 1203.1 of the Penal Code provides that: "The court, judge or justice thereof, in the order granting probation, may suspend the imposing, or the execution of the sentence and may direct that such suspension may continue for such period of time not exceeding the maximum possible term of such sentence * * * provided, however, that upon the payment of any fine imposed and the fulfillment of all conditions of probation, probation shall cease at the end of the term of probation, or sooner, in the event of modification." (Italics added) But nowhere in the law is the court empowered to impose conditions that cannot be fulfilled and satisfied within the limit of the period of time fixed by the court as the term of probation; indeed Section 1203.3 of the Penal Code provides: "The court shall have authority at any time during the term of probation to revoke, modify, or change its order of suspension of imposition or execution of sentence. It may at any time when the ends of justice will be subserved thereby, and when the good conduct and reform of the person so held on probation shall warrant it, terminate the period of probation and discharge the person so held, but no such order shall be made without written notice first given by the court or the clerk thereof to the proper probation officer of the intention to revoke, modify, or change its order, and in all cases, if the court has not not seen fit to revoke the order of probation and impose sentence or pronounce judgment, the defendant shall at the end of the term of probation or any extension thereof, be by the court discharged subject to the provisions of these sections." (Italics added)

The court's order is perfectly clear; the law also is clear, by virtue of which petitioner is entitled to be discharged, and, it is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. AVERY.

Cr. 3777.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 3, California.

June 14, 1944.

Hearing Denied July 10, 1944.

1. Criminal law ⇨1167(2)

An error in the joinder of several charges in one information is one of procedure, not of jurisdiction, and does not justify a reversal unless defendant was prejudiced. Pen.Code, § 954.

2. Indictment and information ⇨130

Charges of rape and attempted rape were properly included in separate counts in a single information, since those offenses belong to the same class of crimes. Pen. Code, § 954.

3. Indictment and information ⇨130

Five charges of robbery of different persons were properly included in separate counts in a single information, since an offense of the same class was charged in each count. Pen.Code, § 954.

4. Criminal law ⇨1167(2)

In prosecution for robbery of five persons and for rape or attempted rape of the same persons, joinder of the ten charges in one information was not prejudicial, where evidence required to establish charges of robbery was also required to establish the rape charges. Pen.Code, § 954.

5. Rape ⇨51(7)

Robbery ⇨24(3)

In prosecution for rape, attempted rape and robbery involving five different victims, evidence established defendant's identity, notwithstanding discrepancies in testimony of victims on question of whether their assailant had a mustache.

6. Criminal law ⇨338(1)

Where victim of rape and robbery, who had failed to identify defendant at a line-up at one station but was later positive in her identification, was cross-examined with regard to whether she discussed her case with other witnesses whom she met at a line-up at another station, and denied having discussed the matter at that time, there was no error in sustaining objection to subsequent question as to when she did discuss it with those other people.

7. Witnesses ⇨281

In prosecution for rape and robbery, where victim had denied discussing her case with other witnesses on one particular occasion, question on cross-examination as to when she did discuss it with those people was improper because it assumed, in the absence of evidence thereof, that victim had discussed the occurrence with such people.

8. Bail ⇨42

Under statute authorizing court in its discretion, at any time after appearance for trial of defendant who has given bail, to order defendant committed and held in custody, trial judge was authorized to remand defendant to custody of sheriff during course of trial for robbery and rape. Pen.Code, § 1129.

9. Criminal law ⇨824(7)

The court on its own motion should instruct jury with respect to rules of law prescribed by the Code, such as necessity for corroboration of the testimony of an accomplice.

10. Criminal law §768(1)

Ordinarily, the trial judge is under no duty to instruct jury that testimony of certain witnesses should be examined with caution.

11. Criminal law §824(10)

In prosecution for robbery and rape with defense of alibi, failure of court, without request, to give cautionary instruction with regard to testimony of prosecution witnesses was not prejudicial.

12. Criminal law §763(13)

In prosecution for robbery and rape, there was no error in court's failure, without request, to instruct that identification from appearance was entirely a matter of opinion and that identification of defendant as person seen on one occasion is not rendered more trustworthy by another witness' opinion that he was person seen on another occasion, since such an instruction would be an invasion of jury's province.

13. Criminal law §1173(3)

Failure of court to instruct that it was necessary for jury to agree on defendant's guilt as to each count was not reversible error where, as to each verdict, jurors answered affirmatively question as to whether that was their verdict.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harold B. Landreth, Judge.

Ralph Tom Avery was convicted under an indictment charging robbery, rape and attempted rape. From the judgment of conviction and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant appeals.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Leola Buck Kellogg, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., and David K. Lener, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

BISHOP, Justice pro tem.

Feeling aggrieved at a judgment of conviction, based on ten verdicts of guilty, and at his inability to obtain a new trial, the defendant has appealed. He finds fault with the scope of the information and criticizes a ruling on the admission of evidence and the silence of the instructions on three matters. The limits of the defendant's attack upon the sufficiency of the evidence are fairly presented in these words taken from his closing brief: "The defendant had and has no occasion to challenge the claims that the crimes charged were committed by some man or by several different men. His primary interest lay and lies in proving the negatives, that he was not present. In addition to his clear evidence of alibi, he greatly relies on the fact that there was no legally sufficient proof that he was present on any of these occasions." We shall find that the evidence abundantly supports the conclusion that the defendant was the assailant present on every occasion charged, and that no error occurred which would justify a reversal of either the judgment or order appealed from.

Defendant argues that the information joined offenses which were of different classes and not connected in their commission, with the result that the trial court lacked jurisdiction and that he was denied a fair trial. There were, we find, ten counts in the information. Count I charged that the defendant had, on June 1, 1943, robbed victim one, and in Count II it was alleged that on the same first day of June he had raped her. Counts III and IV gave June 3, 1943, as the date when the defendant attempted to rape victim two and did rob her. On June 20, 1943, according to Counts V and VI, he attempted to rape victim three and successfully robbed her. Attempts to rape and rob victim four on June 24, 1943, were set forth in Counts VII and VIII, while similar offenses, in which victim five was the object, occurring on July 9, 1943, were charged in Counts IX and X.

[1-4] If it was error to join these several charges in one information, the error was one of procedure, not of jurisdiction, and does not justify a reversal unless it resulted in prejudice to the defendant. People v. Duane, 1942, 21 Cal.2d 71, 78, 130 P.2d 123, 127. Whether or not the procedure was technically wrong depends upon the interpretation to be placed upon these provisions of section 954, Penal Code: "An * * * information * * * may charge two or more different offenses connected together in their commission, or different statements of the same offense or two or more different offenses of the same class of crimes or offenses, under separate counts * * *." The five charges of rape and attempted rape were properly included in a single information, for plainly they belong to the same class of crimes. See People v. Warriner, 1918, 37 Cal.App. 107, 108, 173 P. 489, 490; People v. Thorn, 1934, 138 Cal.App. 714, 734, 33 P.2d 5, 15. The same is true of the five counts of robbery and attempted robbery. People v. Duane, supra, 21 Cal.2d 71, 76, 130 P.2d 123, 126. Each of the offenses of the robbery class was connected in its commission with one of the offenses of the rape class. The combination of these ten charges in one information may not have been authorized by the letter of section 954, but it neither violated the spirit of the section nor deprived the defendant of a fair trial. Had the rape and attempted rape charges been embraced in their own information, upon the trial the evidence would not have differed in any material way from that before us, for the force and fear involved in each rape charge either began in and continued over from the corresponding robberies or they were common to both offenses. Nor does it appear at all likely that the defendant was found guilty of any of the robbery charges because of the further facts brought out in support of the rape accusations. We do not consider the case of People v. Duane, supra (with its seven separately charged offenses, consisting of three separate robberies, three kidnappings with intent to rob, and an assault with force and violence with intent to rob), as an authority that the procedure in this case was entirely authorized by the statute. However, it strongly supports our conclusion that we should not reverse this case, for it appears to us that defendant Avery, like defendant Duane, was not prejudiced by the procedure followed.

[5] The question just discussed and two or three other procedural errors, which the defendant claims are revealed by the record, involve, to a greater or less degree, the contentions that the evidence either fails to link the defendant with the ten offenses of which he was found guilty or that at best the links are weak. We find the evidence so sufficient that the contention, that it is not, does not merit a recital of the testimony of the five victims. Each stated that she was face to face with her assailant under conditions when his face could be observed; it was observed; the assailant, in each instance, was identified as the defendant. In support of the claim that the identifications are doubtful, attention is called to the facts that the June 1 victim described the defendant as clean shaven; on June 3, he had a mustache; on June 20, and June 24, he was without one; while his fifth victim discerned one forming a very, very light line on July 9. At the time of the trial his mustache was "flourishing," according to victim five, as compared with what it was when he attacked her. The mustache that the defendant wore at the time of the trial was described for the record by the trial judge as a "thin black mustache, probably an inch and a half from one extremity to the other * * * I can't tell the shape of his mustache from here." Such a mustache, obviously, could come and go from day to day without casting a shadow of doubt upon the positive character of the identification made by each of defendant's victims.

We find, then, the evidence of identification to be strong and the several grounds of appeal, dependent on its weakness, to be correspondingly lacking in force. This is certainly true of the criticism made of the court's action in sustaining an objection to a question asked of victim two, during her cross-examination. It had been developed that the witness had been present at a line-up at the Central Station, but had not identified the defendant, and that she and two unidentified women had been taken to another line-up at the University Station. Then the trial continued:

"Q. Now, at the University Station you met some of the other witnesses in this case? A. I did not know they were at that time. There was two other ladies there in the car, we all three went into the station with the officers.

"Q. Did you discuss this matter with the ladies? A. I beg pardon, sir?

"Q. Did you discuss your case with these other women? A. Just the neighborhood in which we lived, we remarked about how close we all lived together. That was all that was remarked.

"Q. And did you talk to them about what happened to you that evening? A. Not at the time, no, sir.

"Q. I beg your pardon? A. Not at the time, no, sir.

"Q. Not at that time? A. No, sir.

"Q. Well, when did you discuss it with these other people?

"Mr. Johnson: I object to that as irrelevant and immaterial, having no bearing upon the case at all.

"The Court: The objection is sustained.

"Q. By Mr. Solomon: By the way, was there any money in the pocketbook that was taken from you? A. As I recall, there was about 41 cents."

[6,7] Extravagant claims are made of the prejudice of the ruling. "Clearly something happened" between the first line-up, when "identification of this defendant failed" and that at the University Station, "after photographs showing the defendant with a mustache were exhibited to the identifiers," the intimation being that the "something" was a get-together of the victims. We think it is clear that defendant's present counsel, who did not represent him at the trial, takes a present view of the unanswered question entirely out of focus with that prevalent at the trial. The different result of the two line-ups was due, it was quite obvious, to the fact that at the time of the first, June 4, the defendant was not present to be identified; he was still at large. Moreover, victim two had been quite positive in her identification: "I would know him at any place because his face was within 2 inches of mine. I couldn't mistake him, he was directly in the light." And lastly, there was no evidence that she had seen any picture of the defendant at any time. If, as defendant's present counsel would have us believe, the question had a significance not apparent when asked, it should have been pointed out to the trial court. We do not consider it to have been error for the trial court to have sustained an objection to the question, under the circumstances. Moreover the ruling is defensible on the ground that the question assumed a fact not in evidence, that is, that victim two ever had discussed what happened to her with "these other people."

[8] The next "error" to which the defendant points critically, was the action of the trial judge remanding the defendant to the custody of the sheriff during the course of the trial, shortly after the defense began to put on its case. In justification of his act the trial judge referred to section 1129 of the Penal Code, reading: "When a defendant who has given bail appears for trial, the court may, in its discretion, at any time after his appearance for trial, order him to be committed to the custody of the proper officer of the county, to abide the judgment or further order of the court, and he must be committed and held in custody accordingly." We are of the opinion that the constitutionality of the section is not open to debate before us (see People v. Dysart, 1940, 39 Cal.App.2d 287, 289, 102 P.2d 1091, 1092, and cases cited), and unquestionably by its terms it authorized the action taken by the trial court. The action was taken after the jury had departed, at the close of a day's session, and so far as appears there was nothing consequent upon it that prejudiced the defendant with the jury. The evil that the defendant sees in the very act of depriving an accused of his liberty on bail during the course of his trial, is implicit in the Code section, itself, which expresses a public policy determined by the Legislature, and which is not to be used as an excuse for reversing a judgment.

[9-11] Defendant's remaining contentions center around three instructions which were not given—nor requested. "It is incumbent upon a court in a criminal case" we find it said in People v. Putnam, 1942, 20 Cal.2d 885, 890, 129 P.2d 367, 369, 370, "to instruct the jury of its own motion, charging them fully and fairly upon the law relating to the facts of the case." It is quite clear that this should be so with respect to such rules of law as the necessity for corroboration of the testimony of an accomplice, that is, rules of law prescribed by the Code and of which it is not to be presumed that a lay jury would have knowledge. When we get into the field where the instruction is one dependent not upon any statutory provision, but upon human experience, a field in which the jury is supposed to be on familiar ground, ordinarily the trial judge is under no duty to instruct the jury that the testimony of certain witnesses should be examined with caution. However, attention is called to People v. Putnam, supra, 20 Cal.2d 885, 889, 129 P.2d 367, 369, and People v. Trumbo, 1943, 60 Cal.App.2d 681, 688, 141 P.2d 225, 228, where judgments of conviction were reversed because the trial court failed of its own motion to give a cautionary instruction to the effect that a charge of a sex offense is one easily made and difficult to disprove and that the testimony of the prosecution witness should be examined with caution. These cases give recognition, however, to the principle that the circumstances of each case must determine whether the failure to give a precautionary instruction was prejudicial, and under the circumstances of this case the trial court's failure to give the unrequested instruction was clearly not prejudicial. This is so because, as already noted, the defendant does not question the veracity of the five victims in their accounts of what happened to them, and as we review their testimony there appears no cause to believe that any part of these accounts was invented. Defendant's difficulty was not enhanced by the nature of the charges against him; he had the difficulty faced by any defendant whose position is, not that a crime was not committed, but that he was not the guilty one. We have no hesitancy in concluding that the defendant was not prejudiced by the court's failure to give the jury the cautionary instruction, not requested.

[12] Nor are we of the opinion that the defendant was entitled to the second unrequested instruction, of whose absence complaint is now made—in these words: "it was vitally necessary to point out to the jury that identification from appearance is entirely a matter of opinion, belief, impression or judgment of a witness that the defendant is the same person seen by the witness on a previous occasion and that this being true the opinion of one witness that the defendant is the man she saw on one occasion could not as a matter of law be rendered more trustworthy by the opinion of another witness that he is the man the second witness saw on an unrelated occasion." Such an instruction would be an invasion of the jury's province. We are aware of no history of erroneous convictions which warrants the conclusion that unless told what to do, respecting the subject matters covered by the quotation just made from defendant's brief, a jury is likely to err.

[13] The last ground of appeal to engage our attention is the claim that the jury should have been instructed that it was necessary for them to agree on the defendant's guilt as to each count before they found him guilty of that count. The reporter's transcript before us affirmatively shows that a separate, signed, verdict of guilty was rendered as to each of the ten counts, and that as to each verdict all the jurors answered affirmatively this question: "Is this your verdict, so say you one, so say you all?" The failure of the court to instruct the jury to do the very thing they did do, is not a ground upon which a reversal may be based.

The judgment of conviction and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

Contractor engaged in erecting building did not owe roofer employed by subcontractor same duty to make premises safe that contractor owed to its own employees, since relationship of roofer to contractor was that of a "business visitor" or "invitee."

Where roofer employed by subcontractor was injured while working on roof of building under construction, by fall through open skylight, general contractor was not liable for injuries sustained, where roofer did not show violation of any duty owed by general contractor to him.

6. Negligence Ⓒ124(1)

In roofer's action against general contractor for injuries sustained when he fell through open skylight on roof of building under construction, safety order of Industrial Accident Commission requiring contractor to cover and guard floor openings within building during construction of building were properly excluded.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Elmer E. Robinson, Judge.

Action by John T. Hill against Eaton & Smith, a copartnership, and others for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff while working on roof of building. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Robert G. Partridge, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Bronson, Bronson & McKinnon, of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiff appeals from a judgment of nonsuit. His action for damages for personal injuries was filed against Eaton & Smith, who were the general contractors engaged in erecting the building upon which plaintiff was injured. The building comprised a number of units, each unit forming a separate airplane hanger. At the time of his injury plaintiff was employed by the Alta Roofing Co., who had subcontracted to place a roof upon the building. There is no real dispute as to the facts.

Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, he had proved at the time of nonsuit that he was injured during his employment by the Alta Roofing Co. and that at the time of his injury he was doing his work according to the customary procedure and was an experienced roofer. Plaintiff was injured while engaged in laying base sheets which were 40' long and 32" wide and weighed 55 lbs. to the 100 square feet. The strips were composed of rags, asbestos, asphalt and cowhair and were about 1/8" thick. The roof was longer than the strips and they had to be pieced. The men worked in pairs in placing the strips in position and plaintiff was working on the ridge of the building which slanted toward the valley in which the helper was working. It is plaintiff's contention that he was pulling against the strip to place it in position, which is the standard practice in laying the strips, when the strip tore and he tumbled backwards some 5 or 6 feet into the opening of an open skylight, and onto the concrete floor below, inflicting injury upon himself. The skylight, which was approximately 7' by 12' was not protected in any way while the roofers were working.

The wooden decks of these roofs were constructed by carpenters in the employ of the defendant and contained a row of skylights. As the skylight openings were made they were covered with heavy wire mesh by defendant's employees, but as each roof was completed, as to the wooden deck, the defendant's employees moved the coverings. These wire meshes extended about two feet over the openings and had to be removed before the base sheets were laid. In putting on the base sheet and the hot asphalt the employees of the Alta Roofing Company would fold the base sheet over the place of the skylight, thus making it difficult to provide any protection for the opening.

[1] Since plaintiff was the employee of the subcontractor, his relationship to the contractor was that of a business visitor or invitee. Dingman v. A. F. Mattock Co., 15 Cal.2d 622, 104 P.2d 26. Defendant, however, was not the employer of plaintiff and did not owe him the same duty to make the premises safe that an employer owes to an employee.

In attempting to prove that defendant violated his duty of care toward plaintiff, the latter has cited a number of cases in which either an affirmative act was done by the invitor or in which the danger in or upon the premises, which caused the injury, was latent and was not known to the invitee, and either was, or should have been, known to the invitor. Crane v. Smith, 23 Cal.2d 288, 144 P.2d 356; McCready v. Southern Pac. Co., 9 Cir., 26 F.2d 569; Mendelsohn v. Van Herick, 133 Cal.

App. 612, 24 P.2d 878; Sawyer v. Hooper, 79 Cal.App. 395, 249 P. 530; Hinds v. Wheadon, 19 Cal.2d 458, 121 P.2d 724; Madigan v. O. A. Hale & Co., 90 Cal.App. 151, 265 P. 574; Wallace v. King, 27 Cal. App.2d 174, 80 P.2d 523; Ridge v. Boulder Creek, etc., School Dist., 60 Cal.App.2d 453, 140 P.2d 990. Plaintiff also cites Marton v. Jones, 44 Cal.App. 299, 186 P. 410, but in that case the negligence consisted of the violation of an ordinance. In the case at bar, the open skylights were obvious; they were not hidden in any way, and plaintiff was an experienced roofer, fully aware of their existence. Nor was defendant in any way responsible for the tearing of the paper which caused plaintiff to lose his balance and fall. The only ground of liability which plaintiff urges was that defendant in maintaining open skylights was guilty of negligence toward plaintiff.

[2] The Restatement of the Law of Torts, sec. 340, defines the liability to licensees with reference to the passive condition of the premises as follows: "A possessor of land is not subject to liability to his licensees, whether business visitors or gratuitous licensees, for bodily harm caused to them by any dangerous condition thereon, whether natural or artificial, if they know of the condition and realize the risk involved therein."

[3] In Blodgett v. B. H. Dyas Co., 4 Cal.2d 511, 512, 50 P.2d 801, 802, the court states: "The owner of property, in so far as an invitee is concerned, is not an insurer of safety, but must use reasonable care to keep his premises in a reasonably safe condition and give warning of latent or concealed perils. He is not liable for injury to an invitee resulting from a danger which was obvious or should have been observed in the exercise of reasonable care. Shanley v. American Olive Co., 185 Cal. 552, 197 P. 793; Mantino v. Sutter Hospital Ass'n, 211 Cal. 556, 296 P. 76."

[4] In Carroll v. Central Counties Gas Co., 74 Cal.App. 303, 308, 240 P. 53, 55, the court says: "Whether negligence can be inferred from the evidence is for the determination of the court, * * *. Pacheco v. Judson Mfg. Co., 113 Cal. 541, 545, 45 P. 833, 834."

[5] The evidence failed to show the violation of any duty owed by defendant to plaintiff and there was, therefore, no basis to subject defendant to liability for plaintiff's injury.

Plaintiff has also cited a number of cases to demonstrate that the open skylight was the proximate cause of the injury. Since, however, he has been unable to prove that having an open skylight, in a building under construction constitutes negligence, or that any other basis of liability was created by, or was the responsibility of, the defendant it is unnecessary for us to consider what act, or acts, constituted the efficient cause of the injury.

[6] Plaintiff also cites as error the failure of the court to admit in evidence Safety Orders of the Industrial Accident Commission No. 1138 and No. 1102. The former required that floor openings be covered and guarded during construction of buildings and the latter made general contractors responsible for carrying out the provisions of the Safety Orders. However, there was no basis laid for the introduction of either order. The skylight opening, and plaintiff's employment, were located on the roof; the order sought to be introduced dealt solely with floor openings within a building and clearly was not admissible. Both orders were properly excluded.

The judgment of nonsuit is affirmed.

Proceeding by Occidental Indemnity Company, insurance carrier, to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation for personal injuries to Steve Ruljanovich, employee.

Award annulled.

Prior opinion, 143 P.2d 58.

CARTER, Justice.

Petitioner, the insurance carrier of the owners and operators of a fishing boat named "Betsy Ross," seeks a review of an award of the Industrial Accident Commission to Steve Ruljanovich, a fisherman-seaman employee of the owners, for an injury received in the course of his employment under the Workmen's Compensation Law of this state.

The facts are not disputed. On May 4, 1942, Ruljanovich was in the employ of the owners and operators of a fishing vessel named "Betsy Ross," as a seaman fisherman when he received an injury arising out of and in the course of his employment. The day before the accident he had been employed by the owners of the boat as a member of the crew to engage in fishing off the shores of California. On the day of the injury the boat was in the Los Angeles harbor and Ruljanovich was assisting in preparing it for the fishing expedition. At his employer's request he went to a warehouse on the shore to obtain a net to be used in fishing and while there received the injury mentioned. It was not until some time later that the boat left on the expedition.

The commission found that Ruljanovich was injured while in the course of his employment as a seaman fisherman and, in support of its claim of jurisdiction in the matter, that the employee was not at the time of his injury engaged in work in connection with his occupation as seaman, but that the injury occurred within the boundaries of the State of California and not on the vessel or navigable waters.

On the same date that he filed his application for compensation with the commission, Ruljanovich instituted a libel in the United States District Court against the vessel and her master claiming wages, maintenance and cure pursuant to maritime law for the injury suffered. After the commission had made its award and on March 17, 1943, Ruljanovich amended his libel by naming the owners of the vessel in addition to the master and claiming damages for the alleged negligence of the owners in connection with his injury pursuant to the Jones Act, 46 U.S.C.A. § 688, in addition to the claim for maintenance and cure. The libel was tried in the federal court and ultimately resulted in a denial of damages under the Jones Act because of lack of proof of negligence; however, a judgment for wages, maintenance and cure was given.

Petitioner contends that the Industrial Accident Commission did not have jurisdiction of the case; that exclusive jurisdiction rested in maritime law and the forums appropriately exercising that jurisdiction.

[1-3] There are various remedies in the maritime law of which a seaman may avail himself when he suffers injuries arising out of his service on a ship. For present purposes, two will be mentioned. First, is the ancient liability imposed by admiralty law upon shipowners for maintenance and cure including wages of seamen becoming ill or injured during the period of their service. Aguilar v. Standard Oil Co., 318 U.S. 724, 63 S.Ct. 930, 87 L.Ed. 1107; O'Donnell v. Great Lakes, etc., Co., 318 U.S. 36, 63 S.Ct. 488, 87 L.Ed. 596; Calmar S. S. Corp. v. Taylor, 303 U.S. 525, 58 S.Ct. 651, 82 L.Ed. 993; The Osceola, 189 U.S. 158, 23 S.Ct. 483, 47 L.Ed. 760; 48 Am.Jur., Shipping, § 167. That liability is not predicated upon the fault or negligence of the shipowner, and negligence, or acts short of culpable misconduct on the seaman's part will not prevent recovery. Aguilar v. Standard Oil Co., supra. Second, a seaman suffering personal injury in the course of his employment may, at his election, maintain an action at law for damages and in such action the Federal Employers' Liability Act, 45 U.S.C.A. §§ 51-60 applies. Jones Act, 46 U.S.C.A. § 688. Thereunder the negligence of the employer, its agents or employees, must be established. De Zon v. American President Lines, 318 U.S. 660, 63 S.Ct. 814, 87 L.Ed. 1065. The source of the congressional power in the enactment of the Jones Act is the power to regulate interstate commerce, U.S.Const., art. I, § 8, cl. 3, and its power to make laws necessary and proper to carry into execution powers vested by the Constitution in the government or any department of it, U.S.Const., art. I, § 8, cl. 18 including the judicial power which extends "to all Cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction." U.S. Const., art. III, § 2; O'Donnell v. Great Lakes, etc., Co., 318 U.S. 36, 63 S.Ct. 488, 87 L.Ed. 596.

[4] The two foregoing remedies are each independent and cumulative of the other, and may be tried in the state or federal courts where the action is in personam. Garrett v. Moore-McCormack Co., 317 U.S. 239, 63 S.Ct. 246, 87 L.Ed. 239; Pacific S. Co. v. Peterson, 278 U.S. 130, 49 S.Ct. 75, 73 L.Ed. 220.

[5] Manifestly, the Industrial Accident Commission is not a court of the state which may give remedies under either the Jones Act or the maritime law for maintenance and cure. Its sole power is to apply the Workmen's Compensation Law as set forth in the Constitution and Labor Code. Cal.Const., art. XX, § 21; Labor Code, § 3201 et seq. St.1937, p. 265 et seq.

Hence, the essential question is whether or not the remedies provided by the Workmen's Compensation Law are available concurrently with or to the exclusion of the remedies under the Jones Act and maritime law.

[6] The leading case on the question of the applicability of the maritime law rather than state workmen's compensation laws is Southern Pacific Co. v. Jensen, 244 U.S. 205, 37 S.Ct. 524, 529, 61 L.Ed. 1086 L.R.A. 1918C, 451, Ann.Cas.1917E, 900. That decision was rendered before the passage of the Jones Act or the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act, 33 U.S.C.A. § 901 et seq. In the Jensen case a stevedore was injured while working on board a ship unloading it at a wharf in navigable waters. He was not a member of the crew. The court held that the general body of maritime law as accepted by the federal courts was paramount; that the states may not change, modify or affect it and "no such (state) legislation is valid if it contravenes the essential purpose expressed by an act of Congress, or works material prejudice to the characteristic features of the general maritime law, or interferes with the proper harmony and uniformity of that law in its international and interstate relations," and that the state workmen's compensation laws could not be constitutionally applied to the injured employee because the ship was in navigable waters while being unloaded and the employment and the injuries were maritime. Although that case has been the subject of heated controversy both in the courts and among legal writers (see 38 Yale Law Journal 472), it has not been overruled; it has been recognized as an authority with the possible limitations presently discussed in the recent cases of Norton v. Warner Co., 64 S.Ct. 747, 88 L.Ed. 430; and Davis v. Department of Labor & Industries, 317 U.S. 249, 63 S.Ct. 225, 87 L.Ed. 246. The constitutional aspects of that principle were further vitalized when the court declared unconstitutional congressional acts aimed at giving harbor workers the right to remedies under the state workmen's compensation laws. See Knickerbocker Ice Co. v. Stewart, 253 U.S. 149, 40 S.Ct. 438, 64 L.Ed. 834, 11 A.L.R. 1145; State of Washington v. W. C. Dawson & Co., 264 U.S. 219, 44 S.Ct. 302, 68 L.Ed. 646. In commenting upon the rule announced in the Jensen case the Supreme Court of the United States stated in Davis v. Department of Labor & Industries, supra, 317 U.S. 252, 253, 63 S.Ct. 227, 87 L.Ed. 246:

"When a state could and when it could not grant protection under a compensation act was left as a perplexing problem, for it was held 'difficult, if not impossible' to define this boundary with exactness."

"This Court has been unable to give any guiding, definite rule to determine the extent of state power in advance of litigation, and has held that the margins of state authority must 'be determined in view of surrounding circumstances as cases arise.'" However, it recognized in discussing whether the Longshoremen's & Harbor Workers' Compensation Act, supra, applied that a "shadowy" area existed where state law could provide protection. It states: "But the line separating the scope of the two (state and federal law) being undefined and undefinable with exact precision, marginal employment may, by reason of particular facts, fall on either side." And at

"There is, in the light of the cases referred to, clearly a twilight zone in which the employees must have their rights determined case by case, and in which particular facts and circumstances are vital elements. That zone includes persons such as the decedent who are, as a matter of actual administration, in fact protected under the state compensation act." Likewise, in case of seamen it should logically follow under the doctrine of the Jensen case that the remedies provided by the Jones Act or the maritime law of cure and maintenance are exclusive of state laws with the qualification that there may be borderline cases where that is not true and that each case must depend upon its particular circumstances. The reference in the Jones Act to a seaman having an election to proceed under the Jones Act refers not to an election between state and maritime law but rather as to alternatives accorded by the maritime law as modified. Panama R. Co. v. Johnson, 264 U.S. 375, 44 S.Ct. 391, 68 L.Ed. 748. The remedy under the Jones Act is exclusive of state laws (Panama R. Co. v. Johnson, supra; Northern Coal, etc., Co. v. Strand, 278 U.S. 142, 49 S.Ct. 88, 73 L.Ed. 232; Lindgren v. United States, 281 U.S. 38, 50 S.Ct. 207, 74 L.Ed. 686; see, Garrett v. Moore-McCormack Co., 317 U.S. 239, 63 S.Ct. 246, 87 L.Ed. 239) and supercedes the operation of state workmen's compensation laws. Northern Coal, etc., Co. v. Strand, supra.

In other fields, for illustration, injury to railway employees, it has been consistently held that the remedy given by the Federal Employers' Liability Act, 45 U.S.C.A. §§ 51-60 is exclusive of rights and remedies under state workmen's compensation laws; that act extends to all railway employees, as expressed in its 1939 amendment, "whose duties as such employees shall be the furtherance of interstate or foreign commerce; or shall, in any way directly or closely and substantially, affect such commerce as above set forth shall, for the purposes of this chapter, be considered as being employed by such carrier in such commerce and shall be considered as entitled to the benefits of this chapter." 45 U.S.C.A. § 51. New York Central R. Co. v. Winfield, 244 U.S. 147, 37 S.Ct. 546, 61 L.Ed. 1045, L.R.A.1918C, 439, Ann.Cas.1917D, 1139; Erie R. Co. v. Winfield, 244 U.S. 170, 37 S.Ct. 556, 61 L.Ed. 1057, Ann.Cas.1918L, 662; see Southern Pac. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 19 Cal.2d 271, 120 P.2d 880; 35 Am.Jur. Master & Servant, § 398. It will be recalled that the Jones Act makes applicable to seamen the provisions of the Federal Employers' Liability Act.

[7] From the foregoing it remains to be determined whether the facts of the instant case bring the employee within the exclusive jurisdiction of the maritime law or the state Workmen's Compensation Law or in the twilight zone mentioned in Davis v. Department of Labor & Industries, supra; and in so doing we are not aided by the discussion in the Davis case of the presumption of the correctness of a determination by the state Industrial Accident Commission that it had jurisdiction inasmuch as both it and the federal court have assumed jurisdiction. The general tests advanced for the determination of that question appear to be that to exclude the state law there must appear to be an impairment of the uniformity of operation of the maritime laws stated in the foregoing excerpt from the Jensen case, and with reference to employees other than seamen, the services performed must have a relation to commerce and navigation. See State Industrial Commission v. Nordenholt Corp., 259 U.S. 263, 42 S.Ct. 473, 66 L.Ed. 933, 25 A.L.R. 1013; Grant Smith-Porter Ship Co. v. Rohde, 257 U.S. 469, 42 S.Ct. 157, 66 L.Ed. 321, 25 A.L.R. 1008; Millers' Indem. Underwriters v. Braud, 270 U.S. 59, 46 S.Ct. 194, 70 L.Ed. 470; Alaska Packers' Ass'n v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 276 U.S. 467, 48 S.Ct. 346, 72 L.Ed. 656.

[8] Seamen have long been the wards of admiralty and a subject of special care under the maritime law. They are definitely allied with maritime law and their treatment is a matter peculiarly within the rule of uniformity of the maritime law. For those reasons they may be said to be in a different category than harbor workers and longshoremen in respect to determining the extent that the maritime law is paramount. See O'Donnell v. Great Lakes, etc., Co., supra, 318 U.S. at page 43, 63 S.Ct. at page 492, 87 L.Ed. 596. Hence, the most recent decisions of the United States Supreme Court have determined that they are under the wing of maritime law even though the injury occurs while the seaman is on land. In Aguilar v. Standard Oil Co., 318 U.S. 724, 63 S.Ct. 930, 931, 87 L.Ed. 1107, the question involved was "whether a shipowner is liable for wages and maintenance and cure to a seaman who, having left his vessel on authorized shore leave, is injured while traversing the only available route between the moored ship and a public street. The injury in No. 582 occurred while the seaman was departing for his leave. That in No. 454 occurred while he was returning." It was held that the maritime right of maintenance and cure applied, the test conceded by the parties to be whether the injury occurred while the seaman was "in the service of the ship." The right to recover for maintenance and cure is broader than the right to compensation under workmen's compensation laws. The court said at page 732 of 318 U.S., at page 934 of 63 S.Ct., 87 L.Ed. 1107:

"For that reason among others his employer's responsibility for maintenance and cure extends beyond injuries sustained because of, or while engaged in, activities required by his employment. In this respect it is a broader liability than that imposed by modern workmen's compensation statutes. Appropriately it covers all injuries and ailments incurred without misconduct on the seaman's part amounting to ground for forfeiture, at least while he is on the ship, 'subject to the call of duty as a seaman, and earning wages as such.' * * *

"When the seaman's duties carry him ashore, the shipowner's obligation is neither terminated nor narrowed. When he leaves the ship contrary to orders, however, the owner's duty is ended. Between these extremes are the instant cases, raising for the first time here the question of the existence and scope of the shipowner's duty when the seaman is injured while on shore leave but without specific chore for the ship. Liability in that circumstance was obscured in the first maritime codes and although early suggested has been recognized only implicitly in lower federal courts. Very recently it has been explicitly denied in several district courts.

"We think that the principles governing shipboard injuries apply to the facts presented by these cases. To relieve the shipowner of his obligation in the case of injuries incurred on shore leave would cast upon the seaman hazards encountered only by reason of the voyage. The assumption is hardly sound that the normal uses and purposes of shore leave are 'exclusively personal' and have no relation to the vessel's business. Men cannot live for long cooped up aboard ship without substantial impairment of their efficiency, if not also serious danger to discipline. * * *

"It was from considerations of exactly this character that the liability for maintenance and cure arose. From them likewise, its legal incidents were derived. The shipowner owes the protection regardless of whether he is at fault; the seaman's fault, unless gross, cannot defeat it; unlike the statutory liability of employers on land it is not limited to strictly occupational hazards or to injuries which have an immediate causal connection with an act of labor. An obligation which thus originated and was shaped in response to the needs of seamen for protection from the hazards and peculiarities of marine employment should not be narrowed to exclude from its scope characteristic and essential elements of that work. And, indeed, no decision has been found which so narrows the shipowner's parallel obligation in the case of sickness or disease.
* * *

"There is strong ground therefore for regarding the right to maintenance and cure as covering injuries received without misconduct while on shore leave. Certainly the nature and foundations of the liability require that it be not narrowly confined or whittled down by restrictive and artificial distinctions defeating its broad and beneficial purposes. If leeway is to be given in either direction, all the considerations which brought the liability into being dictate it should be in the sailor's behalf. In this view, the nature and purposes of the liability do not permit distinctions which allow recovery when the seaman becomes ill or is injured while idle aboard, * * * or when doing some minor errand for the ship ashore, * * * but deny it when he falls from the ladder or gangplank as he leaves the vessel on shore leave, * * *. Such refinements cut the heart from a protection to which they are wholly foreign in aim and effect. The sailor departing for or returning from shore leave is, sensibly, no more beyond the broad protection of his right to maintenance and cure than is the seaman quitting the ship on being discharged or boarding it on first reporting for duty."

In O'Donnell v. Great Lakes, etc., Co., 318 U.S. 36, 63 S.Ct. 488, 87 L.Ed. 596, a seaman who was injured while he was ashore to assist in repairing the land end of a pipe that was being used to unload the ship, was held to be within the protection of the Jones Act. The Federal District Court had made an award for maintenance and cure but dismissed the claim for damages under the Jones Act. The Circuit Court of Appeals came to the same conclusion. O'Donnell v. Great Lakes, etc., Co., 7 Cir., 127 F.2d 901. The court concluded that recovery could be had under both and treated the "course of employment" requirement in the Jones Act and "in the service of the ship" under the maintenance and cure, as the same. It said at page 41 of 318 U.S., at page 491 of 63 S.Ct., 87 L.Ed. 596:

"As we have said, the maritime law, as recognized in the federal courts, has not in general allowed recovery for personal injuries occurring on land. But there is an important exception to this generalization in the case of maintenance and cure. From its dawn, the maritime law has recognized the seaman's right to maintenance and cure for injuries suffered in the course of his service to his vessel, whether occurring on sea or on land. * * *

"Some of the grounds for recovery of maintenance and cure would, in modern terminology, be classified as torts. But the seaman's right was firmly established in the maritime law long before recognition of the distinction between tort and contract. In its origin maintenance and cure must be taken as an incident to the status of the seaman in the employment of his ship. * * * That status has from the beginning been peculiarly within the province of the maritime law, * * * and upon principles consistently followed by this Court it is subject to the power of Congress to modify the conditions and extent of the remedy afforded by the maritime law to seamen injured while engaged in a maritime service.

"The right of recovery in the Jones Act is given to the seaman as such, and, as in the case of maintenance and cure, the admiralty jurisdiction over the suit depends not on the place where the injury is inflicted but on the nature of the service and its relationship to the operation of the vessel plying in navigable waters. * * *

"It follows that the Jones Act, in extending a right of recovery to the seaman injured while in the service of his vessel by negligence, has done no more than supplement the remedy of maintenance and cure for injuries suffered by the seaman, whether on land or sea, by giving to him the indemnity which the maritime law afforded to a seaman injured in consequence of the unseaworthiness of the vessel or its tackle. * * * Since the subject matter, the seaman's right to compensation for injuries received in the course of his employment, is one traditionally cognizable in admiralty, the Jones Act, by enlarging the remedy, did not go beyond modification of substantive rules of the maritime law well within the scope of the admiralty jurisdiction whether the vessel, plying navigable waters, be engaged in interstate commerce or not." (Italics added.)

While neither the Aguilar nor O'Donnell cases involved the question of a conflict between state workmen's compensation laws and maritime laws, we believe they are persuasive authority on the issue. They clearly and conclusively establish the rule that a seaman may recover under maritime law for an injury received while performing duties in the course of his employment on land. If cases fall within the maritime law there is no escape from the conclusion that the applicability of that law is exclusive. It is not a case of harbor workers, longshoremen and the like, as distinguished from seamen, where there may be a twilight zone as indicated in Davis v. Department of Labor & Industries, supra. The latest expression of the Supreme Court of the United States on the subject appears in Norton v. Warner Co., supra, 64 S.Ct. 747, 88 L.Ed. 430. Although the issue there was whether an employee was entitled to relief under the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act, supra, on the one hand or under admiralty law or the Jones Act on the other, as distinguished from the conflict between the admiralty and state workmen's compensation laws, the court cited the Jensen case and emphasized the necessity of preserving the rights of a seaman. Implicit in its holding is the thought that unless it clearly appears to the contrary a seaman should have the benefits of the admiralty law or the Jones Act. The court stated at page 750 of 64 S.Ct., at page 936 of 88 L.Ed.:

"We reviewed the history of the Act (Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act) in the Bassett case [South Chicago Coal & Dock Co. v. Bassett, 309 U.S. 251, 60 S.Ct. 544, 84 L.Ed. 732] and in the Parker case [Parker v. Motor Boat Sales, Inc., 314 U.S. 244, 62 S.Ct. 221, 86 L.Ed. 184] and more recently in Davis v. Department of Labor, 317 U.S. 249, 63 S.Ct. 225, 87 L.Ed. 246. As we noted in those cases, the Act was adopted to meet the difficulties engendered by the decision in Southern P. Co. v. Jensen, * * *. And see Knickerbocker Ice Co. v. Stewart, 253 U.S. 149, 40 S.Ct. 438, 64 L.Ed. 834, 11 A.L.R. 1145, [20 N.C.C.A. 635; State of Washington v. W. C. Dawson & Co., 264 U.S. 219, 44 S.Ct. 302, 68 L.Ed. 646, [24 N.C.C.A. 253]. That line of cases carved out a domain in which, according to a majority of this Court, state law could not constitutionally afford compensation to maritime employees. It was to fill that gap in the system of workmen's compensation that the present Act was passed. * * * But as we pointed out in the Bassett case * * * the effort to bring a master and members of a crew of a vessel under the Act was successfully opposed by the representatives of maritime employees. * * * And the maritime unions which appeared as amicus curiae, in the present case emphasize the importance of that exception. The liability of an employer under the Act is exclusive. * * * On the other hand, those who are not covered by it but who are protected by maritime law are entitled to maintenance and cure, a remedy not restricted to accidents. As we said in Aguilar v. Standard Oil Co., 318 U.S. 724, 732, 63 S.Ct. 930, 934, 87 L.Ed. 1107, [1114], 'In this respect it is a broader liability than that imposed by modern workmen's compensation statutes.' Moreover, seamen may sue under the Jones Act * * * for injuries in the course of their employment. And in such actions assumption of risk is no defense. * * * Or suit may be brought in admiralty for injuries caused by unseaworthiness of the vessel or its appurtenant appliances and equipment. * * * These are basic rights. The maritime unions appearing in the present case maintain that those remedies are indeed superior to the relief afforded by the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' [Compensation] Act. Whether they are more desirable than a system of compensation is not for us to determine. But where Congress has provided that those basic rights shall not be withheld from a class or classes of maritime employees it is our duty on judicial review to respect the command and not permit the exemption to be narrowed whether by administrative construction or otherwise."

In the instant case the employee was a seaman. The day before the injury he had been employed as a member of the crew to go on a fishing cruise in navigable waters. The following day he worked on the ship for a while, then at the direction of his employer went on land to get a fishing net, which was certainly an act in the course of and related to his service to the ship. The only reasonable conclusion from those circumstances is that he was a seaman injured in the course of his duties as such.

Respondents rely upon such cases as Grant Smith-Porter Ship Co. v. Rohde, supra; State Industrial Comm. v. Nordenholt Co., supra; Alaska Packers' Ass'n v. Industrial Acc. Comm., supra; and London, etc., Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 279 U.S. 109, 49 S.Ct. 296, 73 L.Ed. 632. The Rohde case involved an injury to a carpenter employed in the construction of a ship nearly completed and lying in navigable waters as a result of the negligence of his employer. He was not a seaman and it was held that neither his contract nor activities were maritime and that torts were controlled by the local law, hence the state workmen's compensation law applied. Likewise, in the Nordenholt case the injury was to a longshoreman, not a seaman, and the injury was suffered while he was working on land assisting in the unloading of a ship. It was concluded that to apply the state law would not interfere with the uniformity of marine law. In the Alaska Packers case the employee was employed as a seaman and for general work in a cannery. After the fishing season was over, that is, after his seaman's employment was past, he was injured while on shore attempting to push a fishing boat into navigable water for the purpose of floating to its winter dry dock. As expressed by the court at page 469 of 276 U.S., at page 346 of 48 S.Ct., 72 L.Ed. 656:

"Peterson was not employed merely to work on the bark or the fishing boat. He also undertook to perform services as directed on land in connection with the canning operations. When injured, certainly he was not engaged in any work so directly connected with navigation and commerce that to permit the rights of the parties to be controlled by the local law would interfere with the essential uniformity of the general maritime law." (Italics added.) In the case at bar the employee was employed solely as a seaman fisherman and although the fishing trip had not commenced, his work was directly connected with that employment and not some distinct nonmaritime service on land. In the London Company case the employee was a seaman on a vessel conducting fishing excursions. He was drowned while in a small boat at his master's order attempting to save the vessel which had broken from her moorings. The conclusion of the California Industrial Accident Commission that it had jurisdiction was repudiated. All of the cases since the Jensen case were discussed and distinguished. The concluding statement is pertinent (279 U.S. at page 125, 49 S.Ct. at page 300, 73 L.Ed. 632):

"The conclusion sought to be drawn by counsel for the Commission from the Rohde and other cases is that workmen's compensation acts will apply unless their application would interfere with the uniformity of the general maritime law in interstate and foreign commerce, and their is neither here. But this omits one of the grounds for making an exception—that it shall not be prejudicial to the characteristic features of the maritime law. That is just what it would be here, for here we have a transaction on the navigable waters of the United States which in every respect covers all the characteristic features of maritime law and has no other features but those. To apply to such a case a state Compensation Law would certainly be prejudicial to those features."

[9] From the foregoing it clearly appears that under the most recent decisions of the United States Supreme Court an action to recover for an injury to a seaman even though occurring on land is peculiarly within the maritime jurisdiction by way of maintenance and cure if no tort is involved or by way of the Jones Act if there is negligence. The many cases that were decided prior to these recent decisions cannot be considered controlling. The instant case falls clearly within the reasoning in the O'Donnell and Aguilar cases above discussed.

In our opinion the best solution of the problem would be to overrule the Jensen case and thus eliminate the constitutional objection to the joint operation of state compensation and federal maritime laws. A right under the state law would then exist in those cases where the injury occurred within the territorial jurisdiction of the state regardless of whether the employee's activities were maritime or on navigable waters. Less difficulty would be encountered at least in determining whether or not a case is justiciable under the state law. Rights under the maritime law would be the same as now exist. The difficulty in fixing the limits of the maritime law in particular cases would still exist but they would be no greater than the analogous problem of determining whether the injury occurred in the course of employment. To avoid double recovery for the same injury and the compensable factors thereof where both remedies were sought before the statute of limitations had run, the appropriate tribunal could offset one against the other to the extent that they overlapped. However, the Supreme Court of the United States has not chosen to follow such course and we are not authorized to do so.

We conclude therefore that the respondent commission did not have jurisdiction of the case at bar and therefore its award is annulled.

TOSCHI v. CHRISTIAN et al.
S. F. No. 16978.

Supreme Court of California,
June 12, 1944.

1. Appeal and error ⇨927(3)

On an appeal from a judgment of nonsuit, evidence must be viewed in light most favorable to plaintiff.

2. Railroads ⇨327(1)

The "stop, look and listen rule" ordinarily applied to railroad crossing collisions is not applicable to factual bases where its application would be unreasonable.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Stop, Look and Listen Rule".

3. Railroads ⇨350(28)

The "stop, look and listen rule" cannot operate to establish contributory negligence as a matter of law, where highway is crossed by six railroad yard tracks on which switching operations progress almost constantly, and railroad has employed two flagmen for both railroad and highway traffic control, and a practical necessity exists for travelers on highway to rely on flagmen's signals.

4. Railroads ⇨330(2)

• As respects railroad crossing accidents, extent to which a traveler may rely upon failure of a mechanical warning device to operate or upon absence of a customary flagman is a relative proposition dependent upon surrounding circumstances, and is not subject to precise definition as a pure proposition of law.

5. Negligence ⇨136(14)

As respects negligence, conduct must be gauged in relation to all other material circumstances surrounding it, and, if such other circumstances admit of a reasonable doubt as to whether questioned conduct falls within or without bounds of ordinary care, then such doubt must be resolved as a matter of fact rather than of law.

6. Railroads ⇨330(2)

A railroad cannot encourage persons to relax their vigilance concerning dangers that lurk in railroad crossings by assuring them, through erection of safety devices, that danger has been removed or minimized, and at same time hold them to same degree of care as would be required if such devices have not been provided.

7. Railroads ⇨330(2)

A person approaching a guarded crossing cannot blindly rely upon absence of warning by flagman or silence of an automatic signal and proceed without further regard for his own safety.

8. Railroads ⇨350(28)

Whether a truck driver, in attempting to traverse busy metropolitan railroad crossing customarily guarded by two flagmen, in exercise of ordinary care should have taken additional precautions than those which he did take, was for jury.

9. Railroads ⇨350(32)

In railroad crossing collision case, whether plaintiff's alleged violation of Vehicle Code section in making left turn at intersection immediately prior to crossing tracks was proximately contributing cause of collision between his truck and backing locomotive was for jury. Vehicle Code, § 540(b), St.1935, p. 184.

10. Railroads ⇨330(2)

Truck driver, in approaching railroad crossing customarily protected by two flagmen, upon observing absence of one flagman and inattention of other flagman, was not required to take precautions which would not be taken by an ordinarily careful driver under the circumstances to hear a possibly approaching train.

11. Railroads ⇨350(32)

Where railroad crossing flagman was playing with a mirror which flashed in eyes of truck driver who stopped truck which was then struck by a train, whether flashing of mirror in driver's eyes caused him to stop upon track which he might otherwise have cleared in safety, or whether incident had no causal connection with accident, was for jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Mario Toschi against L. L. Christian and others for injuries resulting from a collision between plaintiff's truck and a railroad engine. From a judgment of nonsuit granted on defendants' motion at the close of plaintiff's case, plaintiff appeals.

SCHAUER, Justice.

This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff in a crossing collision between a truck driven by him and a locomotive of the defendant railroad company. Named as defendants are the Southern Pacific Company (hereinafter sometimes referred to as the railroad), the fireman and the engineer who operated the locomotive, and two flagmen who were stationed at the crossing, the latter four being employees of the railroad. The plaintiff appeals from a judgment of nonsuit. So far as concerns disposition of this appeal the negligence of the defendants is conceded and the sole question is whether the trial court was correct in its determination that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. We have concluded that in the state of the record the question of contributory negligence was one of fact.

[1] There are substantial conflicts in the evidence as disclosed by the transcript and, as is not unusual in the enthusiasm of advocacy, still more in the contentions of counsel. It is elementary, however, that on appeal from a judgment of nonsuit the evidence shall be viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiff. (Gregg v. Western Pac. R. Co. (1924), 193 Cal. 212, 216, 223 P. 553.) Application of this rule strikes down at once, and without necessity for further comment thereon, all those portions of defendants' argument which depend on the resolution of conflicting inferences favorable to defendants. Viewing the record obediently to the designated rule this opinion must predicate the following facts:

This is not a rural crossing case. The locale of the accident is a congested mercantile and industrial district in the city of San Francisco in the area of a passenger and freight terminal where six substantially parallel tracks of defendant company cross Berry Street and where switching operations are almost constantly in progress. Berry Street runs generally east and west, and is intersected by Seventh Street running generally north and south. The most westerly of the six tracks curves from the northeast into Seventh Street and reaches the approximate center of that street (down which it then runs) at the intersection of Berry and Seventh. Immediately east of Seventh Street are the other five tracks crossing Berry. The most westerly track (in the center of Seventh Street) figures little in the controversy. The next two tracks are main line tracks and the remaining three (branching into a fourth just north of Berry Street) are yard tracks. There was a flagman's shelter at the northeast corner of the intersecting streets and another flagman's shelter on the south side of Berry Street just east of the sixth track. The collision occurred on the first (westerly) main line track; i.e., the first track east of the most westerly of the six tracks. The five tracks crossing Berry Street east of Seventh are closely spaced and may be spoken of as a group. Two flagmen were normally present in this area, one on either side of this group of five tracks, and both were on duty on the day of the accident. All the tracks approach Berry Street (and Seventh) on an easy curve from the northeast and cross Berry at approximately right angles. Except for the flagman's shelter at the northeast corner of the two streets, there were no fixed obstructions to a view of the tracks by a person traveling south on Seventh Street (as was plaintiff here) in the block just north of the intersection. However, at the time of the accident several automobiles were parked along Seventh Street, between plaintiff's route (while he was on Seventh Street) and the tracks. A driver on Berry Street or one attempting to turn onto Berry Street from Seventh Street cannot ordinarily know whether any locomotives which may be moving in the yards in the course of switching operations will cross Berry Street or stop short of it. Recognizing this fact and in an effort to expedite traffic and secure safety, the railroad regularly stationed a flagman on each side of the group of five tracks, as previously mentioned, with the duty of going out into Berry and raising a stop sign as a warning for highway vehicles when railroad traffic was to cross, and of flagging down railroad engines when necessary to permit highway traffic to be cleared from the tracks. Plaintiff was familiar with the crossing; in his work as a truck driver he had driven over it at least twice and sometimes twenty times every working day for ten years. During all this time flagmen were stationed at the crossing and plaintiff was accustomed to rely upon their signals. In reliance upon them and pursuant to the long-established practice, when a flagman held up a stop sign plaintiff stopped; when a stop sign was not displayed or a flagman not in view plaintiff, apparently, had always previously found the crossing safe.

On the morning of April 12, 1938, plaintiff approached the crossing driving south on Seventh Street and intending to turn left onto Berry Street. This was to have been his fifth traverse of the crossing that morning. The day was clear. About 50 feet before he came to the intersection he looked to his left "On the tracks * * * straight ahead and all around," and saw no railroad traffic; at about the same time he decreased his speed from approximately 25 miles an hour to 10 miles an hour and shifted into a lower gear. He saw two automobiles approaching, one on Seventh Street from the south and one on Berry Street from the west; both cars stopped to let plaintiff make the left-hand turn onto and across the railroad tracks. He also looked for a flagman but there was none visible on the Seventh Street side of the tracks. (This flagman was not seen at all on this occasion by plaintiff but other witnesses establish that he emerged from his shelter after the accident.) Plaintiff turned onto Berry Street and drove safely across the first or single track (which extends into and along the center of Seventh Street) and then saw one flagman (Darrrough) on the far side of the group of five tracks which he was approaching. Plaintiff observed that such flagman was not standing in the middle of Berry Street, the usual position of the flagman when a locomotive was approaching, but was close to the north boundary line of the street; that he was not signaling traffic with either the stop sign, which was regularly used to signal highway vehicles, or the red flag, which was provided for signaling to railroad traffic, but was instead holding the sign and the flag under his arm; and that in his hands he held a mirror with which he was playing by flashing sunlight in it. After plaintiff turned, he did not look to the left along the tracks. As he drove onto the first track (referred to as the "South-bound Main Line") of the group of five tracks light from the mirror, with which the flagman was still playing, was flashed in his eyes, blinding him. He stopped and immediately his truck was struck by an engine which was backing in a southwesterly direction on the curved track and which had been approaching at an angle from behind him and to his left as he drove south down Seventh Street. At no time had plaintiff seen the engine before it hit his truck and there is testimony from which it may be inferred that he could not have heard it: the neighborhood was noisy, the street was rough, and on the truck driven by plaintiff was a concrete mixer with drums which constantly revolved. For the purpose of this appeal we must take as true testimony that neither a whistle nor a bell on the engine sounded a warning.

Defendants contend that from these facts it is evident that plaintiff did not exercise the slightest care for his own safety; that had he exercised any care the accident would not have happened. Plaintiff argues that the fact that he could have seen the engine had he looked with greater care "is a wholly false quantity in the case," that he was not only entitled but required, whether or not he saw a train approaching, to rely upon the long-established custom that the absence of a flagman was an assurance of safety since, so he asserts, a traveler who would wait at this crossing until no engine was within sight or hearing could never cross. We are of the opinion that the correct view of the case lies between these two extremes.

[2,3] Counsel for defendants assiduously argue the fact as to whether plaintiff's view of the tracks and of the approaching engine was open or impeded, and contend that if it was open plaintiff's failure to look and see and stop in safety inexorably convicts him of contributory negligence. They rely upon Koch v. Southern Cal. R. Co. (1906), 148 Cal. 677, 84 P. 176, 4 L.R.A.,N.S., 521, 113 Am.St.Rep. 332, 7 Ann.Cas. 795, and cases which have followed that decision. We think that in this argument counsel are viewing the evidence and selecting conflicting inferences favorable to their clients rather than to the plaintiff, but even if we assume their factual theory, as far as it goes, we find their proposition of law untenable. The "stop, look and listen" rule, urged by defendants, will not be applied to factual bases where its application would be unreasonable. In the circumstances of this case, which comprise a six-track railroad yard crossing, switching operations progressing almost constantly, the employment of two flagmen by the railroad, whose duties involve traffic control on the highway and to some extent on the railroad, and a practical necessity for travelers on the highway to rely on the flagmen's signals because ordinarily it would be impossible for such travelers after they had observed railroad traffic approaching to know whether it would cross or stop short of the highway, the "stop, look and listen" rule is not wholly appropriate and cannot operate to establish contributory negligence as a matter of law. Merely adding the further circumstance that a traveler knew that two of the six tracks were main line tracks and that ordinarily trains on those tracks would constitute through traffic would not alter the legal proposition above stated.

[4,5] The extent to which a traveler may rely upon the failure of a mechanical device to operate, or upon the absence of a customary flagman, cannot be precisely defined as a pure proposition of law applicable to all the circumstances which usually complement such occurrences. Standards of care are typically relative; rules of law are basically absolute. Hence, in regard to negligence, any attempt to screen factual conduct into legal classifications through a sieve of absolute law will be impracticable whenever the related circumstances admit of materially conflicting inferences. In other words, the actor's conduct must always be gauged in relation to all the other material circumstances surrounding it and if such other circumstances admit of a reasonable doubt as to whether such questioned conduct falls within or without the bounds of ordinary care then such doubt must be resolved as a matter of fact rather than of law. (Cf. Peri v. Los Angeles Junction R. Co. (1943), 22 Cal.2d 111, 120, 137 P.2d 441; Pokora v. Wabash R. Co. (1934), 292 U.S. 98, 105, 54 S.Ct. 580, 583, 78 L.Ed. 1149, 1155, 91 A.L.R. 1049, 1054; Gregg v. Western Pac. R. Co. (1924), supra, 193 Cal. 212, 224, 223 P. 553; Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co. (1911), 160 Cal. 237, 240, 116 P. 513; Wessling v. Southern Pac. Co. (1931), 116 Cal.App. 447, 450, 451, 3 P.2d 22; Ogburn v. Atchison, etc., R. Co. (1930), 110 Cal.App. 587, 594, 294 P. 491.)

[6,7] It is settled in this state that "A railroad company will not be permitted to encourage persons to relax their vigil concerning the dangers that lurk in railroad crossings by assuring them, through the erection of safety devices, that the danger has been removed or minimized, and, at the same time, to hold them to the same degree of care as would be required if those devices had not been provided. [Citations.] This does not mean that a person approaching a guarded crossing may blindly rely upon the absence of warning by a watchman, or the silence of an automatic signal, and proceed without further regard for his own safety." (Will v. Southern Pac. Co. (1941), 18 Cal.2d 468, 474, 116 P.2d 44, 47.)

[8] Here it does not appear that plaintiff exercised no care whatsoever; i. e., that he drove blindly ahead, heedless of his own safety. He testified that he looked at the tracks before he turned. He slowed the speed of his truck and shifted to a lower gear. His other testimony indicates that he was not oblivious of his surroundings and that he had in mind the relationship of Berry Street and the traffic thereon to the railroad tracks and the traffic over them. While he was on Seventh Street, he could not have seen the engine merely by looking to his left because it was behind him. Whether he could have seen it even by looking backward over his shoulder is not clear. Behind the rear window of the cab of his truck was mounted a concrete mixer about 10 feet high, that is, higher than the cab itself. The near edge of the window in the left door of the cab was about 4 inches in front of plaintiff. Thus it may be that before he turned plaintiff could have seen the engine only by leaning forward, putting his head out the side window, and looking back. Whether no reasonable man exercising ordinary care, about to traverse a busy metropolitan crossing customarily guarded by two flagmen, having the knowledge of the locality which plaintiff possessed, driving the truck which plaintiff was operating, and under the other circumstances shown here, would fail to adopt such mode of observation is a question of fact for a jury, not one of law for a court. In the Koch case (supra, 148 Cal. 677, at page 680, 84 P. 176, at page 177, 4 L.R.A.,N.S., 521, 113 Am.St.Rep. 332, 7 Ann.Cas. 795) the court declared: "Of course, in any case such as this, where it is shown that a plaintiff has exercised some care, the question whether or not the care actually exercised was due and sufficient, will always be a matter for determination by the jury." The majority of the court held that upon the facts in that case the plaintiff had failed to exercise any care whatsoever. Chief Justice Beatty, dissenting, differed from his associates, not fundamentally in the law but rather in his view and interpretation of the evidence. The rule which we follow in our view of the evidence has already been stated. We entertain no doubt that the record before us, insofar as the doctrine of the Koch case is concerned, presents a factual question requiring submission to the jury.

Pertinent in the surrounding circumstances of the instant case, it is to be noted that only after plaintiff turned, passing the momentary obstruction of the small flagman's shelter, did he have available a direct view of the tracks to his left. (Plaintiff completed his turn between 10 and 30 feet from the first main line track, depending upon whether he "cut the corner," as discussed infra.) His prior observation had disclosed no train or engine; his present observation disclosed nothing which he interpreted as a warning. He may well have regarded the presence of a flagman at the side of the street with his stop sign under his arm as a greater indication of safety than the absence of a flagman. In his belief that one flagman would not be absent from sight and the other engaged in childish play if danger was imminent, plaintiff may have been "deceived by appearances calculated to deceive an ordinarily prudent man." (Sheets v. Southern Pacific Co. (1931), 212 Cal. 509, 514, 299 P. 71, 73.) We do not say that plaintiff's failure to look to his left as he turned onto the tracks and before he was blinded by the mirror flash is or is not excused; that is a question of fact. In the circumstances there appears no "standard of conduct * * * so obvious as to be applicable to all persons." (Chrissinger v. Southern Pacific Co. (1915), 169 Cal. 619, 624, 149 P. 175, 177; see, also, Fernandes v. Sacramento City Railway Co. (1877), 52 Cal. 45, 50.)

[9] Defendants argue that plaintiff's own testimony shows he "cut the corner" in violation of section 540(b) of the Vehicle Code, St.1935, p. 184 which conduct was negligent per se; that had he turned properly he would have had a direct view of the tracks for several more feet before he came upon them. Although plaintiff did testify that he "cut the corner" and although he so indicated his course on a diagram of the intersection, he also testified that he was "coming right in the center, right over the manhole"; "I was coming right near to the manhole; I was going right over that." It appears from defendants' Exhibit 5 that the manhole was in the center of the intersection. This conflict in the testimony of plaintiff, like any other conflict in the evidence, in conformity with the above mentioned rule governing appeals from judgments of nonsuit, must be resolved in favor of plaintiff's case. But assuming that plaintiff did "cut the corner," whether his violation of the Vehicle Code section was a proximately contributing cause of the collision is under the circumstances depicted, a question of fact. (See Sheets v. Southern Pac. Co. (1934), 1 Cal.2d 408, 412, 413, 35 P.2d 121; Crawford v. Southern Pacific Co. (1935), 3 Cal.2d 427, 433, 45 P.2d 183.)

[10] Defendants point out that although there is general testimony that the neighborhood was noisy, there is no evidence that any locomotive except the one which struck plaintiff was moving in the yards at the time of the collision or that there was any other noise which would have prevented plaintiff's hearing the sound of the locomotive's operation except that made by his own truck, which was within his control. To silence the sound of the truck, however, it would have been necessary, not only that plaintiff stop to avoid the noise of travel over the rough cobblestone street, and turn off the truck motor, but also that he turn off the engine which kept the drums of the concrete mixer constantly revolving. If the drums of the mixer were not kept revolving the concrete would tend to dry and set and freeze the drums so that they could not be operated. It may be doubted whether these suggested precautions would be taken by the ordinarily careful driver in the circumstances.

[11] Plaintiff argues that the flashing of the mirror into his eyes caused him to bring his vehicle to a stop upon the track, which he might otherwise have cleared in safety. Defendants urge that the incident of the mirror could have had no causal connection with the accident since from plaintiff's own testimony it appears that the light shone only at the very instant of collision, after he had negligently driven onto the track. Plaintiff testified, "As I stopped, that second I was hit by a train. * * *". We are not satisfied that his testimony of immediacy of the collision after stopping of the truck completely precludes the possibility that the mirror flash which blinded him and caused him to stop on the track may have caused him to stop just in time to be struck by the engine. There would necessarily be some appreciable interval of time between the flashing of the mirror and the translation of such stimulus into stoppage of the truck. That defendants' interpretation of the incident may appear more probable than plaintiff's is a consideration not within the province of a reviewing court. Certainly the incident is not one so within the range of common experience that its solution is obvious.

Defendants further contend that there is no evidence identifying the man supposed to have flashed the mirror as the flagman Darrough. Plaintiff testified, "I saw this fellow over here (indicating), with that signal under his arm, playing with a mirror, and it shone right in my eyes, and I stopped"; also, "I * * * saw this other flagman on the other side that was playing with the mirror. He had his stop sign under his arm, with his little flag * * *". Furthermore Darrough was in court and apparently was the person indicated by plaintiff. Darrough himself testified that he was the flagman on the far side of the tracks at the time of the accident.

While he denied that he was playing with a mirror it is obvious that the evidence amply supports a contrary conclusion.

As stated above, plaintiff contends that, even had he seen the approaching engine, he could have assumed, in the absence of a signal and in the light of the other circumstances shown, that it was safe to cross. Defendants call attention to plaintiff's testimony that he knew the first two tracks (of the group of five) were main line tracks, and argue that he must have known that no switching operations take place on the main line tracks, that had he seen the engine he would have known from the fact that it was proceeding on a main line track that it was not a switch engine but a road engine on its way to the roundhouse south of Berry Street and hence would not stop short of the crossing. Since plaintiff admittedly did not see the engine, it is not necessary to discuss these conflicting contentions as to what would have been reasonable conduct on plaintiff's part had he seen it, identified the track it was on, and drawn the deductions suggested. Inasmuch as it is a question of fact as to whether plaintiff was contributively negligent in failing to see or hear the engine at all, the case must go to the jury on that theory and for determination of that fact.

The judgment of nonsuit is reversed.

GIBSON, C. J., and SHENK, CURTIS, EDMONDS, and CARTER, JJ., concur.

TRAYNOR, Justice (dissenting in part).

I concur in the judgment. I cannot subscribe, however, to the view that when a jury determines standards of care in negligence cases it is simply finding facts. It is a question of law what the rule or standard of conduct should be for adjudging the actions of men as lawful or unlawful and for determining the consequences of those actions. A question of fact relates to what acts or events have occurred or what conditions exist or have existed. See Thayer, Preliminary Treatise on Evidence at The Common Law, 183-262. Questions of fact in this country, where there is a constitutional right to a jury trial, are for the jury, while questions of law are ordinarily for the judge. In the field of negligence it is common practice for the jury to determine not only the facts but the standard of conduct to be applied within the compass of the rule that the conduct prescribed must be that of a reasonably prudent man under the circumstances. To determine whether given conduct should impose liability or bar a recovery is to make law. If the court has formulated a standard of reasonable conduct that is applicable to the case, the jury's sole concern is to determine whether a person's conduct has met that standard, a question of fact. If the court has not formulated such a standard, it becomes the jury's responsibility to do so, and thereafter to determine whether a person's conduct has met that standard. The decision as to whether the standard should be fixed by the court or left to the jury rests with the appellate courts and turns upon whether the jury would be at an advantage in arriving at a standard by virtue of being a cross-section of the community and therefore representative of the community views and attitudes. See Clinkscales v. Carver, 22 Cal.2d 72, 136 P.2d 777; Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657, 664, 84 U.S. 657, 664, 21 L.Ed. 745; *Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Whether a water system is a public utility subject to regulation of railroad commission depends on character of the business. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 6386, § 52(d).

5. Waters and water courses ⇨202

Mere fact that a person furnished with in a limited area a portion of his water supply to a certain number of consumers, each individually receiving use and benefit of the water and paying an agreed sum as a monthly rate, did not of itself prove the waterworks to be a "public utility" subject to regulation of railroad commission. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 6386, § 52(d).

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Public Utility".

6. Dedication ⇨41

Dedication of property to a public use is never presumed without evidence of unequivocal intention.

7. Waters and water courses ⇨202

Evidence supported finding that water distributing system which was covered by deed of trust securing note was not a public utility subject to regulation of railroad commission, and hence order of railroad commission authorizing note and deed of trust was not required. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 6386, § 52(d).

8. Appeal and error ⇨78(3)

An order striking from the files a cross-complaint against one not otherwise a party to the action was a "final judgment" from which an appeal would lie.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Final Judgment".

9. Appeal and error ⇨356

Where appeal was not taken from order striking from files a cross-complaint against one not otherwise a party to the action, and appeal from judgment for plaintiff against defendant was taken after time for taking appeal from such order had expired, appeal as to cross-complainant would be dismissed.

Appeal from Superior Court, of Stanislaus County; B. C. Hawkins, Judge.

Action by Dora B. Trask against Joseph A. Moore and another to quiet title to water distributing system, for an accounting, and other relief, wherein the defendants filed a cross-complaint against Edward Ealey. From a judgment for plaintiff and cross-defendant, the defendants and cross-complainants appeal.

Attempted appeal as to cross-defendant dismissed, and judgment in favor of plaintiff affirmed.

Prior opinion 140 P.2d 73.

T. B. Scott and Nathan B. McVay, both of Modesto, for appellants.

Herbert E. Paul, of Modesto, for respondent.

Francis O. Hoover, of Modesto, for cross-defendant and respondent.

CURTIS, Justice.

The defendants appeal from a judgment quieting title in the plaintiff to "that certain water distributing system including the pipes, situate in the Modesto High School Tract now in the possession of defendants and formerly connected to wells and pumping plants located upon Lots 7 and 8 in Block 'D' and Lots 22 and 23 in Block 'B' of the Modesto High School Tract"; directing the defendants to "reconnect the said pipes and the said distributing system to the aforesaid wells and pumping plants in as nearly as possible the manner in which the same were at the time the defendants disconnected the same"; and decreeing that the "plaintiff is entitled to an accounting by defendants of all moneys received by said defendants from the operation of said pipes and distributing system from November 18, 1940, to the date of reconnection * * * as herein ordered." The notice of appeal further recites that the defendants as cross-complainants appeal from the judgment in favor of the cross-defendant Ealey.

There is no dispute concerning the material facts of this case: On February 21, 1939, and for several years prior thereto, the cross-defendant Ealey was the owner of the four lots mentioned in the judgment as situated in the Modesto High School

Tract, an unincorporated residential district adjacent to the city of Modesto. Upon this property were located two wells and pumping plants from which there extended a series of pipes furnishing water to approximately seventy neighboring homes at a monthly rate. On the date mentioned Ealey executed to the plaintiff as security for his promissory note a deed of trust covering these four lots "together with the rents, issues and profits thereof; also all appurtenances including water rights in which trustor may have an interest, whether represented by stock of any water company or otherwise, benefiting the property herein described." Thereafter, and on March 1, 1939, Ealey sold these same lots to the defendants Moore, and by a separate conveyance he transferred to them the water distributing system. Upon default in the payment of the aforesaid promissory note the property was sold under the deed of trust, the plaintiff became the purchaser thereof at the sale, and the trustee's deed was executed and delivered to her on November 18, 1940. Some six months prior to these foreclosure proceedings the defendants Moore had disconnected the water distributing system from the pumping plants on the premises in question and attached it to a well and pumps installed on other lands owned by them. Under these circumstances the plaintiff brought the present action to have the distributing system reconnected and for an accounting with respect to the defendants' operation thereof since the date of her purchase of the property at the trustee's sale. The portion of the distributing system here involved lies entirely outside of the bounds of the lots described in the deed of trust and consists largely of pipes and mains placed in the streets and alleys of the Modesto High School Tract.

The trial court's findings and its judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff, as in part above noted, establish that it took the following view of this case: (1) That the distributing system involved, although lying without the limits of the land described in the deed of trust, passed to the plaintiff as an appurtenance of the lots which she purchased at the trustee's sale; and (2) that while "the Railroad Commission of the State of California did not authorize Ealey to execute said note and said deed of trust on said property," the distributing system in question was not a public utility so as to require the commission's order of authorization prior to the valid execution of the security instruments. Public Utilities Act, § 52(d), Stats. 1915, p. 115, 152, as amended, Deering's Gen. Laws 1937, Act 6386, p. 3167. Application of settled legal principles to the undisputed facts disclosed by the record herein sustains the trial court's decision as premised upon the above two determinative points.

[1] The first matter for consideration is the interest in the water system acquired by the plaintiff under the deed of trust. It appears from the record that for some time prior to the date of execution of said security instrument the water piping system in question had been annexed and physically connected with the pumping plants on Ealey's lots; that the piping as laid throughout the streets and alleys was merely an extension and continuation of the apparatus for the production and distribution of the water supply—a part of it, and not separable from it without destroying the efficiency of the whole; and that the waterworks as so constructed were functioning as an integrated system when the loan arrangements between the plaintiff and Ealey were consummated, as above detailed. Appurtenances are things belonging to another thing as principal and which pass as incident to the principal thing. 1 Bouv. Law Dict., Rawle's Third Revision, Appurtenances, page 224. Here the principal thing was the pumping works, and the piping system attached thereto was an incident to the main machinery—the pumps and the wells. Such pipe extension was necessary to the enjoyment of the principal thing and indispensable in the supply of water to the neighboring homes in the tract. By being so joined and essential to the function of the apparatus as a whole, the distributing system contained and combined in itself all of the elements and attributes of a fixture or appurtenance to real estate. Civ. Code, § 662; 6 C.J.S., Appurtenance, page 133, et seq.

Analogous considerations as to structural appendages were involved in the case of Western Elec. Co., Inc., v. Colley, 79 Cal. App. 770, 775, 251 P. 331, 333, where it was stated that "a power line, consisting of poles set in the ground and wires strung thereon, would pass as appurtenant to one's land upon the owner executing a conveyance of the soil upon which the poles of the power line stood or were imbedded." In line with this principle are cases from other jurisdictions holding that electric transmission lines and similar structures, though extending beyond the real estate upon which the mechanical plant is situated, constitute an appurtenance to the plant so as to be encumbered by a lien attaching to the realty: Wells v. Christian, 165 Ind. 662, 76 N.E. 518; Badger Lumber Co. v. Marion Water, etc., Co., 48 Kan. 182, 29 P. 476, 15 L.R.A. 652, 30 Am.St.Rep. 301; Roebbling's Sons Co. v. Nebraska Electric Co., 106 Neb. 255, 183 N.W. 546; Hughes v. Lambertville Electric Light, etc., Co., 53 N.J.Eq. 435, 32 A. 69; Dreisbach v. Ross, 195 Pa. 278, 45 A. 722; National Foundry & Pipe Works v. Oconto Water Co., C.C., 52 F. 43; Stearns Lighting & Power Co. v. Central Trust Co., 6 Cir., 223 F. 962, 139 C.C.A. 442. Thus, the fact in the present case that the water pipes and mains were laid in various streets and alleys will not change their character or make them any the less an appurtenance to the mentioned Ealey premises. The record herein does not touch in any way upon Ealey's authority—either affirmatively or negatively—for so laying the piping system in the tract in question. However, his ownership of the system as originally installed was in nowise disputed, and it must be assumed that the distributing appendages were rightfully laid as essential parts of the entire enterprise.

Similarly, where questions as to the property characteristics of a water distributing system have arisen in connection with tax assessment problems, the courts have declared the pipes, mains and hydrants of a water company to be appurtenant to and taxable with the real estate where the main works are located. City of Pasadena v. Los Angeles County, 182 Cal. 171, 187 P. 418; Oskaloosa Water Co. v. Board of Equalization of City of Oskaloosa, 84 Iowa 407, 51 N.W. 18, 15 L.R.A. 296; State ex rel. Sedalia Water Co. v. Harnsberger, 322 Mo. 94, 14 S.W.2d 554; Joplin Waterworks Co. v. Jasper County, 327 Mo. 964, 38 S.W.2d 1068. Thus, in the Sedalia Water Co. case the matter is discussed as follows (322 Mo. at page 105, 14 S.W.2d at page 557): "In this case the water mains in the streets of Sedalia are practically worthless considered as personal property, separated from the soil. They are 'necessary to the full enjoyment of the property.' The plant located upon the land of the relator [water company] would be absolutely worthless without the pipes and the pipes would be worthless without the plant which supplies them with water. They are appurtenant.

'An appurtenance is a thing used with and related to or dependent upon something else which is its principal.' Words and Phrases. There could be no case in which one thing is more completely dependent upon another for its value and utility than the water mains are dependent upon the plant which supplies them with water."

[2] Thus upon both reason and authority the water distributing system here in question was appurtenant to the Ealey lots upon which the pumping works were located. As a general rule, a conveyance of property carries with it by implication all incidents rightfully belonging to, and essential to the full enjoyment of, such property at the time of conveyance. 26 C.J.S., Deeds, § 106, p. 386, et seq. In this state, under authority of section 1084 of the Civil Code, incidents and appurtenances to lands pass with a transfer thereof unless expressly excepted. 9 Cal.Jur. § 152, p. 286. That the plaintiff and Ealey in executing the deed of trust here involved, intended the appurtenances to Ealey's lots to be encumbered under the terms of that instrument is manifest from the specific inclusion therein of "all appurtenances * * * benefiting the property herein described." There was no need for direct reference to the water piping system in order to have it covered by the language of said deed of trust, and Ealey's subsequent property negotiations with the defendants could not affect the plaintiff's rights established under the security instrument. The propriety of the plaintiff's claim here is emphasized when considered in relation to the legal principles applied in the disposition of the case of Harper v. Buckles, 19 Cal.App.2d 481, 65 P.2d 947, an action to quiet title to all water rights and pumping equipment appurtenant to real property claimed through first and second encumbrances upon the land. No part of the water system there in question had been constructed at the date of the first deed of trust, but a considerable portion of it was built between that time and the date of the second deed of trust. For a recitation of the rules of law governing such factual situation the court referred to the case of Stanislaus Water Co. v. Bachman, 152 Cal. 716, 93 P. 858, 15 L.R.A., N.S., 359 and quoted therefrom as follows (19 Cal.App.2d at pages 484, 485, 65 P.2d at page 949):

[3] "The rights of Bachman under the agreement are the same as those of Threlfall.

"It is immaterial that the mortgages of Threlfall's land, under which Bachman acquired title, were executed before Threlfall obtained the water right. The water right, when acquired, became an easement appurtenant to the land (Farmer v. Ukiah Water Co., 56 Cal. (11) 13) and passed with it, upon the foreclosure sale in the same manner as any other appurtenance or fixture passes with the title and possession of land. (Civ.Code, §§ 1084, 1104; Cave v. Crafts, 53 Cal. (135) 140; Farmer v. Ukiah Water Co., 56 Cal. (11) 13; Cross v. Kitts, 69 Cal. (217) 221, 10 P. 409, 58 Am.Rep. 558; Smith v. Corbit, 116 Cal. (587) 591, 48 P. 725.) It was an incident of the land and would pass as such by a conveyance of the land, without express mention and without any reference thereto, such as by the use of the word "appurtenances" or otherwise. A conveyance of land upon a foreclosure sale must of necessity, at least as between the parties to the mortgage, carry with it a water right appurtenant to the land acquired and used by the mortgagor for the benefit of the land although obtained after the execution of the mortgage and before the sale or foreclosure. We are cited to no authority for or against this proposition, and have not succeeded in finding any relating to it, but from the nature of the case it must be correct. Fixtures subsequently attached to mortgaged land pass to the purchaser at foreclosure sale, although not mentioned or referred to in the mortgage. Merritt v. Judd, 14 Cal. (59) 72; 2 Jones on Mortgages, § 1657; 1 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 255. The same rule applies to improvements made by the mortgagor on mortgaged land. 1 Jones on Mortgages, §§ 147, 681; Union Water Co. v. Murphy's Flat F. Co., 22 Cal. (620) 631; Tibbetts v. Moore, 23 Cal. (208) 215. We are unable to perceive any material difference in principle, in this respect, between fixtures and improvements attached to or erected upon land and a water right attached to land as an appurtenance, such as that here involved, and we hold that it is governed by the same rules."

The Harper opinion then continues (19 Cal.App.2d at page 486, 65 P.2d at page 950): "When we apply the principles thus announced to the facts of the instant case, the conclusion follows that the water system constructed between the dates of the first and second deeds of trust became appurtenant to the land and became incumbered by the first deed of trust. It follows that as an appurtenance to the land, title passed to defendant at the time of the trustee's sale, and the execution of the trustee's deed to him as the lien of the first trust deed was prior and superior to the lien of the second."

Here, in contrast to the factual situation prevailing in the Stanislaus and Harper cases supra, the water system in question was in place and functioning as a valuable adjunct to the Ealey premises when the deed of trust was executed by Ealey and the plaintiff. Upon the basis of legal principles governing the passage of title to appurtenances under a conveyance of the land, there would seem to be no practical difference between a piping system constructed to convey water to said land for use thereon and a piping system installed to convey water from said land, as part of the mechanical apparatus located on the premises. In either event the piping system is incident to and necessary to the beneficial enjoyment of the land so as to follow a transfer of the realty unless expressly excepted. In the light of this reasoning the conclusion is inescapable that the water distributing system here in question was covered by the plaintiff's deed of trust on the Ealey lots; that her title to the encumbered property was established by her purchase at the trustee's sale; and that the defendants were properly directed by the trial court to reconnect said piping system to the pumping works on said lots and to render an accounting to the plaintiff as specified in the judgment.

[4-7] Nor is the plaintiff's position available upon the ground that the water system as maintained by Ealey was a public utility and subject to the order of the Railroad Commission, which admittedly did not authorize the security arrangements made with respect to the Ealey premises. Whether or not a water system is a public utility depends on the character of the business. Van Hoosear v. Railroad Commission, 184 Cal. 553, 555, 194 P. 1003. The trial court, in rendering a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, impliedly found from the meager evidence on the issue that Ealey's operation of his water plant for the purpose of supplying water to his neighbors in the residential tract did not establish its dedication to a public use, and therefore any property negotiations affecting such water system was wholly a matter for private contract and of no concern to the Railroad Commission. The record is entirely consistent with such conclusion. The mere fact that a person furnishes within a limited area a portion of his water supply to a certain number of consumers, each individually receiving the use and benefit of the same and paying an agreed sum as a monthly rate, does not of itself prove the waterworks to be a public utility. While such conduct shows the enterprise to be a business proposition, rather than a mere accommodation or a neighborly act, in the sense that there is a monetary consideration for the service, it does not necessarily establish a dedication of property to public use. Richardson v. Railroad Commission, 191 Cal. 716, 721, 218 P. 418; Klatt v. Railroad Commission, 192 Cal. 689, 701, 221 P. 926. "To hold that property has been dedicated to a public use is 'not a trivial thing' ([City and County of] San Francisco v. Grote, 120 Cal. [59] 60, 52 P. 127, 41 L.R.A. 335, 65 Am.St.Rep. 155), and such dedication is never presumed 'without evidence of unequivocal intention.'" Niles v. City of Los Angeles, 125 Cal. 572, 58 P. 190. * * * Allen v. Railroad Commission, 179 Cal. 68, 85, 175 P. 466, 473, 8 A.L.R. 249. In the condition of the evidence as hereinabove outlined, the trial court's determination of the point in the plaintiff's favor is not open to attack.

[8, 9] Turning now to the attempted appeal from the judgment in favor of the cross-defendant Ealey, the following facts appear from the record. A cross-complaint was filed against Ealey and he was brought into the action as a cross-defendant by permission of the court. On January 15, 1942, in the course of the trial, the court made an order striking the cross-complaint from the files. The judgment was rendered on May 11, 1942, and it contains by way of recital only the statement "the cross-complaint having been stricken from the files upon motion of the cross-defendant." Notice of appeal was filed on July 17, 1942 and it purports to appeal only from the judgment entered on May 11, 1942.

The order of January 15, 1942, striking the cross-complaint from the files was as to Ealey the cross-defendant, not otherwise a party to the action, a final and appealable judgment. Howe v. Key System Transit Co., 198 Cal. 525, 246 P. 39; Young v. Superior Court, 16 Cal.2d 211, 105 P. 2d 363; Halterman v. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., 22 Cal.App.2d 592, 71 P.2d 855. The notice of appeal, even if liberally construed as an attempt to appeal from the order of January 15, 1942, was filed too late. Code Civ.Proc. § 939.

The attempted appeal as to the cross-defendant Ealey is dismissed. The judgment in favor of the plaintiff is affirmed.

Action by Lucy R. Rinker, administratrix of the estate of William Henry Rinker, de-

McCOMB, Justice.

From a judgment in favor of defendant after trial before the court without a jury in an action to have certain real and personal property declared to be property of the estate of plaintiff's decedent, plaintiff appeals.

Plaintiff, administratrix of the estate of William Henry Rinker, was married to decedent on December 3, 1931. On June 2, 1933 they separated. After separation decedent's only source of income was a pension which he received from the Federal Pension System for postal employees. With this income he paid bills which had been contracted during the time he and plaintiff were living together; paid his living expenses; and entered into certain transactions with defendant, his daughter by a former marriage. At the time of decedent's death, defendant took into her possession personal property belonging to her father consisting of a Pontiac automobile, a Buick automobile, a kitchen stove, and cash in the sum of $5.

The Pontiac automobile was repaired by defendant at a cost of $50 and was sold for $200; the Buick was sold for $25; and the kitchen stove was sold for $5. The net value of decedent's personal property which defendant took into her possession was $185. Defendant paid funeral expenses of her father amounting to $360.01 and certain debts totaling $4.29. She filed a claim against his estate for $364.30.

The trial court gave judgment in favor of defendant quieting title in her as to the real property described in the complaint and to the personal property of decedent, of which she had taken possession, on condition that defendant would release and satisfy her claim against decedent's estate. Defendant did release her claim against the estate of her father.

Plaintiff urges reversal of the judgment on three propositions which will be stated and answered hereunder seriatim:

First: A preponderance of the evidence is against the findings of the trial court.

[1] This proposition is untenable, for the rule is established that it is not sufficient ground for reversal of a judgment for an appellant to point out or to even demonstrate to an appellate court that a finding is against the preponderance of the evidence; he must show that there is not any substantial evidence to sustain the questioned finding. (Meyer v. Great Western Ins. Co., 104 Cal. 381, 386, 38 P. 82; Goodwin v. Franich, 37 Cal.App. 493, 494, 174 P. 83.)

Second: The judgment is not supported by competent evidence.

[2] This proposition is likewise untenable. The rule is established that when an appellant contends that there is not any substantial evidence to sustain a finding of fact he must point out in his brief the (a) evidence,¹ (b) particular finding claimed to be unsupported,² and (c) show wherein the evidence does not sustain the questioned finding;³ otherwise the finding of the trial court is presumed to be correct and not erroneous and it will be upheld by an appellate court.

In the present case plaintiff has failed to show the particular finding or findings that he claims are unsupported by the evidence or wherein the evidence does not sustain the findings.

Third: The pleadings do not permit a judgment quieting title in defendant to the property described in the complaint.

[3] This proposition is untenable for the reason that defendant in her answer set forth the facts upon which she predicated relief and in the prayer of her answer she asked for general relief.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

Affirmed.

Charles Murstein, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Wolfson, Swetow & Essey, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

McCOMB, Justice.

This is an appeal by defendants from a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, after trial before the court without a jury, in an action to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff, Judith Arlene Goldberg, a minor, as a result of having been bitten by two dogs which belonged to defendants.

The evidence being viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiffs (respondents), the essential facts are:

On May 5, 1943, while crossing the intersection of Livonia and Pickford streets, public highways in Los Angeles, two dogs owned by defendants attacked Judith Arlene Goldberg, a minor nine years of age, and bit her, causing numerous bruises and lacerations on her body.

Defendants rely for reversal of the judgment on two propositions which will be stated and answered hereunder seriatim:

First: There was not any substantial evidence to sustain the trial court's findings that:

a) The minor plaintiff sustained "two (2) wounds about one and one-half (1½) inches apart on posterior surface of the right leg at the junction of the distal and middle thirds."

b) The minor plaintiff was given sulfanilamide; and

c) Defendants permitted their dogs wrongfully and negligently to go at large without being properly guarded or confined.

[1] This proposition is untenable.

a) Dr. Herbert L. Herscher who attended the injured plaintiff testified as follows:

"I can't recall the exact location of each laceration unless I have my notes because it is impossible for a physician to note the location which is unimportant in treatment. This girl came to the office with a bruise on her right elbow, laceration about two and one-half (2½) inches long on the calf of her leg, about two and one-half (2½) inches long on the lateral side of the leg below the knee, laceration about one (1) inch long in the medial side of the right leg, two (2) small lacerations which connected under the skin half-way from the ankle to the middle third of the leg. A deep laceration to the left of the vagina and a small abrasion of the left leg. That is the extent of her injuries."

The foregoing testimony clearly sustains the first finding which defendants question.

b) Dr. Herscher also testified:

"We gave this little girl an anaesthetic, cleansed these wounds thoroughly and did the proper amount of removal of dead tissue, sutured the lacerations and inserted drains in the other ones, gave the girl tetanus antitoxin to prevent lockjaw, sent her home with her leg elevated and administered sulfanilamide."

This testimony sustained the second finding attacked by defendants.

c) Under the so-called Dog Bite Statute of 1931* the owner of any dog which bites a person who is lawfully in a public or private place is liable for any damage suffered by the injured party regardless of whether the owner of the dog has wrongfully or negligently permitted his dog to be at large without being properly guarded.

[2] It is also settled that if a judgment is supported by findings which are unobjectionable, findings on immaterial issues which are unsupported by evidence do not constitute grounds for reversal of the judgment. (Martinelli v. Luis, 213 Cal. 183, 185, 1 P.2d 980; Shreve & Co. v. McGinnis, 7 Cal.App.2d 243, 245, 45 P.2d 364; Grenshaw v. Roy c. Seeley Co., 129 Cal. App. 627, 633, 19 P.2d 50.)

In view of the foregoing rules it is unnecessary to consider whether there is substantial evidence to sustain the third finding questioned by defendants.

Second: The trial court erred in excluding testimony proffered by defendants which would have tended to show that defendants' dogs were not vicious.

[3] This proposition is also untenable.

Under the Dog Bite Statute of 1931,* supra, the (1) former viciousness of a dog causing injuries, or (2) owner's lack of knowledge of such viciousness, is immaterial. (See statute cited in the footnote. See also Delay v. Braun, 63 Cal.App.2d 8, 146 P.2d 32.

In view of the provisions in the statute the trial court's ruling was correct.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

Appeals from Superior Court, San Diego County; Edward J. Kelly, Judge.

Personal injury action by Cynthia C. Hill against James R. Fowble, Jr., Dorothy Boyer Fowble, Carl L. Whittenton and Glenn Pearson, both individually and as copartners doing business as Pearson Motor Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, James R. Fowble, Jr., appeals, and from judgment in favor of Carl L. Whittenton and Glenn Pearson individually and as copartners, the plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

C. Rupert Linley and Clarence Harden, both of San Diego, for appellant and respondent Cynthia C. Hill.

Paul Nourse, of Los Angeles, for appellant James R. Fowble, Jr.

Gray, Cary, Ames & Driscoll and John N. Cranston, all of San Diego, for respondents Carl L. Whittenton and Glenn Pearson.

MARKS, Justice.

There are two appeals from a judgment in favor of plaintiff against Dorothy Boyer Fowble in the sum of $10,000, and James R. Fowble, Jr., in the sum of $5000, and in favor of Carl L. Whittenton and Glenn Pearson, copartners, doing business under the firm name of Pearson Motor Company, which we will refer to as Pearson, as we will refer to Dorothy Boyer Fowble as Miss Boyer. At the time of the accident here involved, Dorothy Boyer was engaged to James R. Fowble, Jr., and they were married shortly thereafter.

The action grew out of a collision between an automobile being driven by Miss Boyer and one in which plaintiff was riding. No question is raised as to the negligence of Miss Boyer nor to the amount of damages awarded.

The appeal of the plaintiff is from the portion of the judgment in favor of Pearson and is precautionary. Plaintiff states that she is satisfied with the present judgment, but if the judgment against Fowble should be reversed the portion thereof in favor of Pearson should be reversed so that its liability could be determined at a second trial.

Miss Boyer was driving a 1941 Ford at the time of the accident. It was owned either by Fowble or Pearson. She was driving it with the consent of the owner so the important question argued and to be decided is which one of these two defendants was the owner of the car on December 14, 1941, the date of the accident.

In October, 1941, Fowble was the owner of the Ford and desired to trade it in on a 1942 model. He and Miss Boyer went to the place of business of Pearson and discussed a trade. Fowble had to make a business trip east and desired to take delivery of the new car at Dearborn. The agent of Pearson was not certain of being able to make such delivery nor of being able to get the necessary priority for the sale.

Before Fowble left on his trip he gave Miss Boyer authority to determine the color of the new car, its upholstery and other such details. He left the 1941 Ford with her to use during his absence. There is no argument made that she was acting as his agent in driving the car at the time of the accident. Miss Boyer carried on certain negotiations for the purchase of the new car after Fowble left.

Pearson obtained the priority for the purchase of the new car and learned that delivery could be made in Dearborn. A purchase order was prepared for the new car which was delivered to Miss Boyer will a bill of sale which was entirely in blank. The purchase order was dated November 19, 1941, and stated the price of the new car at $1395.78, trade in value of the 1941 Ford at $1180, and that the balance was to be paid under a conditional sales contract.

Miss Boyer sent these documents with the pink slip of the 1941 Ford to Fowble who signed and returned them all to her. She delivered them all to Pearson during the latter part of November, 1941. Miss Boyer testified concerning a conversation at that time with the representative of Pearson as follows: "We discussed that, and at that time it had been previously understood, and we discussed it, that I was to keep the '41 Ford until my fiancée returned with the 1942 Ford. We discussed that and it was thoroughly understood. They said it was all right with them."

The new Ford was delivered to Fowble in Dearborn on December 12, 1941. There was some communication by telephone between Miss Boyer and a representative of Pearson which she described as follows: "A. That was not what I called him about, but during the conversation I said, 'I will be coming to San Diego—that week end. I don't remember whether that call took place on Thursday, or when, but I knew that Saturday morning I was coming to San Diego and I told him at that time. I could turn in the car if they wanted it. He told me—asked me if I still needed the car. I told him yes, that I still needed it but that I would turn it in then. He said, 'Well, when will your fiancée be home?' I said, 'Probably—I am expecting him either on Sunday or Monday, the first of the week.' He said, 'Well, that is such a short time, you might as well keep it.'"

Miss Boyer drove the car from El Centro to San Diego on December 13th, and the accident happened the next day on the return trip.

The foregoing evidence is undisputed with the exception that the agent of Pearson denied giving Miss Boyer permission to use the 1941 Ford until Fowble returned from the east with the new car.

Shortly after the accident Fowble conferred with the representative of Pearson. This resulted in a new contract for the sale of the 1942 Ford and the trade in of the 1941 car. A second purchase order was executed apparently on December 17, 1941. The selling price of the new car was $1395.78, as before, but no price was fixed on the old car. The following appears in the order: "Payable Ford 41 conv. coupe to come in trade at agreeable amount." Under date of January 2, 1942, Pearson prepared a car invoice in which the trade in allowance for the 1941 Ford was fixed at $465.68. The balance of the purchase price was borrowed by Fowble on a conditional sales contract.

Counsel for Fowble argue that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that his client was the owner of the 1941 Ford at the time of the accident because, (1) he had made a bona fide sale of the car to Pearson, (2) the ownership certificate (pink slip) had been endorsed and delivered to Pearson, and (3) the car had been delivered to Pearson. Based on the foregoing premise counsel draws the conclusion that Pearson and not Fowble was the owner of the 1941 Ford at the time of the accident.

Fowble relies on sections 178, 180, 186 of the Vehicle Code, St.1935, pp. 115, 116, St.1941, p. 2095, as they existed at the time of the accident, and on subdivisions 1 and 3 of section 1763 of the Civil Code to support his contention. He argues that a bona fide sale of the 1941 Ford was made by the first contract signed in November, 1941; that the pink slip was regularly endorsed by Fowble and delivered to Pearson on November 23, 1941; that delivery was made by Miss Boyer, a third person in possession of the car, when she offered to deliver it to Pearson. (Sec. 1763, Civil Code.) It is argued that Miss Boyer was in possession of the car as bailee; that she attorned to Pearson before the accident by offering to deliver the car to Pearson as soon as it desired thus recognizing its title and that she held the car for the buyer which satisfied the requirements of subdivision three of section 1763 of the Civil Code and completed the delivery to Pearson. Plaintiff admits the endorsement and delivery of the pink slip in November, 1941, but disputes the completed sale under the contract of November, 1941, and argues that there was no delivery of the car prior to the accident.

[1] Counsel for all parties seem to agree that there are three elements necessary to complete a sale of a motor vehicle to a dealer who holds it for resale: (1) A bona fide contract of sale; (2) endorsement and delivery of the pink slip, and (3) delivery of the car. Fowble argues that as the Vehicle Code is silent on the question of when the delivery of a motor vehicle is deemed complete we must look to the provisions of the Civil Code to decide that question. Plaintiff argues that the provisions of the Vehicle Code are complete and determine the manner in which title to a motor vehicle can be transferred and being legislation on a special subject control over the general provisions of the Civil Code.

The question is an interesting one but we find it unnecessary to decide it. We will assume, without holding, that the provisions of the Civil Code defining what constitutes delivery of personal property when sold, are applicable here.

It seems clear to us, as it did to the trial court, that the contract of November 1941, was never fully consummated by the parties. The sale of the two cars was finally made under another contract and upon entirely different terms from those set forth in the first contract. The selling price of the 1942 Ford was the same in both contracts. The trade in value of the 1941 Ford was fixed in the first contract at $1180 and at $465.68 in the second. The balance to be paid under a conditional sales contract was $265 in the first contract, and $1107.72 in the second. The instalments to be paid under the first contract were $22.09 per month for twelve months, while they were $61.54 per month for eighteen months under the second. The sale was completed under the second contract executed after the accident and not under the first.

[2] If Pearson was the owner of the 1941 Ford at the time of the accident and Miss Boyer was bailee, the law fixed the rights and remedies of the parties. Where personal property is in the possession of a bailee and it is damaged through the negligence of the bailee the loss falls upon the owner who may recover his damages from such bailee. Baugh v. Rogers, 24 Cal.App.2d 200, 148 P.2d 633. Thus if the contract of November, 1941, had been fully executed, Pearson was the owner of the 1941 Ford and the loss resulting from its injury in the accident would fall on Pearson with the right to recover its loss from Miss Boyer, its bailee. If that contract had not been executed, Fowble was the owner of the car on December 14, 1941, and the loss resulting from the damage to the 1941 Ford would fall on him with the right to recover that damage from Miss Boyer. By contract of the parties formally made after knowledge of all of the facts the loss was placed on Fowble.

Section 1738 of the Civil Code provides as follows:

"(1) Where there is a contract to sell specific or ascertained goods, the property in them is transferred to the buyer at such time as the parties to the contract intend it to be transferred.

"(2) For the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the parties, regard shall be had to the terms of the contract, the conduct of the parties, usages of trade and the circumstances of the case."

[3-6] The practical construction placed on a contract by the parties, by their conduct and actions in executing it, is often considered strong evidence of what was intended by its provisions. Skousen v. Herz, 135 Cal.App. 116, 26 P.2d 498. In the instant case the conduct of the parties after the accident, in placing the damage loss to the 1941 Ford on Fowble, is at least some evidence showing an intention of the parties that title to the 1941 Ford was not to be passed by the first contract, so that Fowble and not Pearson was its owner on December 14, 1941. At least this conduct furnishes a foundation for the reasonable inference drawn by the trial court that title had not passed and that Fowble was the owner of the car at the time of the accident. Where the trial judge has drawn a reasonable inference from competent evidence, the appellate court is not permitted to draw a contrary inference in order to reverse the judgment. Rovengo v. San Jose K. of C. Hall Ass'n, 108 Cal. App. 591, 291 P. 848. On appeal it is the duty of the reviewing court to draw such reasonable inferences from the evidence as support the judgment. Mah See v. North American Acc. Ins. Co., 190 Cal. 421, 213 P. 42, 26 A.L.R. 123. It follows that the finding by the trial court, to the effect that Fowble was the owner of the 1941 Ford at the time of the accident and that it was being driven by Miss Boyer with his consent, has sufficient evidentiary support and is final and conclusive here.

[7] Fowble urges error in a ruling made by the trial court in sustaining an objection made by counsel for Pearson to a question propounded to Miss Boyer, asking her if she was ready and willing to turn the 1941 Ford over to Pearson when she came to San Diego on December 13th.

It clearly appears from Miss Boyer's testimony that she was willing to turn the car over to Pearson at any time Pearson so desired, after the 1942 Ford had been delivered to Fowble at Dearborn. Assuming, without holding, that the ruling was error, it was without prejudice as the fact of her willingness was made perfectly plain to the court.

The judgment is affirmed.

NAND SINGH v. CORBIN.

Civ. No. 7030.

Sac. No. 5641.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

June 27, 1944.

1. Appeal and error ⇐931(1)

On appeal from judgment in favor of plaintiff, evidence must be considered in its aspect most favorable to plaintiff, giving plaintiff the benefit of all favorable inferences therefrom.

2. Landlord and tenant ⇐323

Evidence supported finding that plaintiff was employed by defendant in production of rice crops on defendant's land, so as to entitle plaintiff to recover for his services rendered and for money advanced in payment of others for labor performed in production of the crops, as against contention that plaintiff was a sharecropper.

3. Appeal and error ⇐1010(1)

Where there is ample evidence to sustain trial court's findings and judgment, they will not be disturbed on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; W. T. Belieu, Judge.

Action by Nand Singh against George R. Corbin to recover for labor and services rendered and money advanced by plaintiff to defendant. From a judgment for plaintiff, the defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

U. W. Brown, Neil J. Cooney, and John H. O'Donnell, all of Colusa, and Percy Napton, of Woodland, for appellant.

Duard F. Geis, of Willows, and Timothy I. O'Reilly, of San Luis Obispo, for respondent.

ADAMS, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiff and respondent, Nand Singh, brought this action, alleging that defendant was indebted to him for labor and services rendered and money advanced by him to defendant. His claim was that during the years 1935 to 1939, inclusive, he worked for defendant with his own farming equipment in preparing, irrigating and harvesting rice and other crops grown in part on lands owned by appellant and in part on lands leased by appellant from others, and that during said period he advanced moneys to appellant or for his benefit, mainly in payment for labor performed by others in the production of the rice crops.

Appellant and defendant, Corbin, denied plaintiff's allegations and claimed that during all of the years above mentioned his rice lands and those leased by him from others were leased to Nand Singh upon a share cropping basis, the agreement being that Nand Singh should furnish his own equipment and materials and the labor necessary for the production and harvesting of rice, and should pay to Corbin, as rental, one-third of the crops produced.

The action was tried by the court sitting without a jury, and resulted in a judgment for plaintiff. Defendant has taken this appeal on the sole ground that the evidence fails to support the findings that during the period under consideration plaintiff was employed by defendant and that the relationship of landlord and tenant did not exist between the parties during such years.

In support of his contentions appellant relies upon his own testimony that plaintiff had during previous years leased defendant's land, and that he leased it during the period in controversy; also upon evidence that plaintiff hired, paid and fed the help used in his operations, that plaintiff claimed an interest in the rice crops, that, when harvested, the rice was separated into piles of one-third and two-thirds thereof, that plaintiff bought fertilizer, and that defendant had taken title to plaintiff's engine as security for plaintiff's indebtedness to defendant.

Respondent, in reply, points out evidence showing that appellant raised other crops besides rice upon his lands; that he leased lands from others for rice culture; that he warehoused all crops, including rice, solely in his own name; that he mortgaged and sold such crops; that he intermingled the proceeds of rice sales with those of other crops and with his other income in one bank account in his own name; that he kept all parity, conservation and benefit payments received from the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, though under the law such payments were required to be divided between landlord and tenant when that relationship existed; that defendant never kept books of account disclosing the relationship of landlord and tenant between himself and plaintiff, or giving plaintiff credit for any part of the proceeds of rice crops sold, and never accounted to plaintiff therefor; that he personally negotiated all contracts for harvesting, hauling and warehousing of the rice; that he frequently gave orders to men working in the rice; and that he never produced any book entries showing any charges against plaintiff for seed purchased by defendant, for interest on money borrowed by plaintiff, or for bills for threshing, sacks, twine, etc., which would have been chargeable to plaintiff had he been the owner of the crops.

We have read the entire record and the testimony shows without conflict that plaintiff owned and operated a tractor and other farming equipment and that he was experienced in farming, especially in the production of rice; that defendant was engaged in general farming including the growing of rice, alfalfa and barley, and that he owned certain lands and at times leased the lands of others for farming operations but that he had no adequate equipment for his operations. Plaintiff himself testified that during the years 1935 to 1939, inclusive, he plowed, dragged and disked rice land for defendant at an agreed price per acre, using his own equipment; that he also sometimes cultivated a portion of defendant's land for the production of barley or alfalfa or corn at an agreed price per acre; that he cut and bound rice with his own tractor and binder, and sometimes, but not always, threshed the rice; that he also repaired levees on defendant's lands at an agreed price per hour, using his own equipment; that at times, at Corbin's request, he hired others to assist him, and advanced their wages at defendant's request; that he also had an agreement with Corbin to receive wages of $125 per month for sowing and irrigating rice for a part of each year, plaintiff to use his own truck and pay for the gasoline used therein; that from time to time Corbin paid him sums of money, and sometimes bought groceries for him, and furnished him with butter; that he never had any written agreement with Corbin, that the latter kept the books and plaintiff did not. He also testified that in 1920 and 1921 he and his brother leased land from Corbin, but that neither of them ever had a lease thereafter; that in 1934 he had a settlement with Corbin and received a check for $1,000, but that there had been no settlement since that time; that he was not a rice partner with Corbin.

While defendant denied the statements of plaintiff and testified that he leased his lands to plaintiff, he admitted that there was no written lease, that all the rice was stored in defendant's name and sold by him, that he deposited the proceeds of sales of the rice in his own bank account with his other funds, that at times he borrowed moneys on his warehouse receipts for the rice, that the books kept by him showed no entries in favor of plaintiff but only charges for moneys or goods advanced to plaintiff, and that he collected and kept all the soil conservation benefits resulting from the rice operations.

[1, 2] Considering the evidence in its aspect most favorable to plaintiff and giving him the benefit of all favorable inferences therefrom, as this court must do, it cannot be said that there is insufficient evidence to sustain the judgment of the trial court. Macaulay v. Booth, 53 Cal.App.2d 757, 761, 128 P.2d 386; De la Motte v. Ricker, 55 Cal.App.2d 226, 229, 130 P.2d 444; High v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 52 Cal.App.2d 701, 709, 126 P.2d 911, 127 P.2d 588; Nichols v. Southern Pacific Co., 58 Cal.App.2d 91, 97, 136 P.2d 332; Norgard v. Estate of Norgard, 54 Cal.App.2d 82, 89, 128 P.2d 566; Porter v. Signal Trucking Service, 59 Cal.App.2d 289, 293, 138 P.2d 753.

[3] Furthermore, the arguments made here were fully presented to the trial court on a motion for a new trial which, as stated by the trial court in denying said motion, was based on the sole contention that the evidence was insufficient to justify the decision and that the evidence preponderated in favor of defendant. That court was in a better position than we are to judge of the credibility of the witnesses and the weight to be given to the evidence, and there being ample evidence to sustain its findings and judgment, they may not be disturbed on this appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

DULIN v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.
Civ. 14448.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.
June 27, 1944.

1. Workmen's compensation ☞1192

Under Workmen's Compensation Act authorizing Industrial Accident Commission to adopt rules of procedure, to regulate manner of representation of minors and incompetent persons, and to appoint a trustee or guardian ad litem to appear for such person, commission is vested with discretion to proceed through medium of a general guardian appointed by court, if one is or has been appointed, or to appoint a guardian by order of the commission to represent the guardian in the premises. St.1937, p. 292, § 5307.

2. Limitation of actions ☞72(1)

The provision of Code of Civil Procedure to effect that statutes of limitation do not commence to run until minor attains majority has reference only to actions mentioned in limitation provisions of such code. Code Civ.Proc. § 352.

3. Workmen's compensation ☞50

In determining whether six months' limitation on time for commencement of proceedings under Workmen's Compensation Act applied to a minor who at time of injury was the ward of a general guardian, provision that no limitation should run against a minor until a guardian or trustee is appointed was to be read with provision authorizing Industrial Accident Commission to appoint a trustee or guardian ad litem to represent a minor. St.1937, pp. 292, 295, 296, §§ 5307, 5405, 5408.

4. Workmen's compensation ☞1212

Under provision of Workmen's Compensation Act that no limitation of time should run against a minor until a guardian or trustee was appointed and provision authorizing Industrial Accident Commission to appoint trustee or guardian ad litem to represent any minor, the exception to running of limitations applied only to appointment of a guardian or trustee by Industrial Accident Commission, and fact that a general guardian had been appointed for minor employee prior to injury did not render such employee subject to limitations provision of the act. St.1937, pp. 292, 295, 296, §§ 5307, 5405, 5408.

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Garry Dulin, a minor, etc., opposed by the workmen's compensation insurance carrier. To review an order and award of the Industrial Accident Commission and order denying the applicant's petition for rehearing, the applicant petitions for a writ of review.

Order and award and order denying petition for rehearing annulled and case remanded.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Everett A. Corten, Atty. for Industrial Accident Commission, and Fred G. Goldsworthy, Asst. Atty., both of San Francisco, and G. W. Winbigler, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

DORAN, Justice.

In the answer to the petition herein for a writ of review of the action of the Industrial Accident Commission, respondent commission summarizes the undisputed facts as follows:

"On July 2, 1942, petitioner was employed at Alhambra, California, by Kay-Brunner Steel Products, Inc., a corporation. At that time petitioner was 18 years of age, having been born September 2, 1923. While so employed he sustained an injury to his right elbow which injury the respondent commission found occurred in the course of and arose out of his employment.

"On January 5, 1943 petitioner filed with the respondent commission his application for adjustment of his claim for compensation, in which application he was represented neither by guardian nor by attorney.

"At the request of the applicant, hearing upon his application was delayed. The matter came on for hearing on August 4, 1943, at which time the applicant was represented by counsel. Good cause appearing, the commission appointed the applicant's counsel, John Henry Peckham, Jr., guardian ad litem. The affirmative defense of the statute of limitations was pleaded by the defendants.

"Upon cross-examination by counsel for the workman's compensation insurance carrier the applicant disclosed that his mother had been appointed guardian of his person and of his estate prior to the time of his injury. He further testified that he lived with his mother and that she was aware of the fact of his injury.

"A certified copy of letters of guardianship was filed in evidence, disclosing that Jane Stimson Dulin had been appointed general guardian of the minor applicant for compensation, the letters having been issued by order of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County on February 8, 1938, and that the said letters had not been revoked and were in full force and effect on and subsequent to July 2, 1942, which was the date of injury.

"Upon this evidence the respondent commission made its order dismissing and discharging from the proceedings the guardian ad litem theretofore appointed. The commission concluded that at the time of injury, namely, July 2, 1942, the minor applicant had been under no legal disability because of his minority, since at that time, and subsequent thereto, he had been a ward of the general guardian appointed by the Superior Court. His application for compensation having been filed more than six months subsequent to the date of injury, and no compensation benefits having been provided nor any agreement entered into to provide such benefits, the commission held that the claim of the applicant was barred by the period of limitations provided in sec. 5405(a) of the Labor Code [St.1937 p. 295]."

The record reveals, in the petition for appointment of the guardian, that such proceedings were required in connection with the disposition of an interest in an insurance policy accruing in favor of said minor Garry Dulin. The petition was dated September 1, 1937, and the order appointing the mother of said minor as guardian was dated October 6, 1937.

Respondent commission submits the question involved to be as follows: "Is a minor employee, who suffers an industrial injury during the period of minority, under legal disability within the meaning of Labor Code section 5408 when at the time of injury he is the ward of a general guardian, duly appointed qualified and acting?"

The controversy herein results from a disagreement as to the meaning and construction of section 5408 of the Labor Code of California, St. 1937, p. 296. Said section is as follows: "If an injured employee or, in the case of his death, any of his dependents, is under twenty-one years of age or incompetent at any time when any right or privilege accrues to such employee or dependent under this division, a general guardian, appointed by the court, or a guardian ad litem or trustee appointed by the commission or a commissioner may, on behalf of the employee or dependent, claim and exercise any right or privilege with the same force and effect as if no disability existed. No limitation of time provided by this division shall run against any person under twenty-one years of age or any incompetent unless and until a guardian or trustee is appointed. The commission may determine the fact of the minority or incompetency of any injured employee and may appoint a trustee to receive and disburse compensation payments for the benefit of such minor or incompetent and his family." (Italics added)

It is contended by petitioner "that a reasonable interpretation of Section 5408 of the Labor Code of the State of California and one which will not result in discrimination against any class of minors is that the provisions thereof are prospective and anticipate the appointment of a general guardian by a court or a guardian ad litem or trustee by the commission after a minor has received a compensable injury, for the purpose of representing him and pressing his rights with reference to that particular injury, and that under such an interpretation, the claim of your petitioner herein is not barred by Section 5404 of the Labor Code of the State of California [St.1937, p. 295]. It is further submitted that this construction is a liberal construction, conforms to the mandates of the Constitution of the State of California and the Legislature, and is entirely consistent with all other provisions of the Labor Code."

It is not disputed by respondent that either a general guardian or a guardian ad litem appointed by the commission may present the claim of an injured minor. But, it is argued by respondent, "In the event a guardian shall have been appointed by the court then no jurisdiction exists in the commission to appoint a guardian ad litem for the purpose of prosecuting before it a claim for workmen's compensation benefits," and, therefore, "it follows that since in this present case the court had appointed a guardian of the estate of the injured employee, Garry Dulin, and that the Letters of Guardianship had not been revoked and were in full force and effect at the time the injury was sustained and at all material times subsequent thereto, Garry Dulin was privileged, by and through his guardian, to prosecute his claim for compensation at any time within six months of date of injury. A guardian having been appointed and acting for Garry Dulin at the time of his injury, he was not at such time under legal disability, and the limitation of time provided by sec. 5405(a) of the Labor Code commenced to run from the date of injury in the same manner and to the same extent as it would had Garry Dulin been an adult when injured."

[1] The contention of the respondent commission cannot be upheld. There can be no conflict in jurisdiction between the court and the respondent commission with regard to proceedings before the commission affecting the claim of a minor. Section 5307 of the Labor Code St.1937, p. 292, provides that the commission may: (a) Adopt reasonable and proper rules of practice and procedure. (b) Regulate and provide the manner in which, and by whom, minors and incompetent persons are to appear and be represented before it. (c) Appoint a trustee or guardian ad litem to appear for and represent any minor or incompetent upon the terms and conditions which it deems proper. Reading the foregoing provisions of section 5307 in the light of the provisions of section 5408, supra, and bearing in mind the function of construction with regard to preserving the effectiveness of code provisions, the conclusion is inevitable that the commission is vested with a discretion to proceed through the medium of a general guardian appointed by the court, if one is or has been appointed, or appoint a guardian by order of the commission, to represent the guardian in the premises.

[2] As to the effect of the statute of limitations, there can be no conflict here either. In connection with the subject of guardian and ward under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, section 352 thereof provides in part as follows: "If a person entitled to bring an action, mentioned in chapter three of this title, be, at the time the cause of action accrued, either: 1. Within the age of majority; * * * The time of such disability is not a part of the time limited for the commencement of the action." Thus the general rule to the effect that the statutes of limitation do not commence to run until the minor attains majority is clearly established. But such rule has reference only to "an action mentioned in chapter three of this title." For a discussion of this subject, see Aronson v. Bank of America N. T. & Savings Ass'n, Cal.App., 65 P.2d 823.

Section 5405 of the Labor Code provides for the period of time within which proceedings may be commenced to obtain the benefits covered by the Workmen's Compensation Act. So far as it affects the status of petitioner herein, the limitation is six months from the date of injury. However, as noted above, section 5408 provides that "No limitation of time provided by this division shall run against any person under twenty-one years of age or any incompetent unless and until a guardian or trustee is appointed." Thus, with regard to the rights of minors accruing by virtue of the labor code, a disability is created, but not "unless and until a guardian or trustee is appointed".

[3,4] In order to determine the meaning and purpose of this last quoted language, it need be read only in connection with related provisions of the Labor Code. It should be emphasized at this point that section 5408 is concerned with three separate and distinct subjects. The first sentence determines who may present the claim of a minor; the second is concerned only with the subject of limitations and the third vests the commission with power to determine the fact of minority, etc. Both section 5408 and section 5307 appear in part four of Division Four of the Labor

Code under the heading "Compensation Proceedings." Read together, it is at once evident that the language, "Unless and until a guardian or trustee is appointed," refers to the "trustee or guardian" mentioned in paragraph (c) of section 5307, supra. This being true, and there having been no guardian or trustee appointed by the commission, petitioner was under no disability in the circumstances.

For the foregoing reasons, the order and award of the Industrial Accident Commission and the order thereof denying the applicant's petition for a rehearing are, and each of them is hereby, annulled; and the case is remanded for further proceedings before the commission in accordance with the views herein expressed.

McCARTHY v. SUPERIOR COURT, IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al.

No. 12640.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.
June 22, 1944.

I. Prohibition ⚡32

Petitioner for a writ of prohibition prohibiting superior court, sitting in probate, from enforcing by execution or contempt proceeding an order theretofore made, was not entitled to modification of the writ to include provision fixing and allowing damages, where petition for writ did not by allegation or prayer ask for damages. Probate Code, §§ 613-615.

2. Prohibition ⚡30, 35

The Code provisions authorizing prevailing party to recover damages and costs, with proviso that where respondent is a state, county, or municipal officer, all damages and costs awarded shall be recovered against state, county, or municipal corporation represented by such officer and not against such officer, do not apply to prohibition proceeding against superior court to restrain erroneous exercise of judicial power in litigation to which state is not a party and in which it is not interested. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 1095, 1105.

3. Prohibition ⚡30, 35

Though judge of superior court is a "state officer", and common practice is to join him as party to mandamus or prohibition proceeding arising out of matter pending or determined in court over which he presides, it is superior court itself that is respondent in such proceedings, and superior court is not a "state, county, or municipal officer" within statute providing that prevailing party may recover damages and costs, but that where respondent is a state, county, or municipal officer, damages and costs shall be recovered against the state, county, or municipal corporation represented by such officer and not against the officer. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 1095, 1105.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "State, County or Municipal Officer" and "State Officer".

KNIGHT, Justice.

On May 23, 1944, a peremptory writ of prohibition was granted by this court prohibiting the Superior Court in and for the City and County of San Francisco from enforcing by execution or contempt proceedings an order theretofore made by said court in the exercise of its probate jurisdiction in a proceeding instituted therein under the authority of sections 613, 614 and 615 of the Probate Code (McCarthy v. Superior Court, 149 P.2d 55); and on June 6, 1944, the applicant for the writ gave notice of motion to modify the decision granting the writ by adding thereto a provision fixing and allowing damages including attorneys' fees, and an allowance of costs amounting to $337. It is petitioner's contention that he is entitled to such allowances by virtue of the provisions of section 1095 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which by section 1105 of the same code are made applicable to prohibition proceedings.

Section 1095 reads as follows: "If judgment be given for the applicant, he may recover the damages which he has sustained, as found by the jury, or as may be determined by the court or referee, upon a reference to be ordered, together with costs; and for such damages and costs an execution may issue; and a peremptory mandate must also be awarded without delay; provided, however, that in all cases where the respondent is a state, county or municipal officer, all damages and costs, or either, which may be recovered or awarded, shall be recovered and awarded against the state, county or municipal corporation represented by such officer and not against such officer so appearing in said proceeding, and the same shall be a proper claim against the state, or county, or municipal corporation for which such officer shall have appeared, and shall be paid as other claims against the state, county or municipality are paid; but in all such cases, the court shall first determine that the officer appeared and made defense in such proceeding in good faith." From the foregoing provisions it will be seen that if the motion is granted the award of damages and costs must be paid by the state.

[1, 2] The motion in our opinion should be denied. The denial of the claim for damages might well be placed alone upon the ground that nowhere in his petition for the writ, either by way of allegation or prayer, did petitioner ask for damages. Colthurst v. Fitzgerald, 56 Cal.App. 740, 206 P. 471. However, aside from that point, and as to both damages and costs, we are of the opinion that the provisions of section 1095 have no application to a proceeding such as this, brought against a superior court to restrain the erroneous exercise of judicial power in litigation between private individuals, to which the state is not a party, in which it is in no way interested, and wherein it has no right of representation. In a certiorari proceeding brought against the superior court it was held that the successful petitioner was not entitled to invoke the benefit of the general code sections allowing costs to the prevailing party (Platnauer v. Superior Court, 33 Cal.App. 394, 165 P. 41); and the provisions of the code sections there considered are equally as broad in their terms as section 1095. At the time the decision in that case was rendered, section 1038 (now section 1028 as amended) provided that when the state is a party and costs are awarded against it, they must be paid out of the state treasury; and in holding adversely to the contention there made by the petitioner the court said in part: "* * * this is not the ordinary action to which said sections of the code apply. It [the proceeding] was directed against a court of record for the purpose of reviewing a judicial determination of that tribunal. In such cases the court is not liable for damages or for costs."

[3] Moreover, the language used in framing section 1095 supports the view above expressed. As will be noted, the right to damages and costs thereunder is made available "in all cases where the respondent is a state, county or municipal officer * * *"; and while it is true that a judge of the superior court is deemed to be a state officer and the common practice is to join him as a party to a mandamus or prohibition proceeding which has arisen out of a matter pending or determined in the court over which he presides, it is the tribunal itself, the superior court, that is the respondent in the mandamus or prohibition proceeding, and the writ if issued is directed against the superior court. The real respondent is the court, and it is not a "state, county or municipal officer" within the meaning of section 1095.

Where the state is the real party in interest to the special proceeding or to the litigation out of which such proceeding has arisen, and the state is represented therein by a state officer appearing in behalf of the state, a different situation is presented; but it is inconceivable that the Legislature ever intended that the state should be held liable in damages and for costs for the erroneous exercise of judicial power by a court in hearing and determining litigation between private individuals to which the state is not a party, in which it has not the slightest interest, and has no right of representation.

In support of the motion, petitioner relies mainly on the cases of Gould v. Moss, 158 Cal. 548, 111 P. 925; Union Trust Co. v. Superior Court, 13 Cal.2d 541, 90 P.2d 582, and Ringel v. Superior Court, 56 Cal. App.2d 334, 132 P.2d 516. But the precise point here presented was not in those cases.

considered or decided. All that was decided therein was that after the judgment or decision of a reviewing court has become final it is not subject to alteration or modification. In each of those cases the party seeking to invoke the provisions of section 1095 filed his motion after the judgment or decision had become final, and it was upon that ground the motion in each case was denied.

The motion is denied.

Hearing Granted Aug. 24, 1944.

1. Judgment ⇨518

A seasonable motion to vacate judgment is a direct attack upon the judgment.

2. Judgment ⇨304, 355

Ordinarily, trial court for the purpose of correcting judicial errors may not set aside or amend a judgment previously entered by it, but entry of judgment in disregard of a statute forbidding its entry is in the nature of an inadvertent rather than a judicial error, and may be corrected by court which entered judgment.

3. Judgment ⇨346

A judgment which is erroneous in the sense that it ought not to have been entered at all against a particular party or under certain circumstances may be set aside on a motion timely made for that purpose.

4. Appeal and error ⇨4

Dismissal and nonsuit ⇨65

Judgment ⇨141

The duty imposed by statute of dismissing an action where no answer has been filed and plaintiff has failed to have judgment entered within three years after service of summons must be exercised by court on its own motion if defendant does not request such action, and error in entering judgment in disregard of such statute may be corrected on appeal or on timely motion to set aside the judgment. Code Civ.Proc. § 581a.

5. Judgment ⇨141

Trial court had jurisdiction on motion filed within time allowed for appeal to vacate as against nonanswering defendant a judgment entered upon his default and written stipulation between plaintiffs and other defendants, where judgment was entered more than three years after service of summons on nonanswering defendant in disregard of statute requiring court under such circumstances to dismiss the action. Code Civ.Proc. § 581a.

6. Dismissal and nonsuit ⇨45, 63

Statute authorizing court in its discretion to render judgment against one of several defendants, leaving action to proceed against other defendants where a several judgment is proper, does not limit application of statute requiring dismissal of action where defendant has not answered and plaintiff has failed to have judgment entered within three years after service of summons to cases in which no defendant has filed an answer, but where there are several defendants, dismissal is required as to any defendant who has not answered, but only as to him. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 579, 581a.

7. Stipulations ⇨17(2)

That plaintiffs entered into stipulation for judgment with certain defendants fixing one boundary of land in belief that they were obtaining valid judgment against nonanswering defendant fixing boundary on the other side, did not preclude vacation of judgment as against nonanswering defendant on ground that it was not entered within three years after service of summons on him. Code Civ.Proc. § 581a.

8. Stipulations ⇨17(2)

Stipulation for judgment between plaintiffs and certain defendants should not bind nonanswering defendant who was not a party to such stipulation.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; L. N. Turrentine, Judge.

Action by William E. Phillips and wife against Alvin A. Trusheim and others to quiet title to realty. From an order vacating judgment as to named defendant entered upon his default and dismissing the action as to him, plaintiffs appeal.

Order affirmed.

Vincent Whelan, of San Diego, for appellants.

Lindley & Higgins, of San Diego, for respondent.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

This is an appeal from an order vacating a judgment as to one of the defendants and dismissing the action as to him. The plaintiffs owned 80 acres of land in San Diego County. The defendant Trusheim owned 80 acres adjoining this property on the east, and the defendants Caldwell owned 80 acres adjoining it on the west. While this action was quiet title in form its purpose was to determine the east and west boundaries of plaintiffs' property.

The complaint was filed on December 10, 1938. The defendants Caldwell filed an answer on December 15, 1938. The default of defendant Trusheim was entered on January 6, 1939. For some reason another return of service on him was made and his default again entered on March 30, 1939. The defendant Trusheim was adjudged an incompetent and a guardian appointed on February 2, 1940. On June 28, 1940, there was filed on his behalf a notice of motion to vacate his default based upon the grounds named in section 473, C.C.P. This was accompanied by a proposed answer. Not only was this filed more than six months after the entry of the default, but the motion was never made in court and no permission was ever obtained to file the proposed answer.

Nothing having been done in the meantime a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs was entered on September 25, 1942, based upon a written stipulation between the plaintiffs and the defendants Caldwell, and upon the default of the defendant Trusheim. The judgment defined the boundaries of the plaintiffs' property and quieted title against all of the defendants as to the property so defined and described. A writ of possession was then issued against the defendant Trusheim and served.

On November 12, 1942, the defendant Trusheim filed notice of a motion to recall and quash the writ of possession, to vacate the judgment that had been entered and to dismiss the action as to him. The hearing of this motion was continued from time to time. An amended notice of motion was filed setting forth as additional grounds therefor that the court had neither power nor jurisdiction to enter a judgment against Trusheim at the time of its attempted entry, and that more than three years had then elapsed since the service of summons on him. The motion was finally heard on affidavits and on May 13, 1943, the court made and filed an order granting the motion, vacating the judgment as to the defendant Trusheim and dismissing the action as to him. This order was based upon findings that summons was served on Trusheim on March 12, 1939; that his default was entered on March 30, 1939; that no answer had been filed on his behalf; that the plaintiffs had failed to have a judgment entered within three years after the service of summons on him; and that the judgment was entered more than three years after the service of summons on this defendant. From the order so made the plaintiffs have appealed.

The appellants contend that this motion could not have been granted under section 473, C.C.P., since it was made too late and was not accompanied by a proposed answer, that the trial court had jurisdiction to enter judgment against a defaulting defendant more than three years after he was served with a summons, and that since the court had such power any errors which appear could not be attacked by a motion to set aside a judgment made on the ground that the court lacked jurisdiction to enter the judgment. In making the latter contention the appellants ignore the fact that the order in question was not based upon any lack of jurisdiction in entering the judgment, but was based on the ground that the judgment was entered after three years had elapsed from the time summons was served on the respondent.

[1-3] It may be conceded that this motion could not have been granted under section 473, C.C.P. Hunt, Mirk & Co., Inc., v. Hesperides Min. Co., 200 Cal. 382, 253 P. 317. It may be further conceded, for the purposes of this opinion, that a trial court has jurisdiction to enter such a judgment after the lapse of three years from the date summons was served. See, Lynch v. Bencini, 17 Cal.2d 521, 110 P.2d 662. But it is well settled that a seasonable motion to vacate a judgment is a direct attack upon the judgment. City of Los Angeles v. Glassell, 203 Cal. 44, 262 P. 1084; Shelley v. Casa De Oro, Ltd., 133 Cal.App. 720, 24 P.2d 900. While, ordinarily, errors of law are to be corrected on appeal from the judgment and the court having once entered its judgment may not set aside or amend it for the purpose of correcting judicial error (Stevens v. Superior Court, 7 Cal.2d 110, 59 P.2d 988), a distinction or exception is made under some circumstances as, for instance, where the judgment has been entered in disregard of a statute which forbade its entry. This is in the nature of an inadvertence, rather than a judicial error. Where a judgment is erroneous in the sense that it ought not to have been entered at all against a particular party or under certain circumstances it may be set aside on a motion timely made for that purpose. Shelley v. Casa De Oro, Ltd., 133 Cal.App. 720, 24 P.2d 900; Lynch v. Bencini, 17 Cal.2d 521, 110 P.2d 662.

[4] The last paragraph of section 581a, C.C.P., provides that an action must be dismissed if summons has been served and no answer has been filed, where the plaintiff has failed to have judgment entered within three years after the service of summons. In discussing that provision and the duty there imposed upon a plaintiff the court said in Lynch v. Bencini, 17 Cal.2d 521, 110 P.2d 662, 668:

"When the plaintiff fails to perform that duty his rights are affected and a benefit is conferred upon the defendant by the provision that the court must dismiss the action. The duty thus imposed on the court, however, is not confined to where such action is requested by the defendant but is one which the court is required to exercise 'on its own motion.' This statutory provision is clearly intended to apply to cases where the defendant is not yet taking any steps for his own protection. Clearly, under the statute, it is error for the court to fail to perform this duty directly imposed upon it. While a judgment so entered may not be void for lack of jurisdiction the court's error in failing to perform that duty is one which may be corrected on appeal from the judgment, if taken within the statutory time. The duties and rights of the parties are still affected by the last paragraph of section 581a and the judgment itself is still subject to review on a direct and timely appeal. Assuming that the clerk had here a duty to perform in his ministerial capacity, and that he had no power to pass upon the effect of the last paragraph of section 581a, the court had both the power and the duty to do so, the matter was directly presented to it on timely motions after judgment, and the matter is now properly here for review. Under such circumstances the error may be corrected and the judgment, entered and allowed to stand in disregard of the provisions of section 581a, should be reversed."

The appellants argue that the principles of the case just cited are not applicable here since in that case there was an appeal from the judgment. However, that case also involved an order refusing to set aside the judgment and that order was also reversed. In effect, it is argued that the respondent's rights here were limited to an appeal from the judgment or to a motion for a new trial. There could have been no motion for a new trial since no trial was had and the motion to set aside the judgment was an appropriate remedy which was available to the respondent.

[5] The motion here made was a direct attack upon the judgment, made well within the time allowed for an appeal and at a time when the court still had jurisdiction to act with reference to the judgment which had been improperly entered in disregard of a specific duty imposed by the statute. The court acted within its authority and in accordance with the duty placed upon it by the statute in the very matter which we are asked to review. We know of neither principle nor authority which compels an aggrieved party, under such circumstances as here appear, to refrain from seeking relief in the court where a judgment has been improperly entered and to confine himself to an appeal. Such a litigant should not be penalized because he has successfully sought relief in the trial court and thereby made unnecessary an appeal from the original judgment.

[6] The appellants further argue that the last paragraph of section 581a, C.C.P., seems to conflict with section 579, C.C.P., which provides that the court may, in its discretion, render judgment against one of several defendants, leaving the action to proceed against the others whenever a several judgment is proper. It is then argued that, in order to give full effect to section 579, C.C.P., the last paragraph of section 581a should be interpreted as meaning that such an action should be dismissed "only in a case where no defendant has filed an answer." To so hold would be to put something into that statute which was not placed there by the legislature. Under the terms of that statute the right there created in favor of a party who has not appeared is made available to "any party interested," and where there are several defendants the language used would seem to make the provision applicable to any defendants who did not answer and to require a dismissal only as to such defendants.

It is further argued in this connection that the last paragraph of section 581a does not deprive the court of the discretion, conferred by section 579, to hold in abeyance the entry of judgment against a non-answering defendant until the action has been decided as to an answering defendant. If we assume this to be true, no such a situation here appears. If the appellants had attempted to have judgment entered, against the respondent, before the three years had expired and the court had denied their application on the ground that a several judgment was not proper, a different question might have been presented calling for a consideration of the contention thus advanced. In the instant case, the court did not hold the matter in abeyance, no discretion on the part of the trial court was interfered with, nothing occurred which prevented the plaintiffs from carrying out the duty imposed upon them by section 581a, and whatever else it does or does not do section 579 does not confer any discretion on the appellants, as plaintiffs in the action, which would authorize them to disregard section 581a.

[7,8] The appellants dwell at some length upon the equitable considerations involved and accuse the respondent of inconsistency and of seeking to avoid a trial on the merits. It does appear that with respect to the respondent this case should be tried on the merits, a result which would not follow if the appellants were to prevail. While the first application for relief under section 473 C.C.P., was made too late, the grounds and reasons given were such that the application could hardly have been denied if made on time. The appellants state that they are now at a disadvantage because they would not have agreed to the stipulated judgment as between them and the Caldwells had they not thought they were also getting a valid judgment against this respondent. The issues as to the two boundaries were not necessarily connected although the establishment of the correct boundary on one side might well make it easier to establish the correct boundary on the other side. If the true boundary between the appellants' land and that of the Caldwells was correctly established by the stipulated judgment between those parties, the appellants will in no way be prejudiced in any subsequent action which they may bring to establish the boundary between their land and that of the respondent. On the other hand, if that boundary as fixed by the stipulation was not the true boundary on that side the agreement thereon ought not to affect the true boundary on the respondent's side and should not bind the respondent, who was not a party to that stipulation. If the equities were to be considered at all they tend to support the order as made by the trial court rather than the original judgment as entered.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Charles C. Haines, Judge.

Action by Fred Korabek against Weaver Aircraft Corporation and others for declaratory judgment to plaintiff's rights with reference to certain stock of defendant corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Dempster McKee and Edgar A. McNulty, both of San Diego, for appellants.

Sloane & Steiner, of San Diego, for respondent.

GRIFFIN, Justice.

In an amended complaint plaintiff seeks declaratory relief and alleges that prior to September 30, 1940, plaintiff and defendant Weaver were interested and active in procuring the incorporation of the Weaver Aircraft Corporation; that thereafter plaintiff and all of the defendants above named became interested and active in procuring assets and working capital for said corporation; that plaintiff furnished his services and ability in arranging for the incorporation and in negotiating for the "J. L. Weaver License Agreement Weaver Airplane Motors'" for the benefit of such corporation, and advanced the sum of $400 in cash for expenses of incorporation and procuring permit and issuance of stock, payment of franchise tax, etc.; that on September 30, 1940, the Weaver Aircraft Corporation was duly incorporated and organized.

Defendants' answer to the amended complaint sets out a "Memorandum of Promotion Agreement" signed by the four promoters on October 21, 1940. It reads:

"That the undersigned, J. L. Weaver, Tom Keck, Fred Korabek and Robert R. Dunn, Jr., have been engaged and are still associated in promoting a California corporation now holding a charter under the name of Weaver Aircraft Corporation; that they have respectively advanced things of value, including cash, development ideas, personal services and experience, to the welfare of said corporation and for the benefit of its future stockholders, and that they, and each of them, will continue to use their best efforts, aside from their other occupations, and aside from positions in said corporation, to put it on a sound financial and production basis.

"In view of the contribution by the respective parties heretofore made and expected of them hereafter, said parties have agreed that such portion of the capital stock of said corporation as may be allotted and authorized as promotion stock shall be apportioned amongst them in the following ratio:

"J. L. Weaver	50%
"Tom Keck	12-1/2%
"Fred Korabek	25%
"Robert R. Dunn, Jr.	12-1/2%

"Upon issuance of any and all promotion stock, the same shall be made subject to a voting trust on behalf of the owners thereof upon the usual conditions and for a term of years.

"It is contemplated that 49,500 shares of the original block of 99,000 shares to be issued shall be set apart as promotion stock; but whether the same be more or less than the contemplated amount, division thereof shall be made in the proportions specified and stock shall be issued accordingly to the undersigned, their heirs, assigns, or legatees.

"It is contemplated that Tom Keck and Robert R. Dunn, Jr., will receive 5,000 shares of the remainder of such 99,000 shares as payment for which the sum of $5,000 now posted by them shall comprise full consideration. Said sum is to be available for corporation requirements pending receipt of proceeds from general stock sales, but shall be drawn only upon checks signed by said Keck and Dunn as officers of the corporation. Until authorized issuance of such 5,000 shares upon such consideration, said sum of $5,000.00 shall constitute a loan payable by the corporation sixty days after demand."

On October 22, 1940, the defendant corporation, through its Board of Directors, adopted a resolution which reads in part as follows:

"It is further resolved that this corporation accept and take advantage of the services heretofore rendered and arrangements heretofore made by John L. Weaver, Tom Keck, Robert R. Dunn, Jr., and Fred Korabek.

"It is further resolved that the fair value to the corporation in monetary terms for such 'License Agreement Weaver Airplane Motor' and such services and arrangements, is the sum of $49,500 and that upon obtaining proper authority therefor 49,500 shares of the capital stock of this corporation to be issued to said J. L. Weaver, Tom Keck, Robert R. Dunn, Jr., and Fred Korabek in consideration of the matters hereinabove recited, such shares to be accepted by them in lieu of the 49,500 shares and the 7,000 shares referred to in the resolution of the board of directors of this corporation adopted October 7, 1940, and to constitute full payment of all obligations of the corporation to such persons, and either of them."

On October 22, 1940, the following agreement was signed by plaintiff Korabek and defendants Weaver, Keck and Dunn:

"Designation of Share Allotment

"The undersigned hereby agree upon and request authority for issuance of stock of Weaver Aircraft Corporation as follows:

"Promotion stock:

"To John L. Weaver	24,750 shares
Fred Korabek	12,375 "
Tom Keck	9,900 "
Robert R. Dunn, Jr.	2,475 "

In satisfaction of $5,000 advance to the corporation Tom Keck 4,000 shares; Robert R. Dunn, Jr., 1,000 shares."

On October 24, 1940, pursuant to application, the Commissioner of Corporations issued to Weaver Aircraft Corporation a permit. It recites that the corporation was organized for the purpose of engaging in the business of manufacturing and selling airplane parts, etc.; that the corporation will receive a license from Weaver to manufacture and sell an airplane engine known as the "Weaver Pancake Airplane Motor"; that Weaver filed application for letters patent. It then authorizes the issuance of 49,500 shares of promotion stock as consideration for the license agreement described in the application and for promotional and other services rendered by the promoters for applicant and reserves the right to applicant to issue to them under future permits additional shares when and as authorized by the commissioner, as final consideration for said license agreement and for services. Additional conditions were imposed, namely, that none of the shares shall be sold or issued but shall be placed in escrow pending further order of the commissioner; that they shall execute an agreement with the corporation to waive any right to participate in any distribution of assets (except dividends) while said shares are held in escrow and until all other stockholders who have paid cash or its equivalent for their shares shall have received the return of the full amount of the purchase price. The amended complaint then alleges that thereafter the defendant corporation sold and issued to Keck and Dunn an aggregate of 5,000 shares and sold additional shares, at par, for purposes recited in the application. Plaintiff then alleges that all conditions of the permit have been complied with except that defendants failed and refused to issue certificates evidencing the shares of stock to which he is entitled; that the corporation, at all times mentioned, was under the control of Weaver, Keck and Dunn, as a majority of the Board of Directors; and that an actual controversy exists as to the legal rights and duties of the parties and as to the promotion stock. Plaintiff then prays for a declaration of his rights and that the defendant corporation be required to issue to plaintiff 12,375 shares and deposit them with the escrow holder designated, in accordance with the terms of the permit, and asks for general relief.

Defendants admit generally the allegations of plaintiff's complaint, admit the execution of the instruments above mentioned, and in addition thereto allege that the Weaver Aircraft Corporation, on October 7, 1940, adopted a further resolution as follows:

"Resolved that the officers of the corporation make immediate application to the Division of Corporations, Department of Investment, State of California, for leave to issue 99,000 shares of capital stock of Weaver Aircraft Corporation, such shares to be issued subject to the approval of the Corporation Commissioner for the following purposes:

"49,500 shares to J. L. Weaver, Tom Keck, Robert R. Dunn, Jr., and Fred Korabek, in consideration for their services rendered and to be rendered in behalf of the corporation and its affairs;

"7,000 shares to J. L. Weaver in exercise of the option to acquire all manufacturing and distribution rights of Weaver Pancake Airplane Motor;

"42,500 shares to general purchasers at $1.00 per share, cash."

They admit that the corporation sold and issued to Keck and Dunn 5,000 shares and that the corporation issued 23,710 additional shares; and admit that the license agreement described in the application was executed, filed and recorded in the patent office. As a defense to plaintiff's amended complaint they allege that on October 21, 1940, the Weaver Aircraft Corporation entered into a separate "Fiscal Agency Agreement" with the plaintiff reciting that the corporation contemplates issuance of 42,500 shares of its capital stock, at a par value of $1 per share to the general public; that the corporation is in need of the services of an agent; that said Fred Korabek, being experienced, qualified and licensed for such purposes, undertakes to sell the same promptly to the public and bear all expenses in connection therewith; that as compensation therefor the corporation will pay him as said agent a commission of 15 per cent with certain exceptions. Exclusive rights of such sales were given him for a period of six months, but in the event that during such period he did not produce sales to the satisfaction of the directors of the corporation they might appoint another sales agent on like terms. It is then alleged in the answer that as part of the consideration for the issuance to the plaintiff of any promotion stock, he was to perform all of the terms and conditions of the fiscal agency agreement; that plaintiff sold only 3,635 shares of the capital stock of the corporation and that by reason of his failure to make sales in the amount agreed upon the corporation had to borrow large sums of money to carry on its business and that they subsequently, on December 30, 1940, adopted a resolution cancelling his authority as fiscal agent, to take effect January 6, 1941; and that the plaintiff failed to comply with the terms of the "Memorandum of Promotion Agreement" above mentioned.

The trial court then found that on October 22, 1940, the corporation, "for valuable consideration received by it", promised and agreed to issue to plaintiff and the other defendants 49,500 shares of its capital stock as promotion stock, upon approval of the commissioner of corporations; that on October 22, 1940, "for valuable consideration" the parties agreed upon a division of the 49,500 shares, as indicated in their written agreement; that the corporation commissioner issued to the defendant corporation its permit as above described; that the conditions of said permit have been fully complied with and that the corporation selected and designated an escrow holder approved by the commissioner; that thereafter the corporation sold and issued to Keck and Dunn 5,000 shares, and sold and issued additional shares at par for cash in the amount of 23,710; that the corporation has failed to issue any of the 49,500 promotion shares referred to in the permit although it is now entitled to issue such promotion shares in the amount of 28,710; that plaintiff has rendered to said corporation and to said individual defendants the full consideration entitling him to 25 per cent of the promotion stock now issuable and hereafter to become issuable; that the corporation is under the control of defendants Weaver, Keck and Dunn, as a majority of the Board of Directors thereof. The court then concluded that the corporation is authorized and obligated to issue 28,710 shares of promotion stock; that 7,177½ shares thereof should be issued forthwith in the name of Fred Korabek and the certificate thereof should be placed in escrow pursuant to the terms of the permit; that whenever said corporation, in accordance with the terms of such permit, is authorized to issue additional shares of promotion stock, it should issue the same and that 25 per cent thereof should be issued in the name of plaintiff and deposited with the escrow agent.

From this judgment defendants appeal.

In the opening brief defendants raise only two questions. It is first claimed that the form of judgment is in effect either a mandatory injunction or a decree for specific performance, and that therefore the trial court is not authorized, upon the showing that by contract a person is entitled to certain shares, to require, by mandatory provisions of the judgment, the issuance of such shares; second, that plaintiff is not entitled to specific performance of a contract to transfer corporate stock, when there is no pleading or proof that the breach of such contract can be adequately compensated for in damages or in the case where such shares would give control and there is no other stock available. Citing Sec. 3422, Civ.Code; Sec. 526, Code Civ.Proc.; McGarvey v. Hall, 23 Cal. 140; Wehen v. Lundgaard, 41 Cal.App.2d 610, 107 P.2d 491; Dunner v. Hoover, 43 Cal.App.2d 753, 111 P.2d 737; and Glock v. Howard & Wilson Colony Co., 123 Cal. 1, 55 P. 713, 43 L.R.A. 199, 69 Am.St.Rep. 17. The cases cited state that as a general rule equity will not decree specific performance of a contract respecting personal property. Each case cited, however, recognizes that there are exceptions to the general rule where the remedy at law is not adequate. Sec. 3384, Civ.Code. It likewise appears in some of the cited cases, that by reason of the provisions of section 3387 of the Civil Code a presumption prevails in cases of a contract for the transfer of personalty that money damages will provide adequate compensation for a breach.

[1,2] In Krouse v. Woodward, 110 Cal. 638, 42 P. 1084, cited by defendants, the court held that specific performance of a contract for the return of corporate stock will be decreed if there is no other stock available or if the stock has no market or ascertainable value and it was purchased for investment with a view to anticipated increase in value. It is the general rule that the jurisdiction of a court of equity to decree specific performance depends upon the question whether the breach complained of can be adequately compensated in damages, and of course a party who relies upon an exception to a general rule must state in his pleadings the facts which bring his case within it. Senter v. Davis, 38 Cal. 450; Dougherty v. Creary, 30 Cal.

290, 89 Am.Dec. 116; The cases where a delivery of stock is compelled, instead of money damages for its withholding, are almost innumerable, and courts of equity have never hesitated to compel a transfer of stock held by a person in trust for another. Senter v. Davis, supra; Treasurer v. Commercial Coal Mining Co., 23 Cal. 390. The facts of the last-cited cases are so similar to the facts in the present case that we adopt the reasoning there expressed and the conclusion there reached. It is there said, quoting from Justice Story, in his work on Equity Jurisprudence (Vol. 2, sec. 717):

"And the true reason why a contract for stock is not now specifically decreed, is, that it is ordinarily capable of an exact compensation. But cases of a peculiar stock may easily be supposed, where courts of Equity might still feel themselves bound to decree a specific performance, upon the ground that from its nature it has a peculiar value, and is incapable of compensation by damages. Indeed, it has been thought, that on contracts for stock a bill ought now to be maintainable generally in equity for a specific delivery thereof, upon the ground that a Court of Law cannot give the property, but can only give a remedy in damages, the beneficial effect of which must depend upon the personal responsibility of the party."

[3] Our Supreme Court has recently enunciated the rule that "in giving declaratory relief a court has the powers of a court of equity". City of Los Angeles v. City of Glendale, Cal.Sup., 142 P.2d 289, 297.

[4] The facts of the instant case come well within the exceptions to the rule as stated in Tillotson v. Findley, 87 Cal.App. 654, 661, 262 P. 438, 441, as follows:

"Respondent claims that plaintiffs have mistaken their remedy in that they should have proceeded in an action in damages for breach of covenant to convey personal property. Counsel correctly states the law that: 'In general, a court of equitable jurisdiction will not decree the transfer of personal property which has a market value and no special or unique value.' But the record reveals that this company, at the time this case was tried, was a struggling corporation with its success or its degree of success or failure as yet unproved. The facts in the case do not bring it under the principle stated in section 3387, Civil Code."

The stocks referred to in the agreement in the instant case were of undeterminable value and before they were marketable, many conditions attached. The facts of the instant case come well within the exception above stated. See also Fleishman v. Woods, 135 Cal. 256, 260, 67 P. 276.

It has been well established in this state that if the facts alleged in the pleadings and those proved are sufficient to bring a case within the exception and show inadequacy of legal remedy that is enough. Wait v. Kern River Mining, etc., Co., 157 Cal. 16, 23, 106 P. 98. The pleadings and facts established in the present case are sufficient to authorize the judgment given. The cases cited sufficiently dispose of the two questions presented in the opening brief.

Appellants' closing brief, due to the untimely death of Dempster McKee, Esq., able counsel for appellants, was prepared by other counsel. In it, the additional contention is made that there was no consideration passed to the corporation for the contract for delivery of the promotion stock; that there was no consideration given to the corporation under its resolution agreeing to deliver that stock, and that therefore the agreement was unenforceable in this action for declaratory relief. It is argued that according to the weight of authority, a corporation is not under any liability to pay for services rendered or expenses paid or incurred by the promoters in bringing it into existence, unless the charter or statute law otherwise provides, or unless the corporation, after it is formed, and for a sufficient consideration promises or covenants to pay therefor; and that a corporation should not be held bound in equity to deliver stock to a person unless the legal obligation so to do can be clearly shown, citing Rockford Rock Island, etc., Ry. v. Sage, 65 Ill. 328, 16 Am.Rep. 587; Biggart v. Lewis, 183 Cal. 660, 192 P. 437; Pennell v. Lothrop, 191 Mass. 357, 77 N.E. 842; and Williston on Contracts, Revised Ed. 893, et seq.; 18 Corpus Juris Secundum, Corporations, p. 547, §§ 144, 145. It is argued that the preceding authorities in summary hold that before a promoter can recover from a corporation for services performed prior to its corporate entity, he must plead and prove the existence of two binding agreements, one created before the corporate existence, and second, the agreement of the corporation, for a consideration, to compensate the promoter for his services.

[5-7] The evidence discloses, that mostly through plaintiff's efforts as a promoter, the corporation secured the exclusive license rights to "Weaver Pancake Airplane Motors", and "* * * options, commitments for valuable machinery and equipment * * * the services of skilled mechanics" arranged for, and tentative "orders for airplane parts and accessories" and "secured a valuable lease for the plant". The corporation accepted and took advantage of them and placed a monetary value thereon of $49,500. In its resolution it recited all of these facts and "in consideration of the matters hereinabove recited" agreed to deliver the shares of promotion stock of the corporation in accordance with the permit to be thereafter issued. Plaintiff has complied with all of its terms. The resolution itself recites that a consideration was given. Ordinarily a corporation, in the absence of any countervailing proof, is bound by the facts recited in its resolutions. Purser v. Eagle Lake L. & I. Co., 111 Cal. 139, 43 P. 523. Under sections 1614 and 1615 of the Civil Code a written instrument is presumptive evidence of a consideration and the burden of showing a want of consideration sufficient to support an instrument lies with the party seeking to invalidate or avoid it. Toomy v. Dunphy, 86 Cal. 639, 25 P. 130; Creditors' Union v. Lundy, 16 Cal.App. 567, 117 P. 624. In the instant case lack of or failure of consideration was not established. The trial court found, upon substantial evidence, that the corporation's agreement to issue the stock to plaintiff was for "valuable consideration". It was not conditioned upon plaintiff's fulfillment of the "Fiscal Agency Agreement" or any other agreement. That finding, therefore, cannot be disturbed on appeal.

PER CURIAM.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

The plaintiff complains because we did not mention or discuss Robinson v. McColgan, 17 Cal.2d 423, 110 P.2d 426, a case he had cited in his brief. He admits that case presented facts showing that therein the trust involved was a naked trust and not an active trust. In our decision we took pains to show that the case at bar involves two active trusts. It follows that authorities in point did not include cases involving naked trusts. Consequently we did not have occasion to cite and discuss any cases which involved naked trusts.

The plaintiff contends that the case at bar presents only a question of statutory construction and that the statute makes no distinction between naked and active trusts. That is so. The statute in terms does not use either expression directly. But it uses the more general expression, income "derived from sources within this state". Having determined that moneys received from an active trust are moneys "derived from sources within this state", there was no occasion to go further and discuss moneys derived from naked trusts or other sources.

SHINN, Justice.

Plaintiff brought this action for divorce, charging desertion and mental cruelty. Defendant, who resided in Pennsylvania, came to California, employed attorneys and filed an answer. In August, 1942, an order was made for the payment of $25 fees to defendant's attorney and $4 a week for the support of the 17-year-old son of the parties, who was residing with defendant. On October 6 defendant changed attorneys and employed one A. P. Coviello, who was then engaged in the trial of a criminal case in which his client, with many others, was charged with murder. Prior to that time the divorce trial had been set for March 15, 1943. On October 9 plaintiff served on defendant's first attorneys a notice of a motion to advance the case for trial; the motion was heard October 16 and the trial was advanced to November 23; on the latter date Mr. Coviello made a motion for a continuance on the ground that he was then actually engaged in the trial of the murder case. The motion was denied by a judge who was acting as presiding judge, the case was sent out to a trial department and, because of other engagements of the judge of that department, was sent back to the calendar department, where it was continued to December 4. In granting the continuance the court ordered that the case be tried on December 4 and that Mr. Coviello or some other attorney be prepared to try it at that time. On December 4 Mr. Coviello was still engaged in the criminal case and made a motion for a further short continuance, supported by affidavit. This motion was denied, but on account of the condition of the calendar the case went over from Friday to Monday, December 7, when it was again sent out to a trial department. Mr. Coviello was still engaged in the criminal case. He sent a clerk to the trial department to inform the court that he was so engaged. Defendant during these proceedings had been accompanied to court by an adult son of the parties. In the trial department she requested a continuance until her attorney could be present. The court denied a continuance and proceeded with the trial in the absence of Mr. Coviello and without communicating with him. Plaintiff was sworn and gave testimony which, if believed and corroborated, would have justified the granting of a divorce to him, in the absence of a defense of recrimination. At the conclusion of plaintiff's testimony and that of a witness which was offered under the label of corroboration, the following proceedings took place:

"The Court: Take the stand, Mrs. Litvinuk.

"The Defendant: Your Honor, I can't understand without my attorney here. I would like to have him here.

"The Court: The record shows your attorney has had plenty of chance to be here.

"The Defendant: He told me I should say this to you.

"The Court: You get up on the stand and I will be your attorney.

"The Defendant: But my attorney, I want him to be here, please.

"The Court: He has had plenty of chance to be here. Do you want to tell me about your side of the case?

"The Defendant: I can't tell it without my attorney.

"The Court: All right. Decree granted to the plaintiff."

Later, on the same day, Mr. Coviello gave notice of a motion, to be heard on December 16, to vacate the minute entry ordering a decree in favor of plaintiff and for reopening of the case. He made an affidavit by which he represented that on December 7 he was actually engaged in the trial of the criminal case, and defendant made an affidavit in which she stated that on December 4, when the motion had been made for a short continuance in the calendar department, Mr. Coviello's client in the criminal case was then under cross-examination by the district attorney and it was impossible for him to leave the trial to attend the trial of the instant case. Her affidavit further stated that plaintiff, shortly before coming to California, had instituted an action for divorce in the State of Pennsylvania; that the case had been tried and that plaintiff had been denied a divorce. No affidavit by plaintiff was filed denying these statements concerning the Pennsylvania case. Plaintiff's attorney filed an affidavit which contained the following equivocal statement: "That affiant also alleges that to his knowledge no action was ever filed for divorce in the State of Pennsylvania wherein the divorce was denied." Unaccountably, Mr. Coviello failed to make an appearance on December 16 to present his motion and it was denied. Immediately thereafter findings and a decree of divorce were signed and filed. On February 17 Mr. Coviello gave notice of a motion, under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to vacate the decree on the grounds of "mistake, inadvertence, and surprise." With the motion was tendered a verified proposed cross-complaint for separate maintenance, charging plaintiff with desertion. It was alleged in the cross-complaint that plaintiff herein on or about March 5, 1940, had instituted a divorce action in the Court of Common Pleas for Philadelphia County, Pennsylvania; that said divorce proceeding continued for approximately one year, and that plaintiff herein had been denied a divorce in that action. There was a counter affidavit of plaintiff's attorney which added no material facts. Again, there was no affidavit by plaintiff that he had not been denied a divorce in Pennsylvania shortly before he came to California. The motion to vacate the decree was duly presented, was denied, and defendant appeals from that order. She gave notice of appeal from the judgment and from her motion to reopen the case and for a new trial, but these latter appeals were taken too late and must be dismissed.

[1] Our conclusion as to the order refusing to vacate the decree is that it should be reversed. We do not agree that defendant had a right to successive continuances of the trial until her attorney had finished the trial in which he was engaged, regardless of the time it might take. He appears to have believed she had an absolute right to such continuances and that he owed the court little cooperation in arranging for a satisfactory trial date. He represented but one of many defendants jointly charged with murder, and the trial was one which was bound to and did last for several months. In his affidavit for a continuance he made no statement as to when he expected to be through with the criminal trial and the record does not show when it was finished, nor does it show that he advised defendant of the order that she would have to obtain other counsel for the trial on December 4, if he was still engaged in the criminal trial, or that he made any effort to assist her in obtaining other counsel, although he knew, from the notice of the continuance which was served on him November 23, that the court had made such day of trial either in the calendar department or the trial department, and it was not shown that he made any request to be excused from the criminal trial long enough to explain his position to the trial judge. It is reasonable to believe that if he had done so, some plan would have been arranged under which defendant could have been represented at the trial by him or someone else. His noncooperative attitude was later manifested by his failure to be present on December 16 to urge his motion for reopening of the case. In view of the ruling of the acting presiding judge that the case would have to be tried on December 4, we find little justification for Mr. Coviello's assumption that the court would continue to postpone the trial until he had finished with the trial of the criminal case.

But in all of this there was presented only a situation which is a common one in the trial courts. It is of daily occurrence that through amenities of counsel or the direction of the judges the trial calendars are rearranged with due regard for the convenience of attorneys who are engaged in trial. These situations do not involve questions of law but only those of good court administration, and it is seldom that they cannot be worked out satisfactorily and without furnishing grounds for appeal. The instant case, for some reason, had been advanced for early trial. There may have been a good reason why it was given precedence over other cases but the record does not show it. There is no policy of the law which we are aware of that calls for the granting of speedy divorces. Plaintiff was not paying his wife any alimony and if he wanted a divorce in a hurry he was only in the position of most others who sue for divorce. We think the court should have recognized that his insistence upon an immediate trial, when it appeared that his wife would be without benefit of counsel, reflected the common attitude of litigants in divorce cases, and we cannot see that it would have been difficult, or unfair to the impatient plaintiff, for the court to arrange for the trial of the case so that defendant would be represented. However, we are not placing our reversal upon the failure of the court to do this. Our only purpose in discussing the matter is to point out the need for greater cooperation in arranging for suitable trial dates than was manifested in this case.

[2] The ground of our reversal is that with the defendant in court without an attorney, the trial judge should have questioned her concerning the truth of the charges which her husband had made against her. It is true that she was reluctant to testify in the absence of her attorney, but the record shows that that was because he had instructed her to state that she could not proceed with her defense in his absence. She is of Polish nationality; her husband is a Russian. She had come from Philadelphia with her son to present her defense and the son attended court with her as a witness. The husband had testified that the son struck him and that defendant ordered him out of the house in 1934. A transcript of the evidence is before us and we have read it. We think the notice of motion to vacate the decree was broad enough to include the evidence that had been received, as a part of the proceedings in the case upon which the motion would be based. The matters that had been testified to were known to the court and necessarily must have been given some consideration in the exercise of the court's discretion in ruling upon the motion. We quote in full the testimony of Mary Dimitroff, which was offered to meet the demands of section 130 of the Civil Code that no divorce shall be granted upon the uncorroborated statement, admission or testimony of the parties:

"By Mr. Best: Q. You know both parties to this action, Anna and Paul Litvinut? A. I know Anna Litvinut from 1912, when I come to the United States.

"Q. You know Paul has lived in this County and State since February, 1941? A. In this State, yes; he has been to my house.

"Q. You knew both these parties when they were married back East, did you not? A. Yes.

"Q. Do you know of your own knowledge these parties separated in 1934? A. Yes; I was on a trip back East then, and I heard from my parents they are separated. They fight, and they lead an unhappy life.

"Q. You also saw Paul at that time, did you not? A. Yes.

"Q. You knew he had left the house? A. Yes.

"Q. Because he was going to be beaten up? A. I heard they fighting and don't live together.

"Q. You know that separation was against his will and consent? A. That's right.

"Q. You know they have lived separated and apart ever since that time? A. That's right.

"Q. Were these parties very happily married? A. I know they was not.

"Q. Tell the Court what you have observed about the married life—fighting on the streets, and all that? A. Well, I believe it was 1921; I am not very sure; I saw them on Easter Day, another lady fighting her.

"Q. On the street? A. Yes.

"Q. A fist fight? A. Yes; they been fighting.

"Q. Do you know that Paul and Anna were never happy in the house? A. That's what I heard.

The court was being asked to dissolve a marriage of a man and woman who had lived together for 17 years, and was conducting a trial for the purpose of ascertaining the truth as to the reasons for their separation. The duty of ascertaining by satisfactory proof whether the wife had given the husband cause for divorce rose above mere technicalities of procedure. The court should be satisfied before granting a decree of divorce that the ends of justice will be served thereby and that the court is not being imposed upon by the assertion of unfounded grounds for divorce through the collusion of the parties or otherwise. The state is interested in the institution of marriage and the preservation of family ties, and the dissolving of them involves a judicial determination. Nothing in modern times has brought greater discredit upon the judiciary as a department of government than the granting of so-called mail order divorces and other procedure under which some courts are suspected as being little better than vending machines for the issuance of divorce decrees. Not that this is such a case. But it is a case where the plaintiff, after testifying briefly, offered as corroboration of his charges, testimony that was no corroboration at all. Following this the judge stated to the defendant, "You get up on the stand and I will be your attorney," and then asked her, "Do you want to tell me your side of the case?" to which defendant answered, "I can't tell it without my attorney." She did not decline to testify; she was simply at a loss as to what to do. There was no reason to believe that she would not have answered willingly any questions propounded by the court. She had come from Pennsylvania for that very purpose and it would have been a simple matter for the court to put her at her ease and to learn her side of the story. The son Paul, who had been accused of striking his father at the time of the alleged separation, was in court with his mother to act as her witness. The fact that plaintiff had failed to produce any corroboration of his charges of desertion and cruelty made it the plain duty of the court to question the son, and if he failed to corroborate his father's testimony, to deny plaintiff a decree. Not only did the court fail to do this, but it granted a decree upon plaintiff's uncorroborated testimony. It is true that we are not considering an appeal from the judgment, because the attempted appeal was taken too late. But the glaring insufficiency of the evidence to justify a decree in plaintiff's favor emphasizes the court's error and abuse of discretion in denying the motion to vacate. The decree should have been vacated because it never should have been granted. Upon the case made by plaintiff, and without any evidence for the defense, the court should have refused a decree in favor of the husband.

There is another reason why the motion should have been granted. The mere suggestion to the court that plaintiff had been denied a divorce in Pennsylvania shortly before coming to California should have caused the court to inquire fully into the facts. An attempt to procure a divorce in this state which had recently been denied by the courts of Pennsylvania, by concealing information as to the earlier case, would have been a flagrant fraud. When it was represented by defendant's affidavit and her verified cross-complaint, both of which stood unchallenged, that plaintiff had been denied a divorce in Pennsylvania, the decree should have been vacated for the express purpose of ascertaining whether a fraud had been perpetrated upon the court, even if no other ground existed for vacating it. It does not appear why the Pennsylvania decree had not been pleaded by answer but, considering the manner in which defendant's case had been handled by her attorney, it will not do to say that her representations with reference to the Pennsylvania case came too late. Situations which suggest that the court has been imposed upon involve far more than the rights of the parties in the premises. They call for the assertion of the dignity and independence of the court and for prompt and effective action to determine whether the court has been misled by the concealment or misrepresentation of material facts. Divorce cases have been known to present such situations. It would be scandalous and a reproach to the administration of justice to permit one who had been denied a divorce in the state of his domicile to go to another state and, through concealment of the earlier judgment, obtain relief which his own courts had denied him. Such conduct would be of too grave concern to be put aside upon the ground that knowledge of the fraud had not been brought to the attention of the court promptly. It comes in time if the court still has the power to correct any mistake that has been made. The failure of the court to make such an inquiry is not excused by reason of the ignorance and inexperience of a litigant or the mistakes or derelictions of his counsel.

The order denying the motion to vacate the judgment is reversed. The appeals from the judgment and the order denying the motion to reopen the case and for a new trial are dismissed.

MOSLEY v. ARDEN FARMS CO.*

Civ. 3322.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

June 29, 1944.

Rehearing Denied July 19, 1944.

Hearing Granted Aug. 24, 1944.

1. Negligence ⇨121(1, 5)

In personal injury suit, burden is on plaintiff to prove that defendant was negligent and that his negligence was proximate cause of injuries.

2. Appeal and error ⇨717

The District Court of Appeal may refer to trial judge's written opinion in order to discover process of reasoning used by him.

3. Municipal corporations ⇨819(4)

In city employee's action against milk company for injuries sustained as result of being thrown to sidewalk when wheel of power mowing machine operated by plaintiff struck one or more empty wooden boxes, in which defendant's milk bottles were carried, while plaintiff was cutting weeds between sidewalk and property line, evidence was insufficient to show that defendant's negligence, if any, in piling such boxes on parkway between opposite side of sidewalk and street curb, in violation of city ordinance, rather than some unknown person's intervening negligent act in moving some of boxes, was proximate cause of injury.

4. Municipal corporations ⇨809(1)

A city employee, injured as result of power mowing machine operated by him striking empty wooden boxes, in which milk company's milk bottles were carried, while cutting weeds between sidewalk and property line, was not entitled to recover damages from company on ground that it created nuisance in public street, contrary to city ordinance and state law, in absence of proof that such violation was proximate cause of injury.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Robert B. Burch, Judge.

Action by Sam R. Mosley against the Arden Farms Company for personal injuries sustained as the result of being thrown to a sidewalk when the wheel of a mowing machine operated by plaintiff struck a box or boxes in the space between the sidewalk and the property line. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

MARKS, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff for damages for injuries suffered by him on February 16, 1942.

Highland Avenue is a public street running in a general northerly and southerly direction in National City. It has a roadway 48 feet wide bounded by a curb on the westerly side. The space set apart for sidewalk purposes is sixteen feet wide. The curb is six inches wide at the top, bounded on the westerly side by a parkway space eight feet six inches wide. This space had trees planted in it and the balance had grown up to weeds. A tree with a trunk about six inches in diameter was growing in this parkway space near the place of the accident. On the westerly side of this parkway space there was a five foot cement sidewalk. Between the westerly edge of the sidewalk and the property line was a strip of land two feet wide on which weeds were growing.

Plaintiff was employed by National City as a laborer. On the day of the accident he was operating a power driven mowing machine and was cutting the weeds which were growing on both sides of the cement sidewalk.

Defendant is a corporation engaged in the sale and delivery of milk and, up to about the middle of January, 1942, delivered milk to customers in National City. Its milk bottles were carried in wooden boxes. It had been the custom of the employees to pile these boxes, when empty, in the parkway space south of the tree we have mentioned from which point they would be picked up and returned to defendant's place of business. Defendant sold its milk route in National City about the middle of January, 1942. At that time there were about eighteen of these boxes stacked in the parkway space south of the tree. These boxes were not removed by defendant until after the accident in question here. They were stacked in the center of the parkway space and were in plain sight as no weeds were growing around them.

* Subsequent opinion 157 P.2d 372.

On February 16, 1942, plaintiff drove the power mowing machine southerly over the cement sidewalk and cut the weeds growing in the parkway space. The blade had to be lifted to avoid the tree and the piled boxes. At the southerly end of his run he turned his mowing machine around and proceeded northerly over the cement sidewalk, cutting the weeds on the westerly side. At a point opposite the pile of boxes and in the space between the westerly side of the cement walk and the property line there were two more of the boxes. They were completely hidden by high weeds and their bottoms were embedded in the soil indicating they had been there for some time and during rains. The wheel of plaintiff's mowing machine struck one or more of these boxes. He was thrown to the sidewalk and injured.

At the time of the accident there was in full force and effect in National City an ordinance which provided in part as follows: "That it shall be, and it is hereby, declared unlawful for any person * * * to obstruct any street or alley, or portion thereof, or the sidewalk space thereof within said City, by placing or permitting thereon any signs, boxes, or other thing or article which will in any way obstruct or hinder the use thereof or travel thereon, within the limits of said City; * * *."

Defendant argues that it was error to admit this ordinance in evidence as the boxes piled in the parking space did not obstruct or hinder the use of the cemented portion which was constructed for the convenience and use of pedestrians; that the ordinance must be construed as prohibiting the obstruction of a sidewalk so as to interfere with the ordinary use for which it was intended which did not include a roadway for the travel of a power mowing machine. Rodkey v. City of Escondido, 8 Cal.2d 685, 67 P.2d 1053. We do not consider this question controlling here.

Other than the testimony of one witness, which was rejected by the trial court, there is no evidence showing how the two boxes came to be on the ground on the westerly side of the cement portion of the sidewalk. Other than the evidence of this one witness there is nothing to suggest that they were placed there by defendant or any of its employees. Plaintiff suggests that they may have been blown there by a strong wind or that they might have been taken from the pile and placed there by playful children. This is mere speculation and is not supported by anything in the record.

[1] It is well established in this State that the burden of proving negligence on the part of a defendant is upon the plaintiff (Diamond v. Weyerhaeuser, 178 Cal. 540, 174 P. 38), who must also establish that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injuries. Hale v. Pacific Tel. & Tel. Co., 42 Cal.App. 55, 183 P. 280.

Here the injury was not caused by the boxes piled on the parkway space but the boxes in the weeds westerly from the cement sidewalk. Boxes do not move themselves a distance of about ten feet. They must have been moved by some agency either human or natural. There is no suggestion in the evidence of any natural force that could have moved them. There is no evidence showing that they were moved by human hands. We are left to guess as to how or by whom they were moved. If they had been left in the pile plaintiff would not have been injured. It should follow that plaintiff's injuries were caused, not by defendant's negligence, if it was negligent in stacking the boxes on the parkway space, but the intervening act of some unknown person or force which moved the boxes from the pile westerly into the weeds.

The facts of this case are quite similar to those of Schwartz v. California Gas, etc., Co., 163 Cal. 398, 125 P. 1044, 1046, in which the Supreme Court reversed a judgment for plaintiff for the following reasons:

"Defendants requested the court to instruct the jury as follows: 'You cannot find for the plaintiff in this case, unless you believe from the evidence:

"(1). That plaintiff's horse was injured by an insulator, the property of defendants. (2). That the employes of defendants negligently placed said insulator on the premises where, it is claimed, said horse was injured and at the point where the evidence shows said horse was in fact injured." As given by the court the second subdivision was modified to read as follows: "That the employes of defendants negligently placed or permitted said insulator to remain on the premises where, it is claimed, said horse was injured, and at a point where the evidence shows some injury might result."

"In the language of appellants: 'As proposed, this instruction limited responsibility to the placing of the insulator at the point where the horse was injured. The modification made the defendants liable if they placed it anywhere on the premises."

"The proposed instruction was based upon the theory that an intervening, independent agency may have been the proximate cause of the injury. It seems plain that if appellants carelessly dropped the insulator upon the premises and did not remove it they would be guilty of negligence; but after it was dropped, if somebody else picked it up and moved it to this spot where the damage was done, it was the negligence of the latter that proximately caused the injury.

"It would not be a case of correlative and concurring causes, but of proximate and remote agencies independent of each other. The rule is well settled that 'an injury is not actionable which would not have resulted from the act of negligence, except for the interposition of an independent cause.' (Citing cases.)"

The Schwartz case has been frequently cited with approval and followed. See, Thomas v. German General, etc., Society, 168 Cal. 183, 141 P. 1186; Hartford v. All Night and Day Bank, 170 Cal. 538, 150 P. 356, L.R.A. 1916A, 1220; Stasulat v. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., 8 Cal.2d 631, 67 P.2d 678; Polloni v. Ryland, 28 Cal.App. 51, 151 P. 296; Hale v. Pacific Tel. & Tel. Co., supra; Solomon v. Red River Lumber Co., 56 Cal.App. 742, 206 P. 498; McCamish v. Groff, 83 Cal.App. 776, 257 P. 79; Northrup v. Pacific Elec. R. Co., 8 Cal. App.2d 189, 47 P.2d 365.

Plaintiff points to the evidence of Mrs. Frances Galway to the effect that on September 17, 1941, she was driving past the place of the accident and saw an Arden Farms milk truck standing near the pile of boxes; that a man in the uniform used by employees of defendant threw a box over the pile of boxes and onto the strip on the westerly side of the cement sidewalk. Had the trial court accepted this evidence as true it might have been argued that defendant was responsible for placing the box where it caused the accident.

The trial court found that the ordinance already referred to was in full force and effect; that defendant piled its boxes in the parkway space between the curb and the cement sidewalk; that this pile obstructed the sidewalk and violated the ordinance and other provisions of law; that it constituted a nuisance; that piling the boxes on the parkway space was negligence which was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries; that "it is true that some considerable time prior to the injuries hereinafter referred to, two of the defendant's crates or boxes became displaced, and hidden in, the aforesaid growth of weeds in the space between the cement walk and the property line and across the five foot pavement from where the pile of the defendant's crates was kept and stacked. It is not in evidence that any agent of defendant moved said boxes."

[2] Thus it appears that the trial court did not place any reliance on the testimony of Mrs. Galway but rejected it. That this is the construction of the findings intended by the trial judge is evidenced in a written opinion filed by him (which we may refer to in order to discover the process of reasoning used by him) wherein it is said: "A considerable time prior to the accident, two of these boxes had escaped from the pile and became hidden in the growth in the space between the cement walk and the property line over the five foot pavement from where the pile was stacked. The immediate means by which this occurred, whether human or natural, is not evidenced."

[3] Assuming that piling the boxes on the parkway space was contrary to law and negligence, plaintiff has failed to prove that negligence a proximate cause of his injuries. There is a reasonable inference that the boxes were moved by some unknown agency. If the boxes had not been moved, plaintiff would not have been injured. Thus some intervening act of negligence, probably by some unknown person, occurred which was the proximate cause of the injury and not the negligence of the defendant.

[4] Plaintiff argues, if we understand him correctly, that as the evidence shows that defendant created a nuisance in a public street in violation of the ordinance and state law, his right to recover was complete without further proof on his part. This argument is answered in Thomas v. German General, etc., Co., supra [168 Cal. 183, 141 P. 1188], as follows:

"And where the negligence is predicated upon the failure to perform a duty commanded by statute or ordinance, the same rule applies. Says Thompson: 'In all these cases it must appear that the violation of the ordinance was the proximate cause of the injuries received.' 6 Thompson on Negligence, § 7868. And says Cyc. (29

Cyc. 489): "The same rules are to be applied in determining the question whether an act is the proximate cause, whether such act is in violation of a statute or of some duty under general principles of law. In determining whether particular acts of negligence can be considered the proximate cause of injury, no distinction can properly be made between acts which constitute negligence because they are in conflict with statutory laws, and acts which are condemned as negligence under the general principles of law governing the conduct of men in relation to each other."

The judgment is reversed.

BUHLER v. SAME.

Civ. 14369.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 3, California.

June 26, 1944.

1. Courts Ⓒ202(5)

An order made in probate denying a motion to vacate sale of personal property belonging to estate was not appealable under provision of Probate Code relating to appealable orders. Probate Code, § 1240; Code Civ.Proc. § 473.

2. Executors and administrators Ⓒ329(1)

A sale of automobile belonging to estate was proper under provision of Probate Code authorizing sale of personal property which would incur loss or expense by being kept, where it appeared that administratrix was forced to sell automobile because she could not make monthly payments, automobile was expensive to keep and was depreciating in value. Probate Code, § 770.

3. Executors and administrators Ⓒ375

Where section 755 of the Probate Code required confirmation of sales of property of estate except as provided by sections 770 and 771, action of administratrix in filing verified return of sale and petition for approval subsequent to time limitation contained in section 755 did not constitute an admission by administratrix that attempted sale of property could only be had under sections 755 and 756.5, and that therefore title did not pass under section 770 authorizing sale of perishable and depreciating property without necessity for confirmation. Probate Code, §§ 755, 756.5, 770, 771.

4. Executors and administrators Ⓒ375

The fact that Section 756.5 of Probate Code, requiring confirmation of sale of personal property of estate, was amended in 1943 so as to provide that it did not apply to Section 770, authorizing sales of perishable and depreciating property without necessity for confirmation, did not establish that section 756.5 had previously applied to section 770, since amendment was likely made merely to avoid confusion. Where administratrix filed a "petition for confirmation and sale of personal property under section 770 Probate Code" stating that she was forced to sell automobile because she could not make monthly payments, automobile was incurring too much expense and was depreciating in value, title to automobile passed to purchaser, although sale had not been confirmed, and subsequent order of court selling automobile to another person at a ten per cent. higher price was void. Probate Code, § 770.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William R. McKay, Judge.

Proceeding in the matter of the estate of Frank G. Depew, deceased, wherein Alta H. Depew, administratrix, filed a petition for confirmation of sale of personal property under section 770 of the Probate Code to Raymond Henry Buhler. From an order of the superior court sitting in probate under which the property involved was sold by the court to Don Imler, and from an order denying the motion of the administratrix to vacate and set aside that sale, the administratrix and the first purchaser, Raymond Henry Buhler, appeal.

Order by which the property was sold by the court reversed and cause remanded with instructions, and the purported appeal from the order to vacate and set aside the sale dismissed.

Glenn M. Hershner, of Van Nuys, for appellant Alta H. Depew.

Cook & Johnson and Wiley J. Shannon, all of Van Nuys, for Appellant Raymond Henry Buhler.

Everett H. Smith, of Los Angeles, for Respondent Don Imler.

DESMOND, Presiding Justice.

[1] This is a case where two appellants seek to reverse two orders made by the superior court sitting in probate. The first is an order by which a Packard automobile was sold by the court to the respondent, Don Imler; the second is an order of the same court denying the motion of appellant, Alta H. Depew, made under the provisions of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, to vacate and set aside that sale. Since this second order was made in probate no appeal from it will lie under the provisions of section 1240 of the Probate Code. See Estate of O'Dea, 1940, 15 Cal.2d 637, 104 P.2d 368. We proceed, therefore, to consider the merits of the appeal from the other order.

Appellant Depew, as administratrix of the estate of Frank G. Depew, had sold, within a few months after decedent's death, a Packard automobile, property of the estate, to Raymond Henry Buhler, the other appellant here. Mr. Depew had undertaken to purchase this automobile under a monthly installment plan calling for payment of $68 per month upon the balance due under the terms of a chattel mortgage. Default in the payments occurred in the month of decedent's death, February, 1943, and the succeeding month of March. According to the stipulation and agreed statement of facts filed in the case, the estate had no funds with which to pay the delinquent installments and the mortgagee, Pacific States Loan Company, had threatened to take possession of the automobile and sell it under the provisions of the chattel mortgage; in order to prevent such action and save the estate harmless from loss, the automobile was sold to Buhler at the price of $1100, under the terms of section 770 of the Probate Code of California; at or about April 9, 1943, Buhler paid the two delinquent installments and borrowed enough money from a local bank to pay off and discharge the lien of the mortgage and make a payment of cash to the administratrix in the sum of $336. The expenditures which he made upon the automobile, including the payment to the administratrix, amounted to the selling price, $1100. The automobile had been appraised at $1050.

In June of 1943, the administratrix filed a "Petition For Confirmation of Sale of Personal Property Under Section 770 Probate Code." In that petition she stated that she "was forced to sell said automobile for the reason that she could not make the monthly payments that were due the finance company on said car, and said automobile was incurring too much expense for petitioner to keep same, and it was also depreciating in value."

Section 770 appears in the article of the Probate Code entitled, "Sale of Personal Property," and permits the sale, without notice, of "Perishable property and other personal property which will depreciate in value if not disposed of promptly, or which will incur loss or expense by being kept * * *". The same section provides that the title to said property shall pass without confirmation "but the executor, administrator or special administrator is responsible for the actual value of the property unless, after making a sworn return, and on a proper showing, the court shall approve the sale." There was no necessity in this case of filing the petition at the time when it was filed, but if the court had taken favorable action and approved the sale to Buhler upon the return made by means of the petition, the administratrix would have been relieved, by that action, of responsibility for any value above the amount received. Upon the filing of this petition, a hearing date was fixed for July 8th, 1943, and notice thereof posted, although no request for a hearing was made. On that date, and in open court, a bid for the automobile was submitted by respondent Imler in the sum of $1210, being 10% above the amount for which the sale had been made to Buhler, and the judge then presiding in probate, made the first order appealed from, entitling it "Order Approving Sale of Personal Property Likely To Depreciate In Value." Neither the administratrix nor her attorney nor the appellant Buhler were present at the bidding and approximately one week later the administratrix filed her petition asking that the order of sale to Imler be vacated and set aside on the ground that because of her mistake, inadvertence, surprise and excusable neglect she did not have the court sign an ex parte order approving the sale of the car, "this petitioner and her said attorney believing that no further bids for said car could be made, since she had sold same under section 770 of the Probate Code. That petitioner herein did not want any further bids to be made on said Packard car for the reason that she had already sold same, conveyed title to it, and delivered possession of it to the buyer, and had petitioner known that the Court would allow further bids to be made she would not have even petitioned the above Court to approve said sale, since all of the heirs of the above estate were satisfied with the sale of said car as petitioner had made." The petitioner incorporated in her petition to vacate the sale by the court a prayer "that petitioner's petition to approve sale of said Packard sedan auto, filed on June 22, 1943, and set for hearing by clerk of above Court on July 8, 1943, be stricken from the files [etc.]" The motion for relief made under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, was denied by the court on August 13, 1943, and shortly thereafter, on August 26th, the court authorized the clerk of the superior court to receive from Don Imler the sum of $1210 in full payment for the Packard automobile; "in the event said Don Imler does not obtain said possession and clear title thereto, said sum of Twelve Hundred Ten Dollars, ($1,210.00), shall forthwith be returned to him." On the following day the possession of the car was taken from Buhler by the Marshall of the Municipal Court of the City of Los Angeles in a claim and delivery suit instituted by Imler.

A single opening brief has been filed by both appellants, who state the gist of their case as follows, on page 10 thereof: "It is apparent from the foregoing [recital from the agreed statement of facts] that it was the intention of said administratrix to sell said automobile without notice and without confirmation and to pass the title to said car to the purchaser, Raymond Henry Buhler, under the provisions of Section 770 of the Probate Code and that she did so for the purpose of saving the estate from loss through the foreclosure of the outstanding chattel mortgage; that every act required by law to pass the title on such a sale was fully complied with; that said purchaser intended to buy said automobile under the provisions of said section and did every act required in order to acquire title thereto and has materially altered his position in reliance upon acquiring the title thereto under the provisions of said Section 770; that the Court recognized that a sale under the provisions of Section 770 was justified in this case, but instead of approving or disapproving the sale as in said section authorized, undertook to reopen the sale and pass title to property, title to which had already passed out of the estate, and confirm the sale to a new purchaser. We submit, therefore, that the title to said automobile passed by the sale thereof to Raymond Henry Buhler and that the order of said Court confirming the sale to Don Imler was void and beyond the jurisdiction of the Court to make, and being void, said order should have been vacated by the Court upon the motion of the administratrix, or by the Court of its own motion when the matter was called to its attention."

[2] The respondent answers as follows: "* * * by filing the return of sale and petition for approval, the administratrix brought herself squarely within the purview of Sections 755 and 756.5 of the Probate Code. There is nothing in the record which demonstrates that the automobile in question was perishable or that the attempted sale was necessary under Section 770. Therefore, the Court in accepting the bid of respondent, must only have concluded that the property was that which could be sold only under Sections 755 and 756.5. The question of whether property is of the type necessary to be sold under Section 770 is one of fact for the Probate Court, and in the absence of any evidence to the contrary in the record (which is the situation in the case at bar), every intendment must be in favor of the finding, implied or actual, of the trial court." We cannot agree that there is nothing in the record which demonstrates that the sale of the automobile in question was necessary under section 770, for that section provides specifically for the sale of personal property "which will incur loss or expense by being kept." Counsel has failed to notice the caption of the petition, which we have heretofore quoted, and the contents of that petition, which we have also quoted, from which it appears that the administratrix was forced to sell the automobile because she could not make the monthly payments and the automobile was incurring too much expense for petitioner to keep it and that it was also depreciating in value. Furthermore, the minutes of July 8, 1943, read as follows: "Depew, Frank G. * * * Return of Sale of Personal Property—Sold in open Court to Don Imler for $1210.00 being the highest & best bid (Sec. 770)."

(Italics added.) Also in the transcript we find the following: "In the Matter of the Estate of Frank G. Depew, Deceased. No. 220661 Order Approving Sale of Personal Property Likely to Depreciate in Value. The return and petition for approval of sale of personal property likely to depreciate in value herein, of Alta H. Depew, as administratrix of the estate of said deceased, by Glenn M. Hershner, her attorney, coming on this 8th day of July, 1943, for hearing by the Court, and the Court finding that all notices of said hearing have been given as required by law; It is Ordered, by the Court that the sale of 1942 Packard Club Sedan automobile, 8 Cylinders, made in open Court to Don Imler, for the sum of $1210.00 cash, is hereby approved." (Italics added.)

[3] The respondent further argues that: "The very filing of the verified return of sale and petition for approval is unquestionably an admission by the administratrix that the attempted sale could only be had under Sections 755 and 756.5, and therefore that title did not pass under Section 770." In this connection, we quote section 755 of the Probate Code: "Order of confirmation of sale: Notice. Except as provided by sections 770 and 771 of this code, all sales of property must be reported to the court and confirmed by the court before the title to the property passes. The report must be verified. Such report and a petition for confirmation of the sale must be made within thirty days after each sale. The clerk shall set the petition for hearing by the court and give notice thereof for the period and in the manner required by section 1200 of this code." According to the agreed statement in this case, the sale of the automobile to Buhler took place on or about April 9, 1943, and the record shows that the return to the court and request for approval of same was filed on June 22, 1943, considerably more than sixty days after the sale instead of within thirty days as provided in section 755. Consideration of this section, especially the clause, "Except as provided by sections 770 and 771 of this code," and the time limit for presenting a return, does not lead us to believe that "the Court in accepting the bid of respondent, must only have concluded that the property was that which could be sold only under Sections 755 and 756.5" Nor do we feel that it furnishes any ground for the statement that the filing "of the verified return of sale and petition for approval is unquestionably an admission by the administratrix that the attempted sale could only be had under Sections 755 and 756.5, and therefore that title did not pass under Section 770."

[4] Section 756 of the Probate Code, immediately following section 755, has relation not to sales made under section 770 and 771, but generally to sales of personal property in which confirmation by the court is required before title can pass. In such a case, section 756.5 provides means for the acceptance of a higher bid in the discretion of the court. This last named section was added to the Probate Code by the Statutes of 1939 and, apparently to avoid confusion, the Legislature at its session in 1943, St.1943, p. 1332, amended section 756.5, effective at a date subsequent to the sale in this case by adding the following: "This section shall not apply to personal property sold at public auction nor to personal property sold under the provisions of Section 770 of this code."

The appellants argue in their brief that the Legislature in adopting section 756.5 in 1939, did not expressly repeal, amend or modify sections 755, 770 and 772 of the Probate Code and that a repeal by implication cannot be grounded upon that amendment. The respondent, according to his brief, "does not contend that the enactment of Section 756.5 in 1939 was intended as a repeal by implication or any other manner of Section 770," but he insists that the enactment of section 756.5 in 1939, and its reenactment in 1943, with the additional language which we have just quoted, "can only mean that prior to the amendment of 1943, Section 756.5 did apply to property sold under Section 770, otherwise why did the legislature specifically exclude only the one section, to-wit: Section 770?" We have already given the answer to this question which occurs to us, namely, to avoid confusion.

[5] It is apparent from the agreed statement of facts that the administratrix in this estate was in the difficult position, immediately after Mr. Depew's death, of finding, as soon as possible, a buyer who could secure the necessary priority and assume the obligations attaching to the Packard car and pay a price that would be reasonable in view of the appraisal of $1050. Therefore, as stated in the agreed statement of facts, "in order to prevent such action [foreclosure of the chattel mortgage] and save said estate harmless from loss," she accepted the bid of Buhler and transferred title and possession to him at that time. Although the petition filed by the administratrix indicated that the sale was made under section 770, that fact apparently escaped the notice of the trial court when he ordered the sale to Imler. In our opinion, this last order was void since title to the car had already passed to Buhler and the only matter submitted by the petition addressed to the court was whether the sale of the automobile for $1100, made under section 770 of the Probate Code, should be approved.

The order is reversed and the cause remanded to the superior court with instructions to vacate the order of July 8, 1943, and to determine whether or not the reported sale of the automobile under section 770, Probate Code, shall be approved. The purported appeal from the order denying relief under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, is ordered dismissed.

CULLIGAN v. LEIDER et al.

Civ. 12627.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

June 23, 1944.

As Corrected July 11, 1944.

1. Appeal and error ☞404

Trial court's order correcting clerk's minute order and reciting that minutes incorrectly stated order court actually made required assumption by appellate court that trial court was correcting clerical and not judicial error.

2. Appeal and error ☞440 Motions ☞58

Where clerk's entry of an order is not in accord with order actually pronounced by judge, error is clerical rather than judicial and trial court has inherent power to correct error to make records speak the truth even though matter is on appeal.

3. Courts ☞116(3)

That clerical error does not appear on face of record does not preclude court from correcting entry.

4. Appeal and error ☞440 Courts ☞114

Under inherent power of court of record to make a correction nunc pro tunc or otherwise of clerical errors in record, order of Superior Court correcting clerical error after an appeal had been taken was not void because not expressly made nunc pro tunc, and District Court of Appeal was required to decide case on record as corrected.

5. Vendor and purchaser ☞135(1)

Where vendors held land from their grantor with certain reservations for water and sewer lines "now in existence" and grantor reserved right to designate location of rights of way for easements for further sewer and water lines, roving easements not located were not "existing" within deposit receipt given purchaser providing that property would be clear except existing easements of record.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Existing".

6. Evidence ☞455

Where deposit receipts given by vendor to purchaser provided that property be clear except existing easements of record and there was ambiguity in use of the word "existing", parol evidence was admissible to interpret use and meaning of such word.

7. Evidence ☞455

Where contract is ambiguous, evidence dehors the instrument itself may be considered to determine meaning of language used in instrument.

8. Vendor and purchaser ☞341(3)

In purchaser's action to recover deposit made under agreement to purchase realty which required vendor to provide a marketable title within a specified time, conflicting evidence sustained finding that the vendor failed to clear title of certain encumbrances within time specified and authorized judgment for purchaser.

9. Vendor and purchaser ⇨130(2)

Where deposit agreement gave purchaser option of demanding and receiving back deposit and being released from all obligation if title to property should not prove marketable and vendor should fail to perfect title within a specified time, property was not "marketable" if there was any reasonable doubt relative to litigation regarding title.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Marketable Title".

10. Vendor and purchaser ⇨133

Where contract for sale of realty calls for a perfect title, purchaser is entitled to a title free from reasonable doubt and fairly deducible of record.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; Maxwell McNutt, Judge.

Action by Thomas J. Culligan, Jr., against S. J. Leider and another to recover the amount of a deposit made by plaintiff under a written agreement to purchase realty, wherein defendants cross-complained. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal.

WARD, Justice.

This is an appeal by defendants from a judgment awarding plaintiff $5,000, the amount of a deposit made by him under a written agreement to purchase real property.

The property had been deeded to defendants and to Moe H. Levitt and Frances M. Levitt by the Citizens National Trust & Savings Bank of Los Angeles, under date of November 20, 1939, the deed "Reserving unto the grantor, its successors and assigns, the easements for water lines, sewer lines and septic tanks as now in existence on said hereinbefore described real property; also reserving unto the grantor, its successors and assigns, rights of way for easements for sewer and water lines across the hereinbefore described real property, the location of which rights of way grantor reserves the right to designate." The defendants subsequently acquired the interest of the Levitts in the property.

In the spring of 1941, plaintiff, who for some years had been engaged in the business of buying tracts of land, subdividing and building, became interested in the purchase of a portion of the property through the efforts of a real estate agent, Robert Marshall. A deposit receipt and agreement dated August 5, 1941 was signed by all parties, plaintiff depositing with defendants in connection therewith, $5,000 on account of the purchase price of $60,000. This receipt provided "Cash on the consummation of this transaction. Said property to be free and clear of all liens and encumbrances save and excepting current taxes and restrictions and easements of record." It also provided "that in the event said purchaser shall fail to pay the balance of said purchase price or complete said purchase as herein provided, the amounts paid hereon shall, at the option of the seller, be retained as liquidated and agreed damages. That in the event the title to said property shall not prove marketable and said seller shall not perfect, or be able to perfect same within ninety (90) days from this date, the purchaser shall have the option of demanding and receiving back said deposit and shall be released from all obligations hereunder." This deposit receipt was on August 15th voided by the parties, who had in the meantime caused Marshall, the real estate agent, to prepare a second deposit receipt. This was dated August 12th and was mailed to defendants by Marshall with a letter bearing the same date. Marshall's letter stated that the deposit receipt was enclosed "in the form that you wanted."

With reference to the easements, the second deposit receipt provided "Said property to be free and clear of all liens and encumbrances save and excepting current taxes, restrictions and existing easements of record." The word "existing" had not been a part of the first deposit receipt.

There was also enclosed with the communication and deposit receipt the preliminary report of the abstract company, and Marshall called defendants' attention to the exception therein noted pertaining to the reservation by the bank of the rights of way above mentioned, stating in his letter in that regard: "You can appreciate that this is now an encumbrances (sic) that must be removed before the property is in a position to be transferred, therefore suggest that you secure from The Citizens National Bank a quitclaim deed covering this item."

It appears from the record that defendants received the above letter from Marshall dated August 12, 1941, with its enclosures, on the 13th. The parties met in plaintiff's office on the 15th of August and the second deposit receipt was duly executed, its date of August 12th being changed to August 5th to coincide with the date of the original agreement. The first deposit receipt was, as stated, cancelled.

The property had been used as a golf course and the roving easement did not interfere with its use by defendants. On the other hand, until the bank should designate the exact location of the utility easements the land, from a practical standpoint, was useless for subdivision and housing purposes.

The defendants executed and deposited with the title company in escrow a deed to plaintiff, but failed to clear the title of "liens and encumbrances save and excepting current taxes, restrictions and existing easements of record" notwithstanding Marshall had the period of performance extended an additional thirty days. Nor did plaintiff ever deposit with the title company the balance of the purchase price, although he offered to do so at any time, even upon the termination of the one hundred twenty day period, upon performance by defendants of the terms of the contract on their part.

During the next several months a great deal of correspondence was exchanged, and conferences and discussions had, between attorneys representing the parties in an effort to obtain from the Los Angeles bank a quitclaim deed with reference to the easements.

On December 9, 1941, the title company advised the real estate agent that defendants had withdrawn the deed and other papers from escrow, and defendants' attorney notified plaintiff that the deed had been withdrawn for "failure to proceed in good faith with the closing of the deal * * * The sum heretofore deposited by you * * * is being retained * * * in accordance with the deposit receipt."

Shortly thereafter plaintiff made a demand upon defendants for the return of the $5,000 paid on account, and later commenced this action to recover such deposit.

With reference to the letter from Marshall to defendants and cross-complainants, dated August 12th, which letter specifically set forth the reservation of the easements to the bank and stated that such encumbrance "must be removed before the property is in a position to be transferred," which letter was accompanied by the second deposit receipt and the preliminary report of the title company, it is defendants' contention that the deposit receipt was received by them the next day, but that the letter came some time afterward. There is testimony that the letter of transmission accompanied the documents, and the court so found. When the parties met on the 15th of August and signed the second deposit receipt, presumably defendants were acquainted with the terms of the document, emphasized by the communication from Marshall.

Defendants' cross-complaint to quiet title prayed that they be declared to be the owners in fee of the property, and that plaintiff has no right, title or interest therein. As plaintiff does not claim any interest in the property the judgment in this respect is immaterial on appeal.

As stated, judgment was ordered for plaintiff in sum of $5,000 with interest. It also decreed that defendants and cross-complainants are entitled to possession of the property free of any claim by plaintiff.

The trial court found that the location of the easements had not been designated and therefore constituted an encumbrance which should have been removed by the sellers. Appellants contend that the reservation that the grantor bank shall have the right to locate easements for sewer and water lines across the property falls within the provisions of the deposit receipt "excepting * * * existing easements of record."

Some confusion appeared in the record relative to appellants' motion to strike out all evidence attempting to vary the terms of the written contract and all evidence in reference to damages.

Parol evidence bearing on the circumstances surrounding the execution of the contract had been introduced by plaintiff subject to defendants' motion to strike on the ground that such evidence varied the terms of a written instrument. At the conclusion of the case, defendants renewed their motion, and also moved that all evidence with reference to damages be stricken. The record, as originally before this court, simply showed a clerk's minute order as follows: "Motion Granted."

While the appeal was pending in this court, but before the case had been submitted, plaintiff obtained an order from the trial court, after proper notice and hearing, correcting the record. This order is signed by the trial judge. It recites that the statement in the minute order, "Motion Granted," incorrectly stated "the intention and order of the Court actually made pursuant to defendants' motion to strike appearing in said minutes; it having been the intention and order of the Court to strike only such evidence as referred to damages sustained by plaintiff and cross-defendant other than damages sustained by reason of retention of the deposit of $5,000.-00." The Court then made this order:

"Now, therefore, it is hereby ordered that the minutes of the Court * * * be, and the same are, hereby corrected so that the words 'Motion Granted' be changed to read as follows:

"It is hereby ordered that the above motion to strike out evidence be, and it is hereby, granted insofar only as it refers to evidence in reference to damages, other than damages sustained by plaintiff and cross-defendant by reason of the retention by defendants and cross-complainants of the deposit of $5,000.

"The Court finds that no evidence has been introduced by plaintiff and cross-defendant to vary the terms of the written contract, and on said grounds hereby orders that no evidence, other than that in reference to damages, as aforesaid, be stricken out.

"It is further ordered that the Clerk of this Court correct the said minutes in accordance herewith."

[1,2] It must be assumed that the trial court was correcting clerical and not judicial error since the judge recites that the minutes "* * * incorrectly state * * [the] order of the Court actually made * * *." Bastajian v. Brown, 19 Cal.2d 209, 120 P.2d 9. Where the clerk's entry is not in accord with the order actually pronounced by the judge, the error is clerical rather than judicial. In the Bastajian case the court said (page 216 of 19 Cal.2d, page 12 of 120 P.2d): "* * * where the judgment as signed does not express the actual judicial desire or intention of the court at all, but is contrary thereto, the signing of such purported judgment is a clerical error rather than a judicial one." The court has inherent power to make its records speak the truth even though the matter is on appeal. Carter v. J. W. Silver Trucking Co., 4 Cal.2d 198, 47 P.2d 733; Wilson v. Nichols, 55 Cal.App.2d 678, 131 P.2d 596; Carson v. Emmons D. & S. Moving Co., 18 Cal.App.2d 326, 64 P.2d 176.

[3] That the clerical error did not appear on the face of the record does not preclude the court from correcting the entry. King v. Emerson, 110 Cal.App. 414, 288 P. 1099, 294 P. 768; Carter v. J. W. Silver Trucking Co., supra.

[4] The argument made by appellant that the order is void because not expressly made nunc pro tunc is without merit in view of the following statement from Carpenter v. Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co., 14 Cal.2d 704, 707, 96 P.2d 796, 798: "It is the long-settled rule that courts of record in this state have inherent power to make a correction, nunc pro tunc or otherwise, of clerical errors and misprisions in their records, in order that such records conform to the facts and speak the truth." (Italics added.)

The record, as corrected, therefore is the one upon which this court must decide the appeal.

[5] The view of the trial court—that since the roving easements had not been located they did not in fact exist under the agreement herein must be upheld. There is some ambiguity in the use of the word "existing."

[6] The second deposit instrument refers to encumbrances, restrictions and existing easements. The defendants held the property from the Los Angeles bank with certain reservations for water lines, sewer lines and septic tanks "now in existence." There was also reserved unto the grantor, its successors, etc., the right to designate the location of "rights of way for easements for further sewer and water lines." Whether "existing" referred to easements as previously located, or the right to designate such locations was an important question. Parol evidence was admissible, not to vary, but to interpret the use and meaning of the word in the document.

[7] The holding in Body-Steffner Co. v. Flotill Products, Cal.App., 147 P.2d 84, is applicable to this case. The court said (page 88 of 147 P.2d): "The true interpretation of every instrument being manifestly that which will make the instrument speak the intention of the party at the time it was made, it has always been considered an exception, or, perhaps, a corollary to the general rule above stated, that when any doubt arises upon the true sense and meaning of the words themselves, or any difficulty as to their application under the surrounding circumstances, the sense and meaning of the language may be investigated and ascertained by evidence dehors the instrument itself." Sandford v. Newark, etc., R. Co., 37 N.J.L. 1, 4, as quoted in Balfour v. Fresno C. & I. Co., 109 Cal. 221, 225, 41 P. 876."

[8] In the present case the court found "That defendants have failed to clear said title of said encumbrance within 120 days after the execution of said agreement." The evidence in question showed that the previous attorney for defendants upon receipt of the deposit agreement wrote in long hand: "check accepted subject to checking the description on the property * * *." The original deposit receipt was not satisfactory and resulted in the drawing of a second document. A letter which accompanied the deposit receipt and preliminary report from the title company called attention to the easements which "must be removed before the property is in a position to be transferred." There is testimony that plaintiff would not purchase the property subject to the easements, and so the first deposit receipt was executed. After the second receipt was executed both parties endeavored to clear the property of the roving easement, but were unsuccessful. The evidence in some respects is conflicting, but the trial court resolved the conflict in favor of plaintiff.

[9,10] The deposit agreement contained a provision that in the event the title to the property should "not prove marketable and the said seller shall not perfect * * * same * * * the purchaser 'shall have the option of demanding and receiving back said deposit and shall be released from all obligation hereunder.'" If there was any reasonable doubt relative to litigation regarding the title, then the property was not marketable and respondent was entitled to a return of the $5,000 deposit. Muller v. Palmer, 144 Cal. 305, 77 P. 954. In Allen v. Globe Grain & Milling Co., 156 Cal. 286, 290, 104 P. 305, 307, the court said: "It is settled law in this state that, where the provisions of a contract for the sale of real estate are such as to call for a 'perfect title,' the purchaser is entitled to a title free from reasonable doubt and fairly deducible of record. See Gwin v. Calegaris, 139 Cal. 384, 73 P. 851, and cases there cited; Peckham v. Stewart, 97 Cal. 147, 31 P. 928. See, also, Title [& Document Restoration] Co. v. Kerrigan, 150 Cal. [289], 305, 88 P. 356, 8 L.R.A., N.S., 682, 119 Am.St.Rep. 199, [11 Ann.Cas. 465]. The provisions in the contract in the case at bar were, as we have seen, for a 'valid title,' for a title that was not 'defective,' for a 'perfected' title in the event that on examination the title was found to be defective. It was expressly provided 'that, if the title is defective and it cannot be perfected within the time above specified, this contract will thereupon become null and void.' These provisions practically called for a 'perfect title' to the same extent as if the precise words 'perfect title' had been used. When these provisions are read in connection with the provision for 'examination of the title,' which clearly referred to an examination of the public records, we cannot doubt that the parties were stipulating for 'a good title by the record.' See Gwin v. Calegaris, supra [139 Cal. 384, 73 P. 851]." Under all of the circumstances and the law applicable to the facts plaintiff was entitled to the return of the deposit.

The option designated as a deposit receipt contained a clause fixing the amount of liquidated damages and a provision that if the property was not marketable the purchaser should have the option of "receiving back" the deposit and should be "released from all obligations." Glock v. Howard & Wilson Colony Co., 123 Cal. 1, 55 P. 713, 43 L.R.A. 199, 69 Am.St.Rep. 17, relied upon by appellants, merely holds that a purchaser may not maintain an action to recover a deposit paid under a contract for the purchase of land when default by him is unexcused. It holds that under such circumstances a vendor may rest on his contract and retain to his own use the money previously paid by the vendee. In brief, the rights of the parties are determined by the contract. In the Glock decision (page 4 of 123 Cal., page 714 of 5 P., 43 L.R.A. 199, 69 Am.St.Rep. 17) it was stated that the averments praying for equitable relief were "without the slightest averment or the shadowiest proof in excuse of plaintiff's breach of contract." In the present case the agreement contained the provision that upon failure of the seller to perfect the title within a specified time the purchaser had a right to demand the return of the deposit. The gist of the decision in the Glock case is there was no excuse for the purchaser's default. In the present case the failure of the purchaser to deposit the full amount was excused by the inability or refusal of defendants to tender a marketable title. We do not deem it necessary to distinguish other cases cited by appellants based upon the Glock case.

There is no claim by appellants herein that if damages had been fixed in an amount other than as specified in the contract the judgment would have been rendered in a less sum. All evidence covering actual damages was on motion of defendants stricken from the record. We are therefore precluded from discussing that phase of the case.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal and error ☞ 1207(4)

In action to impress equitable liens on life insurance policy and other property for amount embezzled from plaintiff by insured, where appellate court reversed portion of judgment requiring payment to plaintiff of entire amount of insurance policy, with instructions to ascertain total amount of premiums thereon and amount of premiums paid by insured from embezzled funds during limitation period and grant plaintiff pro tanto interest in policy, trial court, on new trial, erred in rendering second judgment declaring plaintiff entitled to entire proceeds of policy not exceeding sum embezzled.

BISHOP, Justice pro tem.

This is the second time this action has been under review on appeal. The opinion on the first appeal, reported in Brodie v. Barnes, 1942, 56 Cal.App.2d 315, 132 P.2d 595, so adequately reveals the nature of the action, its background, and the judgment that had been entered by the trial court, that we need do no more than note that the action was one wherein the plaintiff, in order to reimburse himself for some $5,000 that Barnes had embezzled from him, sought to impress equitable liens upon a $2,000 insurance policy and upon some other property which Barnes had purchased. Judgment, entered in plaintiff's favor, was reversed, but only to a limited extent and for a limited purpose. The action taken by the appellate court was unequivocal. In its opinion that court observed that of the premiums paid upon the policy over the years, only a part were paid out of the $3,365.03 which had been embezzled since May 29, 1936, that being the first day of the period of embezzlement not outlawed by the statute of limitations, according to the conclusion of the trial court. Following its observation, the appellate court continued with these two statements (56 Cal.App.2d at page 322, 132 P.2d at page 599): "There is no finding as to the total amount of the premiums that were paid into the policy, nor is there any finding as to the total amount of the premiums that were paid with misappropriated funds. Nevertheless, the trial court by its judgment ordered the insurance company to pay the total amount of the insurance policy over to plaintiff on the theory that there was a constructive trust of the entire policy. This was error." "That portion of the judgment providing that plaintiff should be paid the entire insurance policy is reversed with instructions to the trial court to ascertain the amount of the total premiums on the policy and the amount of such premiums paid since May 29, 1936, and to grant plaintiff a pro tanto interest in the policy; the balance of the judgment is affirmed."

Plaintiff, of the opinion that the appellate court had erred in its determination that he was entitled only to a pro tanto interest in the policy, instead of seeking redress by a petition for a hearing in the Supreme Court, sought and obtained it at the hands of the trial court. On the new trial which followed the partial reversal of the judgment, instead of following the instructions of the appellate court, those concerned had their attention centered around the nature of the insurance policy, and the trial resulted in the conclusion that the policy was not one which should be prorated according to the premiums paid, and that a judgment just like that reversed should be entered declaring that the plaintiff was the owner of and entitled to recover the proceeds of the $2,000 policy, "not to exceed the sum of $3,365.03." The trial court had no authority to try other issues than those directed upon the reversal, or to enter a judgment different in nature from that prescribed, and the defendants, rightly feeling themselves aggrieved, have appealed.

At the time of the oral argument of this appeal the parties stipulated that premiums totaling $269.40 had been paid upon the policy, of which sum only $80.84 had been paid since May 29, 1936. We find these to be the facts, and reverse the judgment as entered April 28, 1943, with directions to the trial court to modify its judgment of March 11, 1941, by granting to plaintiff an 80.84/269.40 interest in the proceeds and avails of the life insurance policy instead of a 100% interest.

BISHOP, Justice pro tem.

A judgment entered March 11, 1941, in this action, decreed "that plaintiff is the owner of and entitled to recover the proceeds and avails of that certain Policy of Insurance No. 23738 W-1167 from defendant John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company, not to exceed the sum of $3,365.03 and plaintiff's costs herein; that the hereinafter described real property be sold by the Sheriff of said Los Angeles County, and the proceeds thereof, after payment of costs and expenses of sale be paid to plaintiff to the amount of $3,365.03 less the amount secured to plaintiff from said Insurance above mentioned, and the balance be paid to the defendant, Evadna L. Barnes; * * *."

On April 8, 1941, a Writ of Enforcement of Judgment Ordering Sale of Real Property was issued by the clerk of the trial court, addressed to the sheriff, and the sheriff sold the real property, described in the judgment and writ, for $300. The plaintiff was the purchaser.

An appeal was taken from this judgment, and it was reversed, in part (Brodie v. Barnes, 1942, 56 Cal.App.2d 315, 132 P.2d 595), but not as to the part ordering the sale of the real estate. After the reversal, a new trial was held and a judgment entered April 28, 1943, which had the effect of setting aside the reversal, for the new judgment was but a reiteration of the old. (See Brodie v. Barnes, 149 P.2d 899, decided by us this day.) A few days before the new judgment was entered plaintiff served notice that he was going to move to set the sale of the real estate aside upon the sole ground, appearing not in his notice of motion but in the supporting affidavit, that by the terms of the judgment the ascertainment of the proceeds of the insurance policy was a condition to be performed before it could be known whether or not a sale of said real property should be made. Plaintiff made his motion, as noticed, and it was granted. It is from the order vacating the sale that the defendants appeal.

We are of the opinion that the judgment did not make the sale of the real estate conditioned upon an ascertainment of the amount to be received from the insurance policy. This being so, the writ of assistance was properly issued, presumably at the request of the plaintiff who was the judgment creditor, and the sale, to the plaintiff, was regular. No ground appears which justified setting the sale aside. The insurance policy called for a payment of $2,000. The amount of plaintiff's judgment was $3,365.03. The amount bid by plaintiff for the real estate was $300, resulting in a credit on the judgment of only $270.65, due to costs of sale. There seems no occasion for plaintiff's belated concern that the sale might not be necessary and should not have been held until it was determined what portion of the $3,365.03 judgment would not be paid by the proceeds from the $2,000 life insurance policy.

The order vacating the sale is reversed.

DESMOND, P. J., and PARKER WOOD, J., concur.

C. I. T. CORPORATION v. PANAC et ux.*

Civ. 12564.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

June 22, 1944.

Rehearing Denied July 22, 1944.

Hearing Granted Aug. 17, 1944.

1. Bills and notes ☞520

In action on note for contract price of repairs and renovations to be made by payee company on makers' dwelling houses, evidence was sufficient to support trial court's finding that makers were defrauded by representatives of payee, which failed to perform work.

2. Appeal and error ☞1011(1)

In action on notes, alleged by defendants to have been procured by fraudulent misrepresentations of payee's agent, District Court of Appeal, on appeal from judgment for defendants on issue of fraud, will refrain from stating as matter of law that trial court's finding on conflicting testimony that defendants were free from negligence in signing notes was not sustained by sufficient evidence.

3. Bills and notes ☞373

At common law, deception of signer of negotiable instrument as to character thereof, without negligence on his part, constituted real defense to action thereon by bona fide holder, but signer might be estopped by his negligence to deny knowledge of character of instrument.

4. Statutes ☞147

In enactment of statutory provisions concerning negotiable instruments, and particularly in codification of rights of holders thereof and adoption of Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law, it must be assumed that provisions covering defenses previously recognized at common law, such as that of fraud in procuring signature of instrument without signer's negligence, would have been included, if intended to be continued. Civ.Code, §§ 3136, 3138.

* Subsequent opinion 154 P.2d 710.

5. Bills and notes ☞373, 452(4)

Fraud is a defense against holder of promissory note not in due course, but is not available defense to holder in due course, unless he had actual knowledge of defect or such knowledge of facts that his acceptance of instrument amounted to bad faith. Civ.Code, §§ 3136, 3137.

6. Bills and notes ☞315, 365(1)

An assignee of negotiable instrument takes it subject to any defenses which maker might interpose against payee, but under law merchant and code provisions, holder thereof in due course, without notice of defect in prior parties' title, holds it free from any such defect and defenses available to such parties among themselves, except "real" or "statutory defenses," as distinguished from "personal defenses", that is, defenses between original parties, and "appellate court defenses", which are those acceptable to judicial officer interpreting statute by consideration of expediency and prudence. Civ.Code, §§ 3097, 3103, 3104, 3109, 3136-3139, 3205.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Appellate Court Defense", "Personal Defense", "Real Defense" and "Statutory Defense".

7. Bills and notes ☞373

Freedom of makers of negotiable instrument from negligence in signing it is neither "real" nor "personal defense," under either common law or statute, against claim on note by holder in due course.

8. Courts ☞95(2)

California courts cannot properly follow other states' judge-made law, recognizing defenses, not originating in statutes, against negotiable instruments, on assumption that state Negotiable Instruments Law covers such defenses, as such law did not adopt Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law in toto or word for word, but was phrased to conform to state legislature's own ideas. Civ.Code, § 3097 et seq.

9. Bills and notes ☞373

Generally, fraud is no defense as against holder of negotiable instrument in due course, in absence of statutory provision.

10. Bills and notes ☞337

To be "holder of negotiable instrument in due course", holder must have had no knowledge of defect or infirmity in prior parties' title thereto, nor knowledge of facts, disregard of which would have amounted to bad faith in acquiring instrument, at time of its negotiation. Civ.Code, § 3137 et seq.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Holder in Due Course".

11. Bills and notes ☞373

A holder of negotiable instrument in due course owes no duty to show that maker thereof was negligent in executing instrument in order to recover thereon.

12. Bills and notes ☞365(1)

In action on notes by holder thereof in due course, defendant makers were in no position to set up as defense any equities between them and payee of notes, even if makers were free from negligence in executing them. Civ.Code, §§ 3137, 3138.

13. Bills and notes ☞339

Commercial documents, such as negotiable instruments, being used in lieu of money, assignees thereof need not inquire into and investigate every circumstance bearing on original execution of instruments and take cognizance of all equities between original parties thereto before accepting them.

PETERS, P. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; Harold Jacoby, Judge.

Action by the C. I. T. Corporation against Martin Panac and wife on two notes. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

Francis W. Collins, of Crockett, for appellant.

Francis P. Healey, of Martinez, and John Jewett Earle, of Oakland, for respondents.

WARD, Justice.

Plaintiff brought this action to recover from the defendants the amount of two promissory notes, negotiable in form, executed by them in favor of Home Improvement Company in payment of certain repairs and renovations to be performed by the payee upon two dwelling houses owned by the defendants. The notes were payable in monthly installments, to commence sixty days after their respective dates. They were endorsed by the payee to the plaintiff which, in its complaint, claimed to be their holder for value in due course. The defendants denied that the plaintiff was such holder and, as a separate defense, pleaded fraud on the part of the payee in the procurement of the notes by one William Hart, agent of the payee.

On the first issue the trial court found in favor of the plaintiff; on the issue of fraud it found in favor of the defendants, and rendered judgment that plaintiff take nothing by its action.

Plaintiff appeals from the judgment, contending that the findings on which it is based are not supported by the evidence—in fact are contrary thereto.

Specifically the findings attacked by the appellant are that the defendants are illiterate and unable to read or write the English language; that William Hart gained their trust and confidence; that he falsely and fraudulently represented that a contract for repairs and renovations only was being signed by them; that Hart knew they were illiterate and unable to read or write English; that they were ignorant of the fact that they were affixing their signatures to promissory notes, had no means of knowing they were signing such and had no intention of doing so and would not have done so had they known that the instruments were promissory notes; that they were prevented from seeking independent advice and counsel although they requested to be allowed to do so, and, finally, that they were not guilty of negligence in executing the notes.

At the trial both defendants took the stand as witnesses. Mrs. Panac testified that while she had come to this country at the age of nine years, she had never attended school either in this country or in her native Italy; that she could sign her name and copy; that while she "read very little" she had taught herself the Constitution, having obtained her citizenship approximately eight years prior to the trial. With reference to her ability or desire to read, the following appears in the record:

"The Court: What is this word? You can see all right Mrs. Panac? A. Yes, I can see.

"Q. You have a book on the Constitution, haven't you? A. Yes, but you know.
* * *

"Q. Is that the book that you pay 50¢ for? A. Yes, I go the year—

"Q. Did you read those questions and answers? A. Yes, but I forgot all about already.

"The Court: When did you become a citizen? A. About eight years ago. I forgot because I—

"Q. Do you want to read this for me? A. I can't read it very well.

"Q. Just tell me what you think it says, right across there. * * * Do you know what that means? A. No."

Asked by the court whether she drove an automobile, she stated: "Yes.

"The Court: How can you read the signs? A. Yes, I can read the signs because I learned later for the Constitution.

"The Court: But the signs, what has that got to do with the Constitution? A. Yes, I can read the signs, because it is big, you know."

The Panacs had acquired several pieces of real property, some of which were income producing, and they had acquired some experience in the execution of papers as evidenced by Mrs. Panac's reiteration that she wished to consult their attorney, and that "I signed the signature, but I don't want to sign first." Martin Panac testified that he could not read very much nor pronounce well. A daughter of Emelia gave testimony to the effect that "all my life I have been reading, and answering" all her mother's letters, and that on several occasions had been called upon by Martin Panac to read to him notices received from real estate offices and other letters, and to answer them for him. Martin, when giving his testimony, was handed one of the exhibits in the case, called a notice of completion, and which had been signed by him as part of the transaction. It contained the words printed in bold type, "Notice to borrower—Do not sign this certificate until the work is satisfactorily completed." He was directed to read it, and did so with fair accuracy. Asked what the words meant, he gave their meaning correctly. When pressed he stated: "No, I didn't see it."

On the question of whether the defendants reposed trust and confidence in Hart, the representative of Home Improvement Company, payee of the promissory notes, and who not only negotiated the transaction resulting in the giving of the notes but who also secured their execution, there is evidence tending to show that Hart was introduced to the Panacs by a friend of theirs, one Krajcr, for whom Home Improvement Company had done repair work similar to that proposed to be done for defendants. Krajcr had been defendants' friend and neighbor for many years and recommended Hart to them highly. Emelia testified that for this reason she was inclined to think that Hart "was all right." Martin testified that he reposed trust and confidence in him, adding that he was very cordial, a "lovely sort of a man," a good salesman and gave you the impression that he was your best friend. Emelia also testified that her husband before signing the documents remarked to Hart: "I see you was in the war * * * I trust you * * * I going to sign." At this point the record shows a question asked by the court: "Then did your husband sign?" to which she answered: "He sign and he make me sign * * * He says, 'Listen, sign Emelia,' he says, 'You see if he [Hart] do something wrong, you see that leg,' he said, 'crippled.' He said, 'I make another leg a cripple.'"

Hart, after having been introduced to the defendants by their friend Krajcr, with the statement that he was doing a fine job on his house, accompanied the defendants to the premises upon which repairs and some renovations were to be made. Hart made notes of the details of the work to be done, entering them in a memorandum book—sometimes referred to by the defendants in their testimony as the "black book." They then went to the home of the Panacs, and there Hart prepared a document which purported to embody the understanding arrived at on the work to be performed and the cost thereof. He presented it to the defendants with a request that they sign it. Both demurred to doing so at once, Mrs. Panac stating that she could not read it and wished to see an attorney before signing. Hart assured her that it was not necessary to see an attorney; that the contract had to be signed at once in order to get the work started; that he had to send a man to the job on the following day, and he offered to read the paper to her. In doing so he read the items of work entered in his note book, stating they were in the agreement, and again urged that the defendants sign. They still objected and this time their scruples were overcome by Hart's assurance that all the work agreed upon would be done to their satisfaction and that it was necessary to start it at once. Martin Panac thereupon affixed his signature to the contract, with the above quoted remark—"I see you was in the war * * * I trust you"—and directed his wife to do the same. Hart then presented to them another paper, divided into three parts by perforated lines, one part being an application for credit, the second a form of promissory note, and the third a declaration that the work for which the credit was required had been satisfactorily completed. To this paper the defendants placed their signatures at the points indicated by Hart upon his assurance that it was part of the contract for the work to be done and without having Hart read it to them. He testified relative to the transaction that he said to Hart: "Now, listen, you got one leg broken, but I going to break the other one if you don't come through." The second note was executed under the same circumstances. At the time these signatures were thus obtained the price for some of the items of the work had not yet been ascertained or agreed upon. There were present during these proceedings two other persons beside the friend of the Panacs, Krajcr, but neither of the defendants requested any of them to read aloud the documents or to explain the contents thereof. The defendants testified that they understood from Hart that the work was to be paid for in monthly installments to commence sixty days after its completion, but had not contemplated giving notes. The work was never completed notwithstanding vigorous efforts made by the plaintiff and the defendants to induce Home Improvement Company to do so, with the consequence that when the first installment became due on the notes the defendants refused to pay.

Defendants do not contend that the conclusion of law based upon the finding that plaintiff is in fact "a holder in due course of said promissory notes" could have been otherwise. No evidence was introduced that C.I.T. had actual knowledge that the Panacs had been defrauded or any knowledge of a defect in the instruments or of any fact that would justify a finding that plaintiff's acceptance of the instruments amounted to bad faith on their part.

[1] There is sufficient evidence to support a finding that in the failure to perform the work defendants were defrauded by rep-representatives of Home Improvement Company.

[2] As between the original parties the defendants could have pleaded the defense of fraud. The trial court determined that, notwithstanding the possession of some knowledge of the English language on the part of defendants, their neglect to call upon others present to read to them the documents, and their failure to insist on their request for time to seek independent legal advice, the defendants were free from negligence. This finding is based upon conflicting evidence and inferences drawn therefrom very favorable to defendants. A reading of the record alone might well disapprove this finding, but, bearing in mind that the trial court had an opportunity to view the witnesses, note their demeanor, etc., we refrain from stating as a matter of law that there is insufficient evidence to uphold it. Regardless of the finding, however, the judgment should be reversed upon the main issue in the case.

There is a line of cases holding that "the fact that a party whose signature is obtained by a fraudulent representation that the instrument is of a different character from the one that he believes he is signing is an illiterate person is material when such fraud is pleaded as a defense in an action against a bona fide purchaser. The maker or the acceptor must, however, have been guilty of no negligence and must generally have taken advantage of such reasonable means as lay at his hand. Some cases would seem to establish the rule that one who cannot read is negligent in trusting to the representations of the other party to the transaction as to the contents of an instrument which he signs, where he can easily procure the instrument to be read by third persons who are known to him." 10 C.J.S., Bills and Notes, § 499, p. 1101.

The court found that the notes were subject to fraud in the execution, upon the theory that defendants believed that in signing papers at the places indicated by Hart they were affixing their signatures to a contract for repair and renovation and to "nothing else." The court also found that defendants affixed their "said signatures to promissory notes" but "had no intention of signing and executing the same." The evidence shows that defendants knew they were signing a contract to renovate and repair certain premises. They testified that the repairs and renovations were to be paid for commencing sixty days from completion of the work. The defendants admitted the genuineness of their signatures.

[3] Brannan's Negotiable Instruments Law, 6th ed., pp. 623, 624, as annotated and rearranged by Beutel, sets forth as follows the rights of a holder in due course of a negotiable instrument to sue (note the sections referred to are similar though not in each instance identical with the California codified provisions):

"At common law a real defense was held in most jurisdictions to exist in those cases in which a person, without negligence, has signed an instrument, which was, in fact, a negotiable instrument, but was deceived as to the character of the instrument and without knowledge of it. In such cases, there is no contract because there was no consenting mind, but the signer may be estopped by negligence to deny knowledge of the character of the instrument which he has signed. If he was not negligent he is not liable. * * *

"In Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Illinois (sec. 57) [Calif. Civil Code, sec. 3138] the N.I.L. or other legislation expressly makes fraud in the factum a real defense, supra, pp. 30 to 32. The Uniform Act does not cover the question in so many words. It is possible, however, that such conduct is 'fraud' within sec. 55 [Calif. Civil Code, sec. 3136] and hence causes merely a 'defective' title, or that it is one of the 'defenses' under sec. 57. It might also be assimilated to want of delivery, which was made an equitable defense by sec. 16 [Calif. Civil Code, sec. 3097]. Either possibility would change the common law and protect a holder in due course. In further support of this position it should be noted that the other real defenses are covered by the act and a broad interpretation of sec. 55, especially the last clause 'under such circumstances as amount to a fraud' certainly includes all kinds of fraud in factum. Since this is so it is hard to believe that the framers overlooked this particular defense. The equities are all in favor of such an interpretation, since the defrauded party really caused the situation and should be the one to suffer. * * *

"Under the old common law view 'fraud' in sec. 55 would be limited to fraud in the inducement, and 'defenses' in sec. 57 restricted to defenses which were equitable at common law, while fraud in the factum would continue to be a real defense analogous to forgery under sec. 23. Such is the result of a number of cases which have arisen since the N.I.L., most of which do not cite the act, but there is a strong line of well reasoned cases contra."

We are confronted with the following: Plaintiff is a holder in due course of the negotiated instruments; defendants were defrauded but, according to the trial court, not chargeable with negligence on their execution. It appears that the trial court determined the case upon the now well known Wisconsin rule—which has been adopted by other states. In some instances the opinions appear to be judicial adoptions of the Wisconsin statute rather than judicial decisions based upon the law of the state wherein the controversy arose.

[4] We have previously noted that under the common law in most jurisdictions a defense was available if one, without negligence, signed a negotiable instrument being deceived as to its character. In the enactment of provisions of law covering this subject, and particularly in the codification of the rights of a holder of a negotiable instrument and the adoption of The Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law, it must be assumed that if the defenses previously recognized in the common law were to continue provisions covering such defenses would have been included.

[5] "Fraud" is a defense against a holder of a promissory note not in due course (Landreth v. Ducommun, 8 Cal.2d 694, 68 P.2d 231), but it is not an available defense to a holder in due course unless the holder had actual knowledge of the defect, or such knowledge of the facts that the holder's acceptance of the instrument amounted to bad faith. Civil Code, sec. 3137; Appel v. Morford, 62 Cal.App.2d 36, 144 P.2d 95; Howell v. Dowling, 52 Cal.App.2d 487, 126 P.2d 630; James Mills Orchard Co. v. Bank of America, 137 Cal.App. 299, 30 P.2d 626, 32 P.2d 342; Goodale v. Thorn, 199 Cal. 307, 249 P. 11; Eames v. Crosier, 101 Cal. 260, 35 P. 873; Nuckolls v. Bank of California, 10 Cal.2d 278, 74 P.2d 271. California has never adopted any other test. To follow Wisconsin it would be necessary to amend Civil Code section 3136 in substance as the provision reads in the Wisconsin statute. In California and in Wisconsin the negotiable instruments law provides: The title of a person who negotiates an instrument is defective within the meaning of this title when he obtained the instrument, or any signature thereto, by fraud, duress, or force and fear, or other unlawful means, or for an illegal consideration, or when he negotiates it in breach of faith, or under such circumstances as amount to a fraud. In Wisconsin, St.1933, § 116.60, the following is added: " * * and the title of such person is absolutely void when such instrument or signature was so procured from a person who did not know the nature of the instrument and could not have obtained such knowledge by the use of ordinary care.*" Klosterhuber v. Wisconsin State Bank, 218 Wis. 191, 260 N.W. 644, 646. With reference to the above the court said (260 N.W. at page 646): "The italicized portion of the statute was added to section 55 of the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Act before that act was adopted by the Legislature in 1899 (chapter 356). Wisconsin is the only state that has incorporated that language into the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Act. The Legislature intended thereby to preserve the well-established common law of this state."

This is not a problem in which the courts of last resort of a state, irrespective of statutory provisions, have followed the provisions of the statutes of another state and in the absence of legislative action those courts may say that from such inaction it may be assumed that the legislature concluded that the previous or present provisions are sufficient to sustain the decisions of the foreign state.

Several cases indicate that judicial view in California is to the contrary of that in Wisconsin. The facts in Bedell v. Her-ring, 77 Cal. 572, 20 P. 129, 11 Am.St.Rep. 307, are not identical but similar in that there was a representation that an instrument presented for signature was a contract of agency. The defendant actually signed a promissory note without knowing its contents. The court in that case found that the defendant did not exercise ordinary care in regard to the character of the paper. The judgment in favor of an innocent third person as the holder of the note was affirmed. In the Bedell case, where the contentions were similar to those of the present case, the court said (77 Cal. at pages 573, 574, 20 P. at page 130, 11 Am.St.Rep. 307): "It is not necessary here to pass definitely upon the broader question discussed in the briefs, whether or not payment of a negotiable note in the hands of an innocent indorsee, who received it before maturity, can be avoided, under any circumstances, on the ground that it was procured by fraud. It is apparent that to apply to such an instrument the principles which establish the essentials of an ordinary contract as between the original parties—as, for instance, that there must be consent of the parties and a sufficient consideration; that where there was no intention to sign, there was, in law, no signature; that fraud vitiates a contract ab initio, etc.—would be to undermine the whole structure of commercial law, and ‘shake paper credit to its foundation.’ The former decisions of this court seem to be in the direction of holding that in such a case payment cannot be avoided for fraud in the original procurement of the note.” See, also, First Nat. Bk. of Iowa City v. Trognitz, 14 Cal.App. 176, 111 P. 402.

[6] One difficulty in determining the rights of a holder of a negotiable instrument is the confusion that may arise relative to the method by which he acquired it. If by assignment he takes it subject to any defenses that the maker might interpose against the payee, while under the well recognized “law merchant,” and in California under the provisions of the code, a holder in due course of a negotiable instrument without notice of defect, sec. 3137, holds “free from any defect of title of prior parties, and free from defenses available to prior parties among themselves,” sec. 3138. As previously stated, defendants herein do not contend that there was notice to plaintiff of any defect, or knowledge of such facts as would make its acquisition of the instruments an act of bad faith.

It seems necessary to repeat that in California a holder in due course takes title free from defect and free from defenses available to prior parties, sec. 3138, unless the defense may be asserted against a holder irrespective of innocence. Such a defense may be referred to as a real—statutory—defense. A real defense, so far as the holder in due course is concerned, should also be distinguished from a defense that is personal—that is, a defense between the original parties. Likewise, a statutory or real defense should be distinguished from an appellate court defense—that is, one acceptable to a judicial officer, who interprets the statute, taking into consideration expediency and prudence, and thereupon states what the law should be. This method has been adopted in some states holding contrary to California.

A holder in due course of a negotiable instrument acquires it free from any defect of title of prior parties and free from defenses available to prior parties among themselves, sec. 3138, but California does not protect a holder in due course from a real or statutory existent defense. A holder in due course, not a party to an alteration, may enforce payment of an instrument, genuine as to signature, according to its original tenor, Civil Code, sec. 3205, but when a signature is forged it is inoperative in the hands of a third person or any party against the person whose name has been forged unless the latter person “is precluded from setting up the forgery or want of authority,” sec. 3104. Want of capacity, as in the case of an infant, may exonerate from liability, but endorsement or assignment “by an infant passes the property therein,” sec. 3103. “Absence or failure of consideration is matter of defense as against any person not a holder in due course” sec. 3109. Where “the instrument is in the hands of a holder in due course, a valid delivery thereof by all parties prior to him * * * is conclusively presumed,” sec. 3097. (Italics added).

Whatever defenses may exist under the common law or statutory rule, California by codification has been careful to state the real and the personal defenses. Section 3136 provides: “The title of a person who negotiates an instrument is defective within the meaning of this title when he obtained the instrument, or any signature thereto, by fraud, duress, or force and fear, or other unlawful means, or for an illegal consideration, or when he negotiates it in breach of faith, or under such circumstances as amount to a fraud.” The personal or original defenses are available “In the hands of any holder other than a holder in due course,” sec. 3139. Payment for the full amount may be enforced by a holder in due course, sec. 3138, unless there is actual knowledge of the defect or knowledge of such facts from which a reasonable inference may be drawn that in acquiring the instrument he was not acting in good faith.

[7] Freedom from negligence on the part of the makers of a negotiable instrument has never been regarded in California in following the common law rule, or made by statute a defense, real or personal, against a claim of a holder of a negotiable instrument in due course. If the legislature had intended such defense it would undoubtedly have so provided in no uncertain terms, as the courts of this state have not, at any time, recognized such a defense.

The following cases were all decided prior to the adoption by California of The Negotiable Instruments Law. There is no doubt of the California rule. If the legislature did not deem it advisable to incorporate some provision similar to that in Wisconsin, surely the judiciary should not interfere. In First Nat. Bk. of Iowa City v. Trognitz, supra [14 Cal.App. 176, 111 P. 403], the court found that the defendant "was misled when he signed the instruments and did not intend to execute anything more than a mere memorandum form to be retained * * * in connection with the purchase of goods." The defendant in fact signed four negotiable instruments, which contained blanks later filled in. At page 180, of 14 Cal.App., at page 403 of 111 P., the court said: "Where negotiable paper of the kind here sought to be recovered on is issued in blank, it is no protection to the acceptor to say, as against the claim of an innocent holder for value before maturity, that he did not intend to create any liability against himself." In Hellmann v. Potter, 6 Cal. 13, 15, the court said: "A party who gives his power of attorney to another authorizing the latter in general terms 'to manage and transact all business matters of every nature and description in which I may be interested,' and 'to make, execute and deliver promissory notes, bills or bonds,' will be held liable for all such securities executed in his name by his attorney, where they have reached the hands of an innocent holder, although they may have been made for the private individual purposes of his attorney. Where one of two innocent parties must suffer, it must fall on him who has trusted most." In Rich v. Davis, 4 Cal. 22, reaffirmed and approved in Rich v. Davis, 6 Cal. 141, the court said (4 Cal. at pages 22, 23): "The principle has been long settled that, when a partner makes a note in the name of the partnership, it will render all the partners liable to a bona fide holder, although it has no relation to the partnership business, and the other partners were wholly ignorant of the transaction, and were even intentionally defrauded by their partner. See Chitty on Bills; Story on Prom. Notes; Story on Part; 3 Kent." In Haight v. Joyce, 2 Cal. 64, 66, 56 Am.Dec. 311, it was said: "Although want or illegality of consideration may be inquired into in a suit upon a bill or note between the original parties, by the general mercantile law, where these securities have passed into the hands of third persons without notice, the maker is estopped from setting up such defense. This peculiar system of credit is favored by the law; and a rule requiring the indorsee of every bill or note to inquire into the consideration, would retard commercial transactions, and, in the language of Lord Kenyon, 'shake paper credit to its foundation.'" See, also, Fuller v. Hutchings & Sweetzer, 10 Cal. 523, 70 Am.Dec. 746; Poorman v. Mills & Co., 39 Cal. 345, 2 Am.Rep. 451; Smith v. Silsby, 55 Cal. 470.

[8] If it be assumed that the Negotiable Instruments Law covered defenses not originating in legislative enactments but recognized in some other states, and that California might with propriety follow such judge-made law, we are confronted with the situation that California has not adopted in toto or word for word The Negotiable Instruments Law, but has phrased its code sections to conform to its own ideas after study not only of general but of specific provisions and possible defenses.

[9] There is a rule in some jurisdictions that where one is induced to sign a negotiable instrument under the belief or, as has been loosely stated, the impression that an instrument of a different character is being signed, the defense of fraud is available against a holder in due course in the absence of an estoppel in pais or one based on negligence. "But there is authority to the contrary to the effect that the defense is not available against a holder in due course, even though the person fraudulently induced to sign the instrument was free from negligence. The availability of the defense is based upon statute in some jurisdictions." 8 Am.Jur., sec. 589, p. 296. The general rule is that in the absence of statutory provision fraud is not a defense as against a holder in due course. 10 C.J.S., Bills and Notes, sec. 499, pages 1097, 1101.

[10-12] The California statute is plain upon the subject. In this state in order to be a holder in due course it is essential that the holder at the time the instrument was negotiated did not have knowledge of the defect or infirmity or knowledge of such facts which if known and disregarded would have amounted to bad faith in acquiring the instrument. And in this state there is no duty cast upon such a holder to show that the maker in executing the instrument is chargeable with negligence. It follows from what we have said that the defendants were not in a position to set up as a defense in this case any equities existing between them and the Home Improvement Company even if, as found by the court, they were free from negligence in executing the notes.

[13] Commercial documents such as negotiable instruments are used in lieu of money. "To require each assignee, before accepting them, to inquire into and investigate every circumstance bearing upon the original execution and to take cognizance of all the equities between the original parties, would utterly destroy their commercial value and seriously impede business transactions." Adolph Ramish, Inc., v. Woodruff, 2 Cal.2d 190, 40 P.2d 509, 514, 96 A.L.R. 1146.

The judgment is reversed.

KNIGHT, J., concurs.

PETERS, Presiding Justice (dissenting).

I dissent.

The question presented on this appeal can be simply stated: Where a person who is himself free from negligence is induced by fraud to sign a negotiable instrument not knowing it to be such, and in the reasonable belief that it is a document of an entirely different nature, is such fraud a defense good against a holder in due course? The majority opinion holds that such fraud in the execution, like fraud in the inducement, is a mere personal defense which may not be asserted successfully against a holder in due course. Such holding, adopted by the majority, is contrary to the common law rule, both in England and in this country, is contrary to the cases decided under the English Bills of Exchange Act, is contrary to the overwhelming majority of cases decided under the Negotiable Instruments Law, is contrary to the views expressed by most legal writers in this field, and is contrary to basic principles of the law of contracts.

The facts need not be discussed in detail. The majority opinion concedes, expressly or impliedly, that the following basic findings are supported by substantial evidence:

1. That appellant is a holder in due course of the negotiable notes in question;

2. That Hart, the representative of the Home Improvement Company, payee of the notes, was guilty of fraud in the execution in securing respondents' signatures to the notes; and

3. That the respondents reasonably placed trust and confidence in Hart, and were not negligent in not knowing that the documents were in fact promissory notes.

These findings are amply supported. The respondents signed the promissory notes and a notice of completion before any work was started and before the price as to certain items were agreed upon. This they did upon Hart's representations that they were merely signing a contract to do the work. They did not know they were signing promissory notes. They were practically illiterate, and had no real understanding of the written word. They placed trust and confidence in Hart and in their supposedly close friend, Krajer, who introduced them to Hart. The majority opinion fails to state that, unknown to respondents, Krajer was an agent of Hart's, and was working for him on the promise of a substantial commission if he could get respondents and others to hire Hart as a contractor. Hart purportedly read the contract to respondents, but failed to include the notes in such reading. Respondents wanted independent legal advice but were thwarted by Hart. Under these circumstances, the trial court was justified in finding that respondents were not negligent and that Hart was guilty of fraud in the execution.

The type of fraud here involved has been referred to as fraud in esse contractus, fraud in the factum, fraud in the inception or fraud in the execution, to distinguish it from fraud in the inducement, which is a mere personal defense. At common law the cases were practically unanimous that fraud in the execution was a real defense. The leading English case is Foster v. Mackinnon (1869) L.R. 4 C.P. 704. That case unequivocally held that, in the absence of negligence on the part of the maker, such fraud was a defense against a holder in due course. This rule was followed by practically every American jurisdiction where the problem was considered prior to the drafting and adoption of the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law, with the possible exception of West Virginia and Connecticut. See cases collected 36 L.R.A. 434; 11 Am.St.Rep. 318; 35 L.R.A., N.S., 776.

In England the Bills of Exchange Act was adopted in 1882. So far as the problem under discussion is concerned, the sections of that act are almost identical with those of the N.I.L. In Lewis v. Clay (1897), 67 L.J.Q.B. 224, it was declared that fraud in the execution, in the absence of negligence, was an absolute defense, and that the adoption of the English statute in no way changed the rule of Foster v. Mackinnon, supra. This is still the English law.

In United States, the N.I.L. was drafted by John J. Crawford in 1896. Over the years, at different times, every American state has adopted the act, not always verbatim, but in substance. California was one of the latest states to adopt the act, it being adopted in this state in 1917, Stats. of 1917, p. 1531, Chap. 751. There have been many cases decided by the various states since they adopted the N.I.L. The overwhelming weight of authority is to the effect that the adoption of the N.I.L. in no way changed the common law rule, and that both before and after the adoption of that uniform statute, fraud in the execution was, and remained, a real defense.

The applicable rule under the N.I.L. is stated as follows in 10 C.J.S., Bills and Notes, p. 1100, § 499(b): "Although there are some decisions to the contrary [citing one case each from Connecticut and West Virginia], the weight of authority holds that, if a person * * *, intending to sign an instrument of an entirely different character, * * * places his signature to a negotiable instrument, the mistake as to the terms or character of the instrument being caused by the fraud, deceit, or misrepresentations of another, and not being due to laches or negligence on the part of the signer, the latter is not liable on the instrument, although it has passed into the hands of a bona fide holder for value." In the footnotes relatively recent cases from Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, North Carolina, Oklahoma and Texas are cited in support of that rule. In 8 Corpus Juris, p. 790, § 1049, the same rule is stated and many earlier cases, not only from the above states, but also from Arkansas, Iowa, Kentucky, Maine, Nebraska, New York, Ohio, Washington and Wisconsin, are cited in support thereof.

The identical rule, supported by many cases, is stated as follows in 8 Am.Jur. p. 295, § 589: "The majority rule is that fraud whereby one is induced to sign a negotiable instrument believing that he is signing an instrument of a different character is a defense, even against a holder in due course, in the absence of an estoppel in pais or one based on negligence."

Mr. Brannon, as the quotation set forth in the majority opinion indicates, does approve the minority rule. The great majority of legal writers in this field, however, advocate the majority rule. See Britton on Bills and Notes (1943) p. 566, § 130; Burdick, Real and Personal Defenses in Actions on Negotiable Paper, 3 Cornell Law Quarterly, 171; 2 Daniels on Negotiable Instruments, 7th Ed., p. 1075, §§ 991, 992; 4 Williston on Contracts, Rev.Ed., p. 3337, § 1159; Danforth, Illegality under the Negotiable Instruments Law, 92 Cent. L. Jour. 27; Green, Real Defenses and the Negotiable Instruments Law, 9 Tulane Law Rev. 78; Rosson, Bills and Notes—Fraud in the Inception—Negotiability and Real Defenses, 6 Ore. L.Rev. 160; Britton, Fraud in the Inception of Bills and Notes, 9 Cornell Law Quarterly 138; Notes, 12 Va.L.Rev. 324; 6 Tex.L.Rev. 114; 12 Tex.L.Rev. 228; 13 Mich.L.Rev. 601; 29 Yale Law Journal 797.

The many courts and legal writers above referred to have not approved the rule that fraud in the execution, where the maker is not negligent, is a real defense, by blindly following the common law rule. Cogent and compelling reasons exist for this approval. It must be remembered that the N.I.L. is not an entirely new statute, nor did it purport to repeal the entire law of contracts. It purported to codify the fundamental rules of the law merchant, and where there was a conflict to adopt what was considered to be the better rule. Where the N.I.L. has no express provision, or where its meaning is ambiguous, cases decided under the law merchant and fundamental rules of contract should be looked to in arriving at a proper interpretation. Wettlaufer v. Baxter, 137 Ky. 362, 125 S. W. 741, 26 L.R.A.,N.S., 804; Trustees of American Bank v. McComb, 105 Va. 22, 54 S.E. 14; Haddock, Blanchard & Co. v. Haddock, 118 App.Div. 412; 103 N.Y.S. 584, affirmed in 192 N.Y. 499, 85 N.E. 682, 19 L.R.A.,N.S., 136; Parsons v. Utica Cement Co., 82 Conn. 333, 73 A. 785, 135 Am.St.Rep. 278; see cases collected 12 Va. L.Rev. 324.

So far as the present problem is concerned, the N.I.L. has no express provision covering the subject. There are provisions, however, which tend to show that the drafter of the act intended fraud in the execution to be a real defense.

Section 57 of the N.I.L., Section 3138 of the Civil Code, provides that the holder in due course holds "free from any defect of title of prior parties, and free from defenses available to prior parties among themselves." (Italics added.) When a party, without negligence, signs a document by reason of the fraud of another, and honestly and reasonably believes it to be something else other than a negotiable instrument, the document, when executed, is not merely voidable—it is void. Fraud in the execution prohibits any valid contract from coming into existence. Fraud of this type is not a mere "defense" nor a mere "defect of title," such as is referred to in § 57. It is a factor which renders the instrument non-existent as a binding obligation. Section 57 also provides that a holder in due course may enforce payment "against all parties liable thereon." The maker of a totally void instrument was never "liable" thereon. The sections dealing with the liabilities of the maker, § 60, N.I.L., § 3141, Civ.Code, of the drawer, § 61, N.I.L., § 3142, Civ.Code, of the acceptor, § 62, N.I.L., § 3143, Civ.Code, and of the endorsers, § 66, N.I.L., § 3147, Civ. Code, all provide that by making, drawing, accepting or endorsing the instrument such persons "engage" to pay the instrument according to their respective contracts. This clearly indicates that there must be an assent to be bound, otherwise there is no contract. There is no difference in theory between such a situation and an outright forgery, which is admittedly a real defense. Reality of consent underlies all contractual relationships. See Britton, Bills and Notes (1943) at p. 586; 12 Va. L.Rev. 324; Green, Real Defenses and the Negotiable Instruments Law, 9 Tulane L. Rev. 78, at p. 82. Underlying these concepts is the thought that a negotiable instrument is a specialized form of simple contract. Where, because of fraud in the execution, no contract in the form of a negotiable instrument has ever come into existence, no liability or rights attach to the instrument. The document comes into the world stillborn. Negotiation alone cannot breathe life into it.

The majority opinion refers to the doctrine that where the signer is free of negligence fraud in the execution is a real defense, as an "appellate court defense," and as "judge-made law," and argues that this rule is a creature solely of the courts. Quite to the contrary, as has already been pointed out, the rule is based on a proper interpretation of the act, and upon basic rules in the law merchant and in the law of contracts in existence long before the act was adopted. The majority opinion also refers to this rule as the "Wisconsin rule." Does this imply that the rule originated in that state? If so, the implication is contrary to the fact. The rule originated nearly a half century before Wisconsin adopted the statute expressly making fraud in the execution a real defense. Many cases had been decided in England and in this country before Wisconsin adopted its statute. Wisconsin merely codified existing law. The fact that Wisconsin saw fit to thus put into express terms the rule of the existing cases does not necessarily mean that this addition changed the existing law. It is much more reasonable to imply that Wisconsin merely codified the existing rule and clarified what otherwise might be an ambiguity. There is another consideration that supports the conclusion that the majority rule should be adopted in this state. As already pointed out, California did not adopt the N.I.L. until 1917. By that year all but two or three of the other states had adopted the uniform act. See table, 5 Uniform Laws Annotated, p. XIII. At that time the great bulk of the cases above referred to, which have adopted the majority rule, had been decided. It is far more reasonable to imply that the legislature intended to adopt the rule approved by the overwhelming weight of authority, than to assume that it intended to approve the rule adopted by a small minority. It is an elementary rule of construction that in adopting the statute of a sister state, the interpretation of that statute by the sister state is included. Moreover, there is a strong public policy in favor of uniform interpretation of uniform statutes. Otherwise, the whole purpose of such acts is thwarted.

The majority opinion urges that to adopt the rule advocated in this dissent will be to "undermine" the whole structure of commercial paper. That is the familiar cry raised every time the question of whether a particular defense is a real or personal defense is involved. The obvious answer is that under the common law, and in the great majority of states in this country, the rule is as is here advocated, and yet commercial institutions seem to struggle along without too much difficulty. The limitation, which denies the defense to one who has been guilty of negligence, is ample protection to such institutions.

The majority opinion refers to many California cases. Not one of them involved the point here under discussion. The problem has never been decided by a California appellate court, either before or after the adoption of the N.I.L. In Bedell v. Herring, 77 Cal. 572, 20 P. 129, 11 Am. St.Rep. 307, quoted from at length in the majority opinion, a person did sign a document without knowing it was a negotiable instrument. Unlike the instant case, the trial court found that the "defendant signed said note voluntarily, and without exercising the ordinary care in regard to the character of the paper signed which a prudent business man would and should exercise." 77 Cal. at page 573, 20 P. at page 130. The only holding of the court is that where the signer is negligent he cannot set up fraud in the execution against a holder in due course. That is sound law. The court expressly refrained from passing on the question here involved, stating (77 Cal. at page 573, 20 P. at page 130): "It is not necessary here to pass definitely upon the broader question discussed in the briefs, whether or not payment of a negotiable note in the hands of an innocent endorsee, who received it before maturity, can be avoided, under any circumstances, on the ground that it was procured by fraud." What the court said in the next few sentences—quoted in the majority opinion—was obviously dicta. From the cases cited by the court in support of this dicta it is apparent that the court was confused as to the distinction between fraud in the inducement and fraud in the execution. Most, if not all, of the cases cited deal with fraud in the inducement. The last sentence of this dicta that: "The current of American authorities seems to be in the same direction," is just contrary to the actual fact. None of the other California cases cited in the majority opinion or in the briefs even remotely involved the problem here under discussion.

For the foregoing reasons, in my opinion, the judgment should be affirmed.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Gordon Thompson, Judge.

Charles Ivan Baa was prosecuted for murder, conspiracy to rob, and robbery. From a judgment imposing the death penalty, an appeal is automatically taken.

Judgment affirmed.

Irvin J. Kahn, of San Diego, for appellant.

Robert W. Kenny, Atty. Gen., Ralph W. Scott, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Thomas Whelan, Dist. Atty., and H. P. Mack, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Diego, for respondent.

GIBSON, Chief Justice.

This is an automatic appeal from a judgment imposing the death penalty.

Count one of the information charged appellant and Preston Jones, both negroes, with the murder of Tom Din Toy, a Chinese. Count two charged them with having conspired with Robert Denton, Grant Harris and Willie Davis to rob Toy. Count three charged appellant and Jones with the robbery of Toy. Appellant and Jones represented by separate counsel, were jointly tried on all three counts.

The deceased was robbed and shot about 1:30 o'clock in the morning as he entered the hallway of the Service Hotel in the city of San Diego. The night clerk at the hotel testified that he heard a noise in the entrance way, followed by a flash and report of a gun. He saw the man who fired the shot bend over the victim and then run out of the hallway. Five minutes after the shooting he identified the jacket then being worn by appellant as similar to the one worn by the person who did the shooting.

A sergeant in the United States Marine Corps testified that just prior to the shooting he saw three men cross the street in front of the Service Hotel. Two of the men were about 15 feet in back of the third one. All three entered the hallway, there was a shot, and two of the men ran out to the street and separated. Appellant ran between automobiles parked near the hotel.

Two police officers heard the shot and saw two men run from the Service Hotel entrance. One of the officers saw appellant attempt to hide under an automobile parked at the curb near the hotel, and immediately took him into custody. The second officer pursued the other man who escaped.

Two detectives who came on the scene shortly after the shooting testified that while lying wounded on the hotel steps Toy pointed at appellant and said, "That is him, that is him," to which accusation appellant made no reply. On the way to the police station, appellant, according to these witnesses, stated that "the Chinaman wouldn't have got shot if he had handed over the money."

A gun containing one exploded cartridge was found at the curb near the hotel. A chambermaid in a San Diego hotel, where appellant lived under the surname of Alexander, identified the gun as one she had seen under a pillow in his room.

Appellant testified that while going home on the night of the shooting he met one Jim Stewart, who said to him: "I am going your way, I have got to collect some money up there from a fellow." As they neared the Service Hotel, Stewart, referring to a man approaching the entrance, said, "Well, there goes the fellow that owes me the money * * * come on and go with me." Stewart followed the man (Toy) into the hotel, saying to appellant: "Wait right here, I'll go up and get the money." Immediately afterward appellant heard a scuffle, a shot, and a call for help. Entering the hallway appellant found Stewart and Toy scuffling and tried to part them. Toy grabbed the appellant and Stewart ran away. As soon as he could get free, appellant ran into the street and seeing two officers with drawn guns he threw himself under an automobile parked at the curb. Although appellant had known Stewart for some time and had seen him almost nightly during the month preceding the shooting, he was unable to say where he lived or worked. No one answering appellant's description of Stewart was ever apprehended in connection with the crime.

[1, 2] There can be no question that the evidence is sufficient to support the judgment. The sole contention urged by appellant on this appeal is that he was improperly denied a separate trial from the codefendant Jones. The proceedings in the superior court against Jones and Davis were suspended and they were taken before the juvenile court. Jones was later brought back to the superior court for plea and arraignment. In the interim, appellant had moved for a separate trial, which was granted. When Jones was again remanded to the superior court and arraigned, he moved before a different judge for a trial separate from appellant, which motion was denied. So far as the record reveals, appellant, who was present with counsel in court at the time Jones made his motion, did not then mention his prior motion and the order thereon, nor did he then make a motion for a separate trial from Jones. Because his motion for a separate trial had been theretofore granted, appellant now urges that his joint trial with Jones "was a nullity." But, at the time appellant moved for and was granted a separate trial, Jones had not been brought back to the superior court for plea and arraignment, and apparently only appellant, Denton and Harris, three of the five alleged conspirators, were then before the superior court. Under the circumstances, it must be concluded that appellant was not granted a trial separate from Jones.

[3-5] There is no inconsistency in granting a defendant a trial separate from some codefendants while requiring a joint trial with others. Section 1098 of the Penal Code provides in part: "When two or more defendants are jointly charged with any public offense, whether felony or misdemeanor, they must be tried jointly, unless the court order separate trials. In ordering separate trials, the court in its discretion may order a separate trial as to one or more defendants, and a joint trial as to the others, or may order any number of the defendants to be tried at one trial, and any number of the others at different trials, or may order a separate trial for each defendant." Under the statute, a joint trial is contemplated, and a separate trial is a privilege and not a matter of right. People v. Rocco, 209 Cal. 68, 73, 285 P. 704. In the absence of a showing of an abuse of discretion, an appellate court will not interfere with the ruling of the trial court. People v. Eudy, 12

Cal.2d 41, 45, 82 P.2d 359; People v. Perry, 195 Cal. 623, 631-633, 234 P. 890.

[6] Furthermore, it does not appear that appellant was prejudiced in any way by having his case tried jointly with that of Jones. At all times appellant had the assistance of his own counsel, his rights were carefully guarded, and evidence relating solely to Jones was restricted by the rulings and instructions of the court.

The judgment is affirmed.

KIRMAN et al. v. BORZAGE.
Civ. Nos. 14282, 14283.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 3, California.

July 11, 1944.

Hearing Denied Sept. 5, 1944.

1. Licenses ☞39

In undertaking to do plumbing work for which compensation was sought, a copartnership was a "contractor" within statute requiring a contractor's license, and to maintain action the copartnership was required to show that it had the license. St.1939, pp. 384, 388, §§ 7025, 7026, 7028, 7029, 7031, 7067, 7068(b), 7071, 7076.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Contractor".

2. Licenses ☞39

In action by copartners for labor and material furnished under plumbing contract, testimony of one of the partners that he had been licensed as a master plumber and that he had a license to do general plumbing business as a contracting plumber, without disclosing whether the city or the state issued the license, was insufficient to establish that such partner was duly licensed. St.1939, p. 384, §§ 7026, 7028, 7031.

3. Licenses ☞39

Where a copartnership appeared as a contractor under a plumbing contract, the fact that one of the partners had a contractor's license did not satisfy statutory requirement that the copartnership obtained such license as a "person." St.1939, pp. 384, 388, §§ 7025, 7028, 7029, 7067, 7068(b), 7071, 7076.

4. Licenses ☞39

Where copartners suing for labor and material furnished under plumbing contract failed to establish that the contractor's license required by statute had been obtained, no recovery could be allowed. St. 1939, p. 384, §§ 7026, 7028, 7031.

5. Appeal and error ☞1178(6)

In action for labor and materials furnished under plumbing contract where a judgment for plaintiffs was reversed with directions to permit plaintiff to amend her complaint to allege, and to introduce evidence to show, that plaintiffs were licensed as contractors under statute, and under the evidence neither the amount awarded to plaintiff or the amount sought clearly appeared to be the just amount, further proceedings in trial court would not be limited to issue of contractor's license. St.1939, p. 384, §§ 7026, 7028, 7031.

6. Appeal and error ☞790(3)

Where judgment for plaintiff was reversed on defendant's appeal, plaintiff's appeal because of alleged inadequacy of judgment was dismissed as moot.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thurmond Clarke, Judge.

Action by Mary Kirman and G. Paul Kirman, copartners doing business under the fictitious firm name and style of George W. Kirman Company, against Rena B. Borzage to recover for labor and materials furnished under a contract for plumbing work on defendant's premises. Plaintiff recovered a judgment for $2,000 from which defendant appeals and plaintiffs appeal on ground of inadequacy of judgment.

Reversed on defendant's appeal, with directions, and plaintiff's appeal dismissed.

Charles Murstein, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Henry M. Lee, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

BISHOP, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiffs are disappointed in the amount of their judgment; they sued for the principal sum of $3,679.61 and have appealed because they claim that the judgment which was entered, one for $2,000, is for a sum less than that required by the evidence. The defendant also has appealed, her contention being that it was error to render judgment in the plaintiffs' favor for any amount. We find ourselves in agreement with defendant's contention.

[1] Plaintiffs alleged and proved that they were a copartnership, engaged in the plumbing business. They alleged and proved that on the 3rd day of September, 1941, they entered into a contract with the defendant by which they undertook to furnish the labor and material necessary to perform, and they did perform, rather extensive plumbing work in connection with a house, garage, swimming pool, and other places on her property. But they neither alleged nor proved that they had a license from the State of California to engage in the business or act in the capacity of a contractor. Plaintiffs were plainly a "contractor," within the purview of section 7026, of the Business and Professions Code, St.1939, p. 384, and they acted in the capacity of a contractor in undertaking to do and in doing the work for which they seek compensation. It was unlawful, therefore, for plaintiffs to do the work, if they were unlicensed, section 7028, Business and Professions Code, and so long as they fail to allege and prove that they had a license, they are precluded from a judgment in this action by the provisions of section 7031, Business and Professions Code, which reads: "No person engaged in the business or acting in the capacity of a contractor, may bring or maintain any action in any court of this State for the collection of compensation for the performance of any act or contract for which a license is required by this chapter without alleging and proving that he was a duly licensed contractor at all times during the performance of such act or contract." Phillips v. McIntosh, 1942, 51 Cal.App.2d 340, 124 P.2d 835; and see Alvarado v. Davis, 1931, 115 Cal.App.Supp. 782, 6 P.2d 121; Holm v. Bramwell, 1937, 20 Cal.App.2d 332, 67 P.2d 114; Sheble v. Turner, 1941, 46 Cal. App.2d 762, 117 P.2d 23. The public policy involved here has been determined by the legislature; it is not a subject of debate in the courts.

[2, 3] Plaintiffs contend that they proved at the trial that the necessary license had been obtained, but we find this not to be so. It is true that one of the plaintiffs testified that he had been licensed as a master plumber, and that he had a license to do general plumbing business as a contracting plumber, but whether the state, or the city, issued the license, was not disclosed. Of greater consequence, the fact that one of the plaintiffs had a license does not suffice where the copartnership appears as the contractor. Sections 7025, 7028, 7029, 7067, 7068(b), 7071, and 7076 plainly indicate that a copartnership, if acting in the capacity of a contractor, is required to have a license as a person, and that this requirement is not satisfied by the issuance of a license to one of the partners.
